The Legislature may interfere with property held by a corporation for one public use and apply it to another, and without compensation where no private interests are involved or invaded. People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 188.

The Legislature may delegate this power to public officers, or to corporate bodies, municipal or other. It is a rule, however, that such delegation of power must be in express terms, or must arise from a necessary implication. Re Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 574; Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston & W. R. Co. 23 Pick. 380; Re Buffalo, 68 N. Y. 167.

All property is held subject to an inherent right in the government to appropriate it to public use when the public good may require it to be done. Alabama & F. R. Co. v. Kenney, 30 Ala. 307.

The right of eminent domain is an attribute of sovereignty, and whatever exists in any form, whether tangible or intangible, may be subjected to the exercise of its power, and may be seized and appropriated to public uses when necessity demands it. Metropolitan City R. Co. v. Chicago W. D. R. Co. 87 Ill. 317, 324.

The Commonwealth may, by legislative enactment, duly authorize real estate to be taken from its own grantees. Jackson v. Winn, 4 Litt. 322; Young v. McKenzie, 3 Ga. 31; Beekman v. Saratoga & S. R. Co. 3 Paige, 45, 3 L. ed. 50.

Convenience, even great convenience, is not sufficient to raise an implication of a grant.

Nichols v. Luce, 24 Pick. 102, 105.

If the Water Company had power by implication to make its location on the land of the Railroad Company, it must be because it could not by reasonable intentment accomplish the purpose of taking the waters of Farm Pond in any other way.

Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co. 4 Cush. 63, 78.

An instance of implied authority from the general words of a legislative grant is found in the right of a railroad company to do things outside the location necessary in the construction of its railroad upon the location.

Dodge v. Essex County Comrs. 3 Met. 380.

But that implied authority is restricted to the things which are strictly necessary to be done, and does not arise merely because it is cheaper, more convenient, more fit and more suitable to do them than not to do them.

Estabrooks v. Peterborough & S. R. Co. 12 Cush. 224, 227. See also Pettingill v. Porter, 8 Allen, 1, 6; Proprietors of Locks & Canals v. Lovell, 7 Gray, 223; Housatonic R. Co. v. Lee & H. R. Co. 118 Mass. 391; Providence & W. R. Co. v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 138 Mass. 277.

The question in all these cases is whether it is to be presumed that the legislative attention was specially called to the state of things existing at the time the Act was passed, so that it must be assumed to have intended that the thing should be done which was necessary to exercise the franchise which it gave. The implication must be a necessary one.

The location by the Water Company is invalid, because the Act under which it is assumed to have been made does not provide compensation to the owners of land taken.

Powers v. Bears, 12 Wis. 214, 221; Connecticut River R. Co. v. Franklin County Comrs. 127 Mass. 50; Ash v. Cummings, 50 N. H. 591.

Messrs. J. G. Abbott and S. A. Phillips, for defendant:

The Legislature has the right to take property already appropriated to public purposes, for other public purposes.

Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 577, 9 L. ed. 836; Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 23 Pick. 360.

The defendant, in acting under its authority, was to be governed by its own discretion as to selecting the lands best situated to carry out the purposes of the grant. This selection was left to the defendant; its sound, reasonable and fair discretion was the only tribunal to determine what lands were necessary for the purposes of the grant.

Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. supra; Re Buffalo, 68 N. Y. 167; Fall River Iron Works v. Old Colony & F. R. Co. 5 Allen, 221; New York Cent. & H. R. Co. v. Metropolitan G. L. Co. 63 N. Y. 326.

The grant to the defendant authorized it to take any lands belonging to the plaintiff which were not necessary for the exercise of its franchise and the operating of its railway, although such land might be very useful, convenient and profitable to the plaintiff in the prosecution of its business.

Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. supra.

The general authority given the defendant to take any lands to carry into execution the grant to it, made it the judge of what lands should be taken, and only required of it the exercise of a sound and reasonable judgment and discretion; and, if it is sought to go behind that judgment and discretion, it can only be done by assuming the burden of proving it to be unreasonable and unjust,—in fact, governed by improper and fraudulent motives.

Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Old Colony & F. R. Co., Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp., New York Cent. & H. R. Co. v. Metropolitan G. L. Co. and Re Buffalo, supra.

In this matter the two rights and uses of the plaintiff and defendant can stand together, without any substantial interference with each other, and, when this condition of things exists, it is always holden that both rights should be sustained.

Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Peoria & F. R. Co. 105 Ill. 110; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. 97 Ill. 506; East St. Louis C. R. Co. v. East St. Louis U. R. Co. 108 Ill. 265; Morris & E. R. Co. v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co. 31 N. J. L. 205.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We will assume in favor of the plaintiff, without deciding, that the land taken by the defendant had been appropriated by the plaintiff to a public use, and that the plaintiff's right to it was in all respects as beneficial, in reference to a subsequent exercise by the Legislature of the right of eminent domain over it, as if it had originally been taken by the Railroad Company under the authority of the Statute. There can be no doubt that the Legislature may take, or authorize a corporation to take, land for a public use, which has previously been appropriated by legislative authority to a different public use. Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 23 Pick. 360; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 577, 9 L. ed. 836; Cary Library v. Bliss, 151 Mass. 364, 379, 7 L. R. A. 765. But it will not be deemed to have done so unless its intention so to take such land is plainly manifested in the Statute. Housatonic R. Co. v. Lee & H. R. Co. 118 Mass. 391; Providence & W. R. Co. v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 138 Mass. 277; Re Buffalo, 68 N. Y. 167; People v. Thompson, 98 N. Y. 6; New Jersey S. R. Co. v. Long Branch Comrs. 39 N. J. L. 28.

We are therefore brought directly to the question on which the decision of this case must turn,—whether, by Stat. 1884, chap. 271, the Legislature intended to authorize a taking of land on the border of Farm Pond, which had already been properly procured for a public use by the plaintiff corporation. Section 2 of this chapter provides, among other things, that “the defendant corporation shall have all the rights which belong to the Town of Framingham and the inhabitants thereof . . . to take, use, and hold of the waters of Farm Pond and Sudbury River . . . so much as may be necessary for the purposes specified in section one, . . . and may also take and hold by purchase or otherwise all necessary lands for raising, diverting, flowing, and holding said waters, and securing and preserving the purity of the same, and such other lands in the Town of Framingham as may be necessary to construct and maintain one or more storage and distributing reservoirs, and may do many other specified things; and in general may do any other acts and things necessary, convenient, or proper for carrying out the purposes of this Act.” The Legislature must be presumed to have been familiar with the situation and use of the lands about Farm Pond. At the time of the passage of the Statute referred to the waters of the pond had been taken by the City of Boston for a public use, and the entire shore of the pond had been purchased or taken and was then held for a public use, either by the City of Boston, or by the plaintiff corporation, or by the Boston & Albany Railroad Company, except a small portion, which was owned by the last-mentioned company, and which was not suitable to defendant’s pumping station. Nothing is expressly stated in the Statute in regard to taking property which was then held for a public use, but the right to do this was necessarily involved. The water of the pond could be taken only by diverting it from the City of Boston, which was then drawing it for the use of its inhabitants. No suitable place for a pumping station or a filtering gallery could be taken on the shore of the pond without taking it from a corporation which was then holding it for a public purpose. Doubtless it would have been possible for the defendant to erect its pumping station at a distance from the pond, and to draw the water out through a conduit, but even then it would have been necessary to construct the conduit across land which was held for a public use, and it would have been difficult and expensive so to construct the works, and very difficult, if not impossible, to provide a filtering gallery there. In considering what was the intention of the Legislature in regard to taking the plaintiff’s lands, the use to which it was then being put must not be overlooked. While it was properly procured and rightly held for the accommodation of the plaintiff’s growing business at the station, it was not necessary to the enjoyment of the plaintiff’s franchise, and was not then actually being used at all. The rights intended to be given by the Statute are not the same in reference to this land as in reference to land over which the main tracks of the railroad are laid. It may well be held that this Statute does not go far enough to authorize the taking of land without which the plaintiff could not operate its railroad. Boston W. P. Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 23 Pick. 360.

But the case last cited is an authority which decides that by mere implication, and without express statement, the Legislature may be held in a given case to have authorized the taking of land held by a corporation for a public use where the taking does not seriously interfere with the enjoyment by the corporation of its franchise. In the present case the judge found that the land taken is not indispensably necessary for the purposes of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff’s conduct in consenting to the erection of the defendant’s works, and in permitting them to remain there a long time without objection, shows the same thing. The judge found at the trial that the place selected by the defendant for its pumping station was the most suitable and proper place for it, although it would not have been impracticable to put it elsewhere. In view of all the circumstances, we are of opinion that the Statute authorized the defendant to take the plaintiff’s land for the public use to which it is now being put. The right to cross the plaintiff’s tracks to gain access to this land was also properly taken. If the land had been conveyed to the defendant by a deed from the plaintiff, the defendant would have had a way of necessity by implication. If a right of way over the location of the railroad to gain access to this land cannot be taken under any other provision of the Statute, it can under the last clause of the section above quoted.

The provision for compensation for the land taken is sufficient.* It is precisely the same as that contained in Pub. Stat., chap. 112, § 97, in reference to land taken for a railroad, except that the selectmen of the town are made the tribunal to determine the sufficiency of the security, instead of the county commissioners. Under the Constitutions of several of the States, and probably under the decisions of the courts in some others, this provision for compensation would not be held sufficient, and a statute of this kind would be unconstitutional; but in this Commonwealth the law is settled differently. Brickett v. Haverhill Aqueduct Co. 142 Mass. 394, 2 New Eng. Rep. 818; Woodbury v. Marblehead Water Co. 145 Mass. 509, 5 New Eng. Rep. 504; Bigelow v. Union F. R. Co. 137 Mass. 478. See also Cushman v. Smith, 34 Me. 247; Pittsburgh v. Scott, 1 Pa. 309; Rubottom v. McClure, 4 Blackf. 505.

Bill dismissed.

*Mass. Stat. 1884, chap. 271, § 11, provides that the owner of land taken thereunder by the said Water Company may, upon application by either party, require the Company to give security to the selectmen of said town for payment of all damages that may be awarded to them; and if, upon petition of the owner, the security appears to the selectmen to have become insufficient, they shall require the giving of further security. Deceased, et al., Repts.

(.....Cal.....)

Perjured testimony procured by bribery on the part of the successful party is not ground for setting aside a decree, although there is a reasonable certainty that the result of a new trial would be different.

(February 11, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of defendants in an action brought to set aside a decree between the same parties alleged to have been procured by fraud. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. P. Evans, with Messrs. Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, Del Valle & Munday and Smith, Winder & Smith, for appellant:

Equity may cancel and set aside or restrain judgments and decrees of any court, obtained by a fraud practiced upon the court and the losing party. When a judgment or decree of any court has been obtained by fraud, the fraud is regarded as perpetrated on the court, as well as upon the injured party.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur., cited in Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 370; Story, Eq. Pl. § 426.

The limitations of the rule are that the fraud must have been practiced in the very act of obtaining the judgment.

Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 67 Cal. 298, citing United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 63, 25 L. ed. 95.

Judgments are impeachable for those frauds only which are extrinsic to the merits of the case.

Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 How. St. Tr. 355, 554; Amador C. & M. Co. v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. 178.

Fraud alleged was extrinsic to the judgment.

United States v. Throckmorton, supra.

Whenever one party by any contrivance prevents his adversary from having equality with him before the courts, he commits a fraud upon public justice, which, resulting in private injury, may be the ground of equitable relief against the judgment recovered.

The rule that judgments will not be set aside merely because they are founded upon a forged instrument, or upon false, or even perjured, testimony, does not apply where there is shown to be "some peculiarity attending such a case which will justify the interference of the court."

Vaughn v. Johnson, 9 N. J. Eq. 178.

Any fact which clearly shows it to be against conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed by any fault or negligence in himself or his agent, will justify an application to a court of equity.

A judgment or award obtained by false testimony, fraudulently given by the party benefited thereby, is voidable.

The fraud is not to be presumed; it is to be alleged and at the proper time proved. With-

NOTE.—Perjury as ground for new trial.

Conviction of perjury is necessary before a new trial will be granted on the ground of perjury of a witness. Holtz v. Schmidt, 12 Jones & S. 327.

The fact that a witness who swore falsely on a former trial now deposes that he will tell the truth is not sufficient newly discovered evidence to warrant granting a new trial. Loucheline v. Strouse, 49 Wis. 623.

An equitable action cannot be maintained to annul a judgment upon the ground that the opposite party and his witnesses conspired together to obtain a judgment by perjury and fraud, and that the judgment was obtained by false evidence. The fraud which will justify equitable interference in setting aside a judgment or decree must be actual and positive, not merely constructive; it must be fraud occurring in the concoction or procurement of the judgment or decree, which was not known to the party at the time. Ross v. Wood, 70 N. Y. 8.

Where issues have been litigated in a former action, they cannot be retried in another between the same parties upon allegations that fraud, perjury, and conspiracy have been committed by the prevailing party and his witnesses. New York Cent. R. Co. v. Harrold, 66 How. Pr. 89.

court has jurisdiction of both law and equity, with power to relieve from unconscionable judgments on motion to the same extent as was formerly done by the court of chancery, a party who has litigated his case to the fullest extent in a common-law action cannot himself become plaintiff, and under the guise of an equity suit in the same court, and perhaps before the same judge, compel a retrial of the same question. Such a practice is opposed to the general policy of our law. Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium. Ibid.

It was decided by the Court of Appeals in the case of Ross v. Wood, 70 N. Y. 8, that an equitable action cannot be maintained to annul a judgment rendered upon conflicting evidence, upon the ground that the opposite party and his witnesses conspired together to obtain a judgment by perjury and fraud, and that the judgment was obtained by false evidence. Bearnes v. Bearnes, 66 How. Pr. 456.

In New York Cent. R. Co. v. Harrold, supra, it was held that "where it appears that the same matter has been actually tried, or so in issue that it might have been tried, the party is estopped from applying to a court of equity to set aside the judgment because of fraud, for the reason that the judgment is the highest evidence and cannot be contradicted."

out this, the case is one of mere perjury, and comes within the rule; with it, it does not.

This case presents every element required by the affirmative rule and clearly comes within its provisions.

See Maine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 335, 3 L. ed. 832; United States v. Flint, 4 Sawy. 51; Steel v. St. Louis Smelt. & Ref. Co. 106 U. S. 453, 27 L. ed. 228.

The Throckmorton Case was decided upon the ground of the negligence of the government officials in failing to make the defense, as they could readily have done on the former trial. The case therefore does not conflict with the cases cited by us.

The case is quite as strong as any that can be imagined; for here the false testimony was given under the immediate and impending influence of the bribe, exerted on the witness at the very time he was testifying. The fraud was "practiced in the very act of obtaining judgment."

Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 67 Cal. 298.

"It was perpetrated on the court as well as on the injured party" (Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 370; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 919); and the court was "misled."

Amador C. & M. Co. v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. 178.

Messrs. Stephen M. White and A. Brunson, for respondent:

The judgment which it is sought to set aside is the result of plaintiff's deliberate act, and he cannot avoid the consequences of his negligence.

The plaintiff must be without "fault or blame," or he cannot recover.

Higgins v. Bullock, 73 Ill. 206.

If the defendant has omitted to file a bill for the discovery of facts known to him and material to his defense, and suffered the case to go to trial without adequate proof of such facts, he cannot afterwards claim an injunction or a new trial from a court of equity; for it is his own folly not to have filed a bill for the discovery and to have procured a stay of the trial until the discovery.

Weir v. Vail, 65 Cal. 468.

This authority is directly applicable here, where the plaintiff knew that Johnson was testifying falsely, and yet never even asked for a continuance.

The facts stated in the complaint do not warrant the interference of equity.

They do not show the commission of a fraud of a character to justify the court in setting aside its judgment.

Perjured evidence is not sufficient to authorize a court of equity to overturn a judgment.

The credibility of testimony given in a case bearing upon the issue is not an extrinsic collateral act, but is a matter involved in the consideration of the merits, and the introduction of false testimony, known and shown to be so, does not affect the validity of the judgment rendered.

Beatty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity to vacate and annul a final decree in another action between the same parties on the ground that it was procured by fraud. The superior court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals. The principal question presented by the appeal, and the only question we find it necessary to consider, is whether the complaint, taken as true, presents a case entitling the plaintiff to the relief demanded or to any relief. It is alleged that in April, 1888, the plaintiff was owner of several parcels of real estate in Los Angeles, then worth over $200,000, and of still greater value now. That one parcel of the land had been sold under decree of foreclosure and the time for redemption was about to expire. That there were other pressing liens resting upon the whole property, amounting, with the sum necessary to redeem the parcel sold, to about $62,000 as then estimated. That plaintiff was anxiously endeavoring to raise money to effect such redemption and save his property from sacrifice. That one B. Cohn, since deceased, whose administrator is the principal defendant herein, offered to loan and did loan him the necessary sum, taking for security a grant absolute in terms of the incumbered property. The consideration expressed in the deed was the exact sum at which the liens and incumbrances on the land were estimated,—$62,000. The value of the land was, as above stated, over $200,000. Within a month or two after the execution of his deed, plaintiff tendered Cohn $65,000, and demanded a reconveyance, which was refused, whereupon he commenced an action to compel a reconveyance, alleging in his complaint that his grant to Cohn was, in fact, a mortgage to secure a loan. Cohn answered, alleging that the transaction was an absolute sale. Upon a trial of this issue the superior court found for the plaintiff, and decreed a reconveyance upon payment of $108,000, this being the amount of the sum originally advanced by Cohn, and certain additional sums which he was found to have expended subsequently in the compromise and settlement of other claims against the property. But on motion of the defendants in that action the superior court ordered a new trial unless the plaintiff would consent to a modification of the findings and decree, adding $35,000 to the amount to be paid defendants upon reconveyance of the land; and, the plaintiff failing to consent to such modification, the order for a new trial was made absolute, and, upon appeal of the plaintiff, was affirmed by this court. 67 Cal. 258.

Thereupon a new trial was had in the superior court, but before a different judge, who found upon the principal issue in favor of the defendants, and decreed against the right of redemption. From that decree, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff again appealed to this court, where the decree and order were affirmed (78 Cal. 384), upon the ground that, the evidence being conflicting, the findings of the lower court could not be disturbed. It is to annul the decree so affirmed that the present action is brought and the fraud by which it was procured is shown by allegations in substance as follows: At the date of the original transaction with Cohn, Pico was an old man over eighty years of age, unable to speak or understand the English language, unused to complicated statements or accounts, easily deceived, and in great distress and trouble regarding his business affairs. He confided in Cohn, relied upon him implicitly, and at his solicitation abstained from consulting his usual legal advisers. In the conduct of the negotiations with Cohn the only other person present was one Pancho Johnson, who knew everything that took place, and well knew that the transaction was a loan and security, and not a purchase and conveyance absolute; and shortly after the execution of the deed, so stated in the presence of Pico's attorneys and numerous other persons. Relying on Johnson's knowledge of the transaction, and his statements concerning it, Pico called him as a witness on the first trial of the action to redeem, when, instead of testifying that the transaction was a loan and mortgage, he testified that it was a sale and absolute conveyance; but, in spite of his adverse testimony, the court, as above shown, found for the plaintiff. Before the cause came on for trial a second time, Johnson was dead; but his testimony, as given on the first trial, had been reduced to writing, and was on file among the papers in the case. Plaintiff and his counsel knew that this testimony was false in its general statement to the effect that the conveyance to Cohn was absolute, and they suspected that Cohn had bribed the witness to so testify; but they had no evidence of such bribery, although they had used the utmost diligence to discover it. Upon mature consideration, they decided at the second trial to put in evidence the written transcript of Johnson's testimony at the first trial. Among their reasons for doing so were the following: Other testimony in the case showed that Johnson was present during the negotiations between Pico and Cohn, not only as interpreter, but as the particular friend and adviser of the former; and counsel for plaintiff feared that by omitting to offer Johnson's testimony they would incur the odium of suppressing evidence known to exist, whereas by putting it before the court they would have the advantage of some facts that they could prove by no other witness. They would have his admission of other facts inconsistent with the theory of a sale. The court would see that he was hostile to Pico, and he could be contradicted by proof of his statements made in the presence of others. Without going more fully into the reasons which induced counsel for plaintiff to submit the testimony of Johnson to the consideration of the court on the second trial of the former action, we content ourselves with saying that the allegations of the complaint show that the course pursued by them was, under the circumstances, wise and proper, if not absolutely necessary. But, contrary to their expectations, the court believed his false testimony, and for that reason alone decided against the plaintiff. In support of this conclusion the complaint sets out the substance of all the testimony of Cohn and Pico, and in detail the material portions of Johnson's testimony, from which, with other averments, it appears that but for Johnson's positive perjury and suppression of the truth the judgment here in question would not have been given. This being shown, it is next alleged that, after the final affirmance of that judgment by this court, plaintiff made the discovery that Cohn had paid Johnson $2,000 to testify falsely. The particulars of this bribery and its discovery are detailed in the complaint and show that on the very morning that Johnson gave his testimony Cohn placed $2,000 in the hands of one Forbes, with directions given in Johnson's presence to pay it to him if he testified to an absolute sale, and that, immediately after he had so testified, he demanded and received the money.

It is averred, and we think sufficiently shown, that upon proof of these facts there is a reasonable certainty that plaintiff would upon another trial gain his cause. Such being the case, is plaintiff entitled to a decree vacating and annulling the former decree on the ground that it was procured by fraud? After a careful and extended examination of the authorities, we are constrained to answer this question in the negative. That a former judgment or decree may be set aside and annulled for some frauds there can be no question, but it must be a fraud extrinsic or collateral to the question examined and determined in the action. And we think it is settled beyond controversy that a decree will not be vacated merely because it was obtained by forged documents or perjured testimony. The reason of this rule is that there must be an end of litigation; and when parties have once submitted a matter, or have had the opportunity of submitting it, for investigation and determination, and when they have exhausted every means for reviewing such determination in the same proceeding, it must be regarded as final and conclusive, unless it can be shown that the jurisdiction of the court has been imposed upon, or that the prevailing party, by some extrinsic or collateral fraud, has prevented a fair submission of the controversy. What, then, is an extrinsic or collateral fraud, within the meaning of this rule? Among the instances given in the books are such as these: Keeping the unsuccessful party away from the court by a false promise of a compromise, or purposely keeping him in ignorance of the suit; or, where an attorney fraudulently pretends to represent a party, and connives at his defeat, or, being regularly employed, corruptly sells out his client's interest. United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 65, 66, 25 L. ed. 85, and authorities cited. In all such instances the unsuccessful party is really prevented by the fraudulent contrivance of his adversary from having a trial; but when he has a trial he must be prepared to meet and expose perjury then and there. He knows that a false claim or defense can be supported in no other way; that the very object of the trial is, if possible, to ascertain the truth from the conflict of the evidence, and that necessarily the truth or falsity of the testimony must be determined in deciding the issue. The trial is his opportunity for making the truth appear. If, unfortunately, he fails, being overborne by perjured testimony, and if he likewise fails to show the injustice that has been done him, on motion for a new trial, and the judgment is affirmed on appeal, he is without remedy. The wrong, in such case, is, of course, a most grievous one, and no doubt the Legislature and the courts would be glad to redress it if a rule could be devised that would remedy the evil without producing mischiefs far worse than the evil to be remedied. Endless litigation, in which nothing was ever finally determined, would be worse than occasional miscarriages of justice; and so the rule is that a final judgment cannot be annulled merely because it can be shown to have been based on perjured testimony; for, if this could be done once, it could be done again and again, ad infinitum. But counsel for appellant seek to distinguish this case from those in which it has been held that a judgment will not be set aside by reason of its being based upon forged documents or perjured testimony. They say that the fraud committed by Cohn was the bribing of Johnson; that this was collateral and extrinsic; that it was not, and could not have been, the subject of investigation at the trial of the original action. We do not think this distinction can be maintained. The fraud which Cohn committed was the production of perjured evidence in support of his defense. The means by which he induced the witness to swear falsely was but an incident. It may be safely asserted that a witness does not often deliberately perjure himself without being induced thereto by some fraudulent or corrupt practice on the part of him who gets the advantage of the perjury. It is a matter of indifference what particular form such corrupt practice takes. The evil and the wrong is in the perjury which follows. In this case the truth of Johnson's evidence was necessarily drawn in question at the trial, and determined by the decision of the court; and all that has since been discovered is another item of testimony bearing on that point. We cannot find any substantial ground upon which this case can be distinguished from United States v. Throckmorton, supra. The decision in that case has been approved by this court as recently as Re Griffith, 84 Cal. 113. The following decisions of this court are also in point: Allen v. Currey, 41 Cal. 321; Amador C. & Min. Co. v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. 176.

Many other authorities to the same effect are cited in the brief for respondents. On the other hand, the case of Laithe v. McDonald, 7 Kan. 254, 12 Kan. 340, directly supports the position of appellant, as does the case of Phibilia v. Cock, 3 Burr. 1771. The cases of Verplanck v. Van Buren, 76 N. Y. 247, and Dringer v. Jewett, 42 N. J. Eq.

578, 8 Cent. Rep. 560, contain expressions which seem to imply the same doctrine, but they do not directly support it. Other cases cited by appellant are less in point.

We think, on the whole, that it is settled by the great weight of authority that the plaintiff's action cannot be maintained, and that the judgment of the Superior Court must be affirmed.

So ordered.

We concur: McFarlin, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Paterson, J.

A rehearing of the case was subsequently granted and on September 10, 1891, the following opinion was handed down:

Per Curiam:

After a full consideration of the argument presented upon the rehearing in this cause, we are satisfied with the former decision rendered in February, and for the reasons there given the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(....Tex....)

The liability of a surety on an unmatured obligation is a lawful debt, claim or demand which will make a transfer of goods to him by the debtor, on his assuming the obligation, valid as to other creditors, under a statute giving "creditors, purchasers, or other persons" the right to take sufficient property from their debtor to satisfy bona fide claims.

NOTE.—Indemnity of surety.

The authorities are uniform in holding that it is among the indisputable rights of an assignor to make such provision as he can for the payment of his outstanding indebtedness, and hence the instrument of assignment may legally provide for his sureties and indorsers as well as his general creditors. Bank of Silver Creek v. Talcott, 22 Barb. 550; Halsey v. Fairbanks, 4 Mason, 206; Keteltas v. Wilson, 36 Barb. 298, 23 How. Pr. 69; Copeland v. Weld, 8 Me. 411; Stevens v. Bell, 6 Mass. 339; Canal Bank v. Cox, 6 Me. 396; Cunningham v. Freeborn, 11 Wend. 241, 1 Edw. Ch. 256, 6 L. ed. 130, 3 Paige, 557, 3 L. ed. 273; Duval v. Ralsin, 7 Mo. 449; Vaughan v. Evans, 1 Hill, Eq. 414; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 387.

If the principal deposit funds for the indemnity of the surety, there is a sufficient consideration for the contract, and the receiver becomes bailee for the surety. Keller v. Rhoads, 39 Pa. 513.

But if the debtor procures a third person subsequently to sign a contract of indemnity to the surety, there is no consideration, even if the surety promise to continue such for an indefinite time. Rix v. Adams, 9 Vt. 283.

He is authorized to realize upon any securities pledged, whenever he is in danger of being forced to pay the debt, and before payment. Bird v. Benton, 13 N. C. 179; 5 Wait, Act. & Def. 208.

A surety may retain funds in his hands belonging to the principal debtor, upon the latter's insolvency; and an assignee of the principal debtor has, in such case, no better right to such funds than his assignor would have. Williams v. Helme, 16 N. C. 151, 18 Am. Dec. 580.

It is entirely competent for an assignor to give a preference to a surety or indorser. Hendricks v. Walden, 17 Johns. 438; Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johns. Ch. 283, 1 L. ed. 380; Cunningham v. Freeborn, 11 Wend. 241; Keteltas v. Wilson, 36 Barb. 298, 23

How. Pr. 69; Lansing v. Woodworth, 1 Sandf. Ch. 43, 7 L. ed. 231.

But he may not secure debts not in existence, or make provision for the payment of future advances (Hendricks v. Robinson, supra; Barnum v. Hempstead, 7 Paige, 568, 4 L. ed. 278), or future indorsements (Lansing v. Woodworth, 1 Sandf. Ch. 43, 7 L. ed. 231). And he may even give a preference to a party holding claims which he has purchased at a discount. Low v. Graydon, 50 Barb. 414; Powers v. Graydon, 10 Bosw. 630.

Liabilities actually existing, although contingent in their character and not yet matured, may be protected by an assignment. Instances of this are liabilities as indorser, surety, or bail. Keteltas v. Wilson, 36 Barb. 298, 23 How. Pr. 69; Griffin v. Marquardt, 21 N. Y. 121; Loeschigk v. Jacobson, 26 How. Pr. 528, 2 Robt. 645; Cunningham v. Freeborn, 11 Wend. 241, 1 Edw. Ch. 256, 6 L. ed. 130, 3 Paige, 557, 3 L. ed. 273; Brainerd v. Dunning, 30 N. Y. 211; Bishop, Insolvent Debtors, § 187.

And where the debtor has indemnified his surety by a mortgage containing a covenant to pay the debt, the mortgage will inure to the benefit of the creditor, and he may foreclose it. Loehr v. Colborn, 92 Ind. 24. And see Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 67 Ala. 425; Re Fickett, 72 Me. 268.

But a security given to a surety, merely to indemnify him against loss, and not conditioned for the payment of the debt, is not available to the creditor. Pool v. Doster, 59 Miss. 253.

Mortgages given by co-sureties, each to the other, as security to indemnify him for any claim beyond his proportion assumed, are not in equity securities for the payment of the principal debt, which inure to the benefit of the creditors upon the principle of subrogation. Hampton v. Phipps, 106 U. S. 260, 27 L. ed. 719. See Seward v. Huntington, 94 N. Y. 104; 8 Wait, Act. & Def. 446.

ERROR to the District Court for San Saba County to review a judgment in favor of claimant in an attachment suit in which the attachment was laid upon certain property alleged to belong to Stockbridge & Teague, but which was claimed by George Baker. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. West & McGown, Leigh Burleson, and Reeves & Channcy for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Hancock, Shelley & Hancock for defendant in error.

Garrett, J., filed the following opinion: This was an action to try the right of property. On December 1, 1885, Frees & Son, plaintiffs in this suit, filed a suit in the District Court of Dallas County against Stockbridge & Teague, of San Saba County, for the sum of $820.10, and levied an attachment on the goods in controversy on the 4th day of December, 1885. Defendant in error, George Baker, claimed the goods. Plaintiffs tendered issue that the goods were the property of Stockbridge & Teague, and, as such, were subject to their writ. The claimant replied that he was a purchaser of said goods in good faith, for a full, fair, and valuable consideration, and was in possession thereof when the attachment was levied; that the consideration was that claimant should assume the payment to plaintiffs of four certain promissory notes executed by Stockbridge & Teague to them, on which claimant was surety, for the sum of $391.91 each, dated July 22, 1885, and due January 22, 1886, April 22, 1886, and on dates afterwards; that he had paid the note due January 22, 1886, and was ready and willing to pay the others as they matured; that claimant was solvent, and worth, in excess of exemptions, $50,000, while the aggregate amount assumed by him for said goods was about $1,600 and interest; and that said sale was not made with the intent to defraud the creditors of Stockbridge & Teague. To this answer the plaintiffs demurred generally, and pleaded, further, that Stockbridge & Teague were insolvent at the time of the sale, which was or might have been known to claimant; that claimant was not surety on any note then due; that, of the four notes alleged to have been assumed, two were secured by a deed of trust on land belonging to Stockbridge, and that the claimant had failed to pay any of said notes except the one due January 22, 1886; that, when conveyed, the property was worth $2,000; that the goods were in fact the property of Stockbridge & Teague when they were levied on, and that the conveyance was made to defraud their creditors, they and the claimant acting together with such common intent, and hence the sale was pretended and void. The case was tried without a jury, and on May 21, 1886, judgment was rendered in favor of the claimant. J. Frees, one of the plaintiffs, having died after judgment, the writ of error was sued out by W. J. Frees as surviving partner. Stockbridge & Teague were dealers in musical instruments and supplies at San 13 L. R. A.

Saba, and owed the plaintiff for goods six promissory notes for $391.91 each bearing date July 22, 1885, and payable 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, and 12 months after date. The first two were unsecured. The others were signed by the claimant as surety; the two last being also secured by a deed of trust on land belonging to Stockbridge. Reeves, a witness for the plaintiffs and their agent, testified that it was intended that Baker should sign the first four notes, but that by mistake he signed the last four, leaving the first two unsecured. There is no other direct evidence on this point, and no explicit finding of the court thereon. Plaintiffs' writ against Stockbridge & Teague, in which the attachment was issued and levied on the goods in controversy, was on the two unsecured notes. Some time prior to November, 1885, Stockbridge sold out his interest to Teague; the latter assuming the debts of the firm. Teague paid Stockbridge no money, but took the goods to pay the debts. Reeves was sent by plaintiffs from Dallas to San Saba to see Stockbridge about securing or collecting the first two notes then due. He found Teague in possession of the stock of goods sold by plaintiffs to Stockbridge & Teague. Reeves wanted the notes paid or secured. After an effort during the day to raise money, Teague met Reeves at his hotel at about 8 o'clock that night, and found that he had prepared a bill of sale for the stock to plaintiffs in consideration of the two unsecured notes, amounting to about $800. Teague declined to take that amount, but offered to let plaintiffs have the goods at invoice price; to pay the two unsecured notes first, the balance to be credited on the notes on which Baker was security. This Reeves refused to do. Teague then went down town, and sold the goods to Baker, made him a bill of sale, and delivered to him the keys of the store. The consideration was that Baker assumed payment of the four notes on which he was security, amounting to about $1,600, and released Stockbridge from all liability thereon. Baker was worth at the time about $50,000. He paid the note due January 22, 1886. Very little of the stock had been sold at the time of the sale, or when this case was tried. Baker testified that he bought the stock of goods in order to protect himself as the surety of Stockbridge & Teague. He had notice that Reeves was trying to buy the stock of goods for plaintiffs. Plaintiffs' attachment was issued and levied after the sale. On January 1, 1886, the claimant employed Teague to take charge of the stock and sell it for him. His agreement was to sell the goods so as to net Baker the invoice price, and whatever there was over he was to receive for his services. The invoice price of the stock of goods at the time of the levy was about $2,000. At the time of sale they were fairly worth about $1,600. Neither Stockbridge nor Teague had any other property subject to execution when the sale was made.

Plaintiffs, by their third and fifth assignments of error, complain of the findings of the court on the facts of the case: (1) that Baker was surety on four notes; and (2) as to the circumstances attending the sale. The latter finding is clearly supported by the evidence; and the former is not unsupported. If, as according to the testimony of the witness Reeves, Baker signed the two last notes by mistake, whether or not he would be bound as a surety thereon would be a question of law arising from the facts. This question is not properly before us, either under the pleadings or the evidence. Again, if Baker had the right, as surety, to take a conveyance of a sufficient amount of the goods to protect himself, he could also, for any balance of the sum agreed to be paid therefor, assume a debt of the seller for which he was not before liable, being bound only to see that such balance was so applied. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532. If he has not paid all that he assumed, it is the fault of the plaintiffs, who seized the goods under their writ of attachment. They will not be permitted to set aside the sale, and apply the goods to their unsecured notes, and at the same time require its terms to be complied with by demanding payment of the notes which were assumed. "The right of a creditor to receive property from an insolvent debtor in payment of a debt due to him, if the same be openly done, and more property is not taken than is reasonably necessary to pay the debt, although the creditor may know at the time he receives the property that he will thereby prevent other creditors from enforcing their claims, and although the creditor may know that the debtor is prompted to give him the preference through motives of friendship, is recognized. Such reception of property, however, must be bona fide; that is, for the sole purpose of securing the debt, and not with intent to cover up any of the property or its proceeds for the benefit of the debtor to the prejudice of other creditors." Edrington v. Rogers, 15 Tex. 188; Hancock v. Horan, Id. 507; Greenelee v. Blum, 59 Tex. 126. Whether Baker's claim was just or not was determined by the court, and its findings necessarily affirm that it was. They establish conclusively, also, as matters of fact, the good faith of Baker in the purchase of the goods, and that he paid for them a full and fair consideration by assuming the four notes, amounting to twice as much as Reeves had offered.

There is only one question presented by the remaining assignments of error, including the first, which assigns as error the action of the court in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to claimant's answer, and that is the controlling question in the case. Was Baker, as surety for Stockbridge & Teague on obligations that had not matured at the time of the transfer, such a creditor or other person with a claim as could purchase from an insolvent debtor, in order to protect himself, considered both as to whether a surety or a surety on an obligation that has not matured is such a person or creditor? Would the consideration for the transfer be deemed valuable in law? Finally, was Baker, the surety, a creditor or other person with a demand against Stockbridge & Teague? It will be observed that in the consideration of this question we are not confined to the word "creditor" alone, 18 L. R. A.

as descriptions of the class of persons protected by the Statute; for the language of the Statute is, "creditors, purchasers, or other persons." Rev. Stat. art. 2465. If a creditor or other person having a legal demand against another receives from his debtor property for his claim, bona fide, and no more than is reasonably sufficient to pay the same, he may do so, because he is a "creditor" or "other person" who is protected by the Statute; the principle of law being that, if the debtor transfers the property directly to the person to whom the law intends it should go, the conveyance cannot be fraudulent. And the same may be said of the sales permitted to stand where the debtor has sold his property openly for a fair price, and appropriated the proceeds to the payment of his just obligations; so, also, where the purchaser takes the property, and assumes and at once pays debts of the seller. The sole object of the Statute is to protect lawful debts, claims, or demands; and if Baker's liability on the notes of Stockbridge & Teague amounted to a lawful debt, claim, or demand against them, and the transfer was otherwise in good faith, and in accordance with the principles of law, often announced, authorizing the creditor to receive property from his debtor in satisfaction of his claim, then the sale was valid. A liberal construction is given to the words "creditors and others." Mr. Bump, in his work on Fraudulent Conveyances, says: "The character of the claim, if it is just and lawful, is immaterial. It need not be due; for, although the holder cannot maintain an action until it is due, he nevertheless has an interest in the property as a fund out of which the demand ought to be paid." Page 503. And again: "A contingent claim is as fully protected as one that is absolute. A liability as surety is within the Statute, as much as a liability as principal." Ibid. It is a general rule that all claims arising from contract are in force from the date of the agreement. It has been held that a surety is the creditor of his co-surety. Howe v. Ward, 4 Me. 195. These questions are ably discussed in the opinions of Justice Bronson in the case of Van Wyck v. Seward, 18 Wend. 375. In concluding the discussion of the question whether appellant in that case was entitled to the protection of the Statute as a creditor of William Seward, the learned judge said: "In these and all other cases depending upon contract the person to whom the engagement is made is as much a creditor, within the meaning of the Statute, as though he had a debt on which the right of action already existed. There is no reason why he should not be entitled to the same protection in the one case as in the other. In the language of Chief Justice Mellen in Howe v. Ward, 'although he cannot maintain an action on the contract until it has been violated, still he has an interest in the property conveyed, as a fund out of which the debt ought to be paid.'" In Bonham v. Taylor (Tex.) 16 S. W. Rep. 555 (decided at the present term of this court), it was held that the sureties on the bond of a city treasurer had the right to protect themselves by injunction restraining the treasurer from paying over money, which had been raised for city purposes by taxation, to a bank to which the city council had agreed to lend it. Had the sureties on the city treasurer's bond been compelled to await action until their liability accrued, it would have been inequitable and unjust; and so if Baker should be forced to wait until the maturity of the notes on which he was surety for Stockbridge & Teague, and they had made default thereon, the goods to which he, as well as other creditors, had a right to look for the payment of the debts for which he was bound, would in all probability have been absorbed by the plaintiffs in this case to satisfy their unsecured notes. Baker was a creditor of Stockbridge & Teague, such as entitled him to receive a conveyance of the goods in controversy to indemnify him against ultimate liability on assumption by time of the debts for which he was security. We are of the opinion that the sale was also complete, and not a mortgage or conditional sale, and that the title to the goods vested at once in Baker; yet, if it had been a mortgage or conditional sale, with Baker in possession, he would have still had the right to the possession of the property until the conditions had been complied with or broken.

In either event the judgment of the court below in his favor was right, and should be affirmed.

Adopted by Supreme Court, May 26, 1891.

v.

Frank HOYT et al., Appts.

1. No trade-mark can be claimed in the shape of a bottle in which extracts are put up for sale.
2. No exclusive right can be acquired by adoption in a cap label for a bottle, which was originated by a third person and has been used by him for years.
3. Neither the shape of a box in which bottles of extracts are packed for purposes of trade, nor the mechanical arrangement of the bottles therein, is subject to appropriation as a trade-mark.
4. Combining a label and bottle cannot infringe a trade-mark if the separate use of each would not have that effect.

(October 5, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County enjoining them from infringing plaintiff's trade-mark. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Henry Peace and F. Carroll Brewster, for appellants:

It may be seriously questioned whether labels and advertisements as mere labels and advertisements constitute trade-marks.

Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. 11 Jur. N. S. 518; Browne, Trade-marks, p. 144.

The bottle is not a trade-mark, because it is but the form of the goods.

Moorman v. Hoge, 2 Sawy. 78; Browne, Trade-marks, p. 106; Harrington v. Libby, 12 Pat. Off. Gaz. 188.

The shape and arrangement of the boxes cannot constitute a trade-mark.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The cases in which a court of equity will interfere to protect a trade-mark are divisible into two classes. To the first of these may be referred those cases in which the trade-mark has been registered under a system provided by law for the protection of the owner in its use. To the other belong all those cases in which there has been no registration and in which the true ground for interference is the prevention of fraud. In cases falling within the first class, property in the trade-mark is shown by the certificate of registration. In those belonging to the second, the right asserted is of common-law origin, and is shown by proof of the adoption and use of the trade-mark. Its invasion is a fraud upon the owner and the public, to be restrained on principles of common right. All monopolies are odious and their maintenance in favor even of inventors, is limited in duration. When a statutory term of protection is over, whatever is valuable in the subject of the patent becomes, as does an unpatented invention, a contribution to the public welfare and may be freely used as such. Competition is essential to commerce, and within legitimate lines should always be encouraged. The "survival of the fittest" is a law of trade, no less than of the development of living organisms; and from the struggle which determines who and what is "fittest," come general development and progress. As a general proposition it may be said that one may imitate what is excellent in the process and business methods of his neighbor as freely and as safely as he may imitate what is good in his moral character, as long as he infringes no right secured to him by statute, and does not fraudulently personate him or simulate his products. An inventor who secures a patent for his device is protected in his exclusive right during the period fixed by law. When that period expires, his exclusive right expires with it, and thereafter he stands on no higher ground than any other citizen who may desire to use the thing or combination covered by the patent. The rules applicable to trade-marks are quite different. A trade-mark may increase in value to its owners by use, and the law could not put a time limit on the owner's right to it any more than it could put a limit upon his right to use any other article of property. A trade-mark is not an invention. It does not relate to or affect processes of manufacture or mechanical combinations. It is a sign or mark by which the manufactured articles produced by one person or firm or maker are distinguishable from those produced by rival manufacturers. It must be distinctive and indicate the personal as distinguished from the geographical origin of the article to which it is applied. Laughman's App. 128 Pa. 1, 5 L. R. A. 599. Thus Sonman, the name of a large tract of land, cannot be appropriated by one of several owners of land within the tract, to the exclusion of the other owners; nor Lackawanna Valley, by one operator in that valley, to the exclusion of all others. But the trade-mark must relate to, and distinguish, the goods to which it is applied. For this reason, among others, the size or shape or mode of construction of a box, barrel, bottle, or package, in which goods may be put is not a trade-mark. If there is any new and useful combination in the construction of such box or package it should be patented as an invention if the owner wishes to prevent others from using it; but such package cannot be registered as a trade-mark. A sign, device or mark originated and in actual use by another cannot be adopted and registered by anyone who takes a fancy to it, as his trade-mark, and such adoption and registration will not confer a title on him who makes it. It would be an infringement upon the original owner, and from the wrong so done no valid title could grow. A trade-name may, in a general way, be treated as a trade-mark and protected in the same manner. When a business has been conducted by some person or firm under a particular trade-name until the public come to regard the name as affording an assurance of the good quality of the article bearing it, the name is a valuable part of the business assets of the person or firm whose skill and integrity have won confidence for it. A rival who should appropriate the trade-name to his own use without the consent of the owners, and put his goods on the market bearing it, as though they were made by the rightful owner of the trade-name, is guilty of a fraud on the public, and a fraudulent taking from the proprietors which is, both in intent and effect, a larceny. But when such rival puts his goods on the market on their own merits and under his trade-name, his neighbors have no just ground of complaint if he has imitated, adopted, or improved upon their unpatented methods and processes. Putnam Nail Co. v. Dulaney (Pa.) 11 L. R. A. 524. It only remains to apply these general principles to the case now before us, so far as they are applicable to the questions raised by the appeal of the defendant below. The plaintiffs claim that the front or face label on their bottles has been registered by them as a trade-mark. It is put on obliquely to the length of the bottle. It bears the name of the liquid in the bottle thus, "Hoyt's German Cologne." It also bears the name and residence of the makers, and a reference to the fact of its registration. They also claim the following unregistered trade-marks: a bottle, having a depression or panel on the back side; a cap label over the cork in the bottle; a peculiar mode of arranging and packing bottles in boxes; in the name of the article sold, viz., "Hoyt's German Cologne."

The defendants have a registered label or trade-mark which goes upon the bottle at right angles with its length, and which contains the name of the liquid, "Hoyt's Egyptian Cologne," with a view of a pyramid and the head of the Sphinx; with the names and residence of the makers, and a reference to its registration. The learned judge of the court below held that F. Hoyt of the defendant firm had a legal right to use his own name in his business, and that he could not be enjoined from using it upon goods produced by himself. The correctness of this holding is not raised by the defendant's appeal. The learned judge also held that the defendant's trade-mark or label was not an infringement upon that of the plaintiffs, whether considered by itself or in connection with the champagne shaped bottles on which it was originally used by the defendants. This also must be regarded as settled for the purposes of this appeal, since the plaintiffs have not appealed, and the defendants cannot, from this ruling. Then, too, the evidence shows very clearly that the bottle with the depression or panel on the back side, which both parties are now using, is a stock bottle to which neither of them has any exclusive right, and which is freely sold by manufacturers to all who apply. This bottle, as we have already seen, is not a trade-mark. It is not registered and it is not capable of registration. It is in common use, open to the purchase and use of all who may fancy its shape, in the same manner as the other stock bottles. The cap label was not originated by the plaintiffs and does not belong to them. It was devised, according to the contradicted testimony, by Dr. David Jayne, a Philadelphia chemist and dealer in medicines, and was used by him and his successors for years before and since the plaintiffs assumed to adopt it as their own. Their adoption of his cap label gave them no title to it. The mechanical arrangement of the bottles in boxes is neither an invention nor a trade-mark. If the box is an invention, and others are to be prevented from using it, the plaintiffs should have secured a patent for it. Without letters-patent they have no exclusive property in the shape or construction of a box. Whatever one manufacturer or tradesman may do to increase the safety of his goods in transportation, or to display them advantageously upon shelves, counters, or in show windows, is simply a good example or model for the public which anyone interested may imitate with impunity. The debatable ground presented by this appeal is thus seen to be very narrow. It may be learned to the best advantage by considering the language of the court below and the form of the decree made. The decree did not hold the defendants' label to be an infringement, or deny the defendants the use of their name. On the contrary the learned judge said: "The defendants have also, we think, the right to use the label placed on the sides of their bottles." If they made cologne and sold in bottles such as they used at first, with their labels upon them having the name "Hoyt's Egyptian Cologne," and the pyramid and the head of the Sphinx, and the names and residence of the makers, they were exercising a clear legal right and could not be enjoined. "But," the decree continues, the "defendants must be enjoined from putting up and offering for sale cologne in the bottles described in the bill, with the labels thereon." This is the decree appealed from. The court held that the defendants' label was no infringement, and was lawfully used on a stock bottle with a champagne bottle shape. But if the same label was used on another stock bottle having a panel on the back side, it became an infringement because of the shape of the bottle on which it was placed, and the use of the label on such a bottle must be prevented by injunction. As both styles of bottle were open to the public, as stock bottles, the label was as lawful upon one of them as upon the other. The plaintiffs could no more acquire an exclusive right to a stock bottle by priority of use, than they could acquire an exclusive right to Dr. Jayne's cap label by being the first to appropriate it without his knowledge or consent. Adopting the conclusions of the learned judge that the label of the defendants did not infringe upon that of the plaintiffs, and that the defendants had a legal right to use their own names in their business, we cannot sustain this decree.

It is accordingly set aside; and as no ground of equitable relief appears upon the record before us, the bill is dismissed at the cost of the appellee.

Samuel W. DARBY et al.

Thomas H. MOORE, Intervenor.

(....Del. Ch.....)

A woman's share as tenant in common in the proceeds of lands, the right to the possession of which vested in her after the passage of the Married Woman's Acts, and which have been sold under direction of court for partition, will not, at the request of her husband, be invested for his benefit, but it will be paid to her absolutely.

(September 21, 1890.)

SUIT brought in Kent County for partition of certain real estate. On intervening partition petition by the husband of one of the co-owners to have her share of the proceeds of sale invested for his benefit. Petition denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Nathaniel B. Smithers, Sr., for intervenor.

Messrs. Richard R. Kenney and Edward Ridgely, contra:

The Married Woman's Acts are remedial statutes and should be so construed as to advance the remedy and effect the object intended to be accomplished by the Legislature.

Billings v. Baker, 28 Barb. 343; Johnes v. Johnes, 8 Dow. 15.

As the law now stands in our State, the right of the husband to be tenant by the curtesy of his wife's lands is dependent upon the fact not only that the issue should be born alive during coverture, but also that the wife should be seised of the lands at the time of her death.

Any alienation of the lands during the life of the wife must necessarily defeat the right of tenancy by the curtesy in the husband.

Saulsbury, Ch., delivered the following opinion:

Miriam E. Moore has filed her petition in this court, praying for partition between her and her two brothers, Samuel W. Darby and John C. Darby, of lands situate in Mispillion and South Murderkill Hundreds, formerly belonging to Samuel Warren, senior. One of these tracts of land contains about 700 acres; one other contains something over 200 acres, and a third tract contains upwards of 180 acres.

Samuel Warren, senior, died in 1848. By his will, admitted to probate November 6, 1848, he devised as follows:

"Fourth. I give and devise to my beloved wife, Miriam, for and during the term of her natural life, without impeachment of waste, all that farm or tract of land with the appurtenances situate in Mispillion Hundred, Kent County, and State of Delaware, being the Mansion Farm on which Solomon Townsend, senior, and Solomon Townsend, junior, lived and died, and now in the tenure of Abner Wooters, and containing six hundred acres more or less; and from and immediately after the death of my said wife, I give and devise the said farm or tract of land with the appurtenances unto Solomon Townsend Warren and John W. Hall and their heirs for and during the natural life of my daughter Mary Darby, now the wife of John M. Darby, upon trust, to receive the rents and profits thereof and to pay the same to my said daughter Mary during her natural life, for her sole and separate use, notwithstanding her coverture, free from the debts, management, power, control of her now husband the said John M. Darby or of any other husband by her hereafter to be taken, and the receipt of the said Mary alone from time to time to be a sufficient discharge, and after the death of my said daughter, I give and devise the farm or tract of land aforesaid with the appurtenances unto the heirs of my said daughter Mary in fee simple absolute, clear and discharged from the trust aforesaid.

"Fifth. I give and devise unto Solomon Townsend Warren and John W. Hall and their heirs for and during the natural life of my daughter Mary Darby, now the wife of John M. Darby, the farm or tract of land which I purchased of Dr. Alexander Lowber near Frederica containing five hundred acres more or less with the appurtenances upon trust, to receive the rents and profits thereof and to pay the same to my said daughter Mary during her natural life, for her sole and separate use, notwithstanding her coverture, free from the debts, management, power or control of her now husband, the said John M. Darby, or of any other husband by her hereafter to be taken, and the receipt of the said Mary alone from time to time to be a sufficient discharge. And after the death of my said daughter, I give and devise the farm or tract of land aforesaid unto the heirs of my said daughter Mary in fee simple absolute, clear and discharged from the trust aforesaid."

The tract of land in Mispillion Hundred, as appears from the return of the freeholders, in fact contains about 700 acres of land and the two tracts in South Murderkill Hundred contain, as appears by said report, something over 400 acres. This discrepancy between the will of Samuel Warren, senior, and the report of the freeholders is not accounted for by any proof in the cause, but the discrepancy is immaterial, as there is no doubt that the land mentioned in the will above recited and the land of which partition is sought are the same. Thomas H. Moore has filed his petition, therein stating that he intermarried with the said Miriam E. Moore, the petitioner in the proceedings for partition on or about the fourth day of September, A. D. 1852, and had by her issue born alive and thereby became tenant by the curtesy initiate of the lands of which she was seised for and during said coverture, and that as said tenant by the curtesy initiate in the lands of his said wife, Miriam E., he has been informed and believes that he has an interest and is entitled to be made a party to said proceedings in chancery and he therefore prays that he as her husband may be made a party thereto.

He was made a party by the consent of the solicitors for the plaintiff and defendants respectively.

The freeholders appointed to make partition of the lands have reported that the same cannot be divided without detriment to the parties entitled and that they therefore have appraised the lands as by their commission they were commanded to do. The lands in respect to which partition is prayed, have 13 L. R. A.

been sold, the proceeds of sale paid into court, and the question is now raised by the solicitors for the husband of the petitioner whether her share of the proceeds of sale shall be paid to her absolutely, or, as they claim would be proper, shall be ordered to be invested for her benefit, the interest paid to her for life and the principal held to secure the possible right of the husband therein should he survive the wife.

An estate by the curtesy, says Cruise, quoting Littleton, vol. 1, § 1, of chap. 1, title 5, p. 107, is where a man taketh a wife seised in fee simple or in fee tail general or seised as heir in special tail, and hath issue by the same wife, male or female, born alive, albeit the issue after dieth or liveth, yet if the wife dies the husband shall hold the land during his life by the law of England.

And a tenant by the curtesy of England, says Blackstone, book 2, chap. 8, p. 128, is where a man marries a woman seised of an estate of inheritance, that is, of lands and tenements in fee simple, or fee tail, and has by her issue, born alive, which was capable of inheriting her estate. In this case he shall on the death of his wife hold the lands for his life as tenant by the curtesy of England. There are four requisites, says Blackstone, necessary to make a tenancy by the curtesy: marriage, seisin of the wife, issue, and death of the wife.

1. The marriage must be canonical and legal.

2. The seisin of the wife must be an actual seisin or possession of the lands; not a bare right to possess which is seisin in law, but an actual possession; and therefore a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a remainder or reversion.

3. The issue must be born alive. The husband, he says, by the birth of the child becomes tenant by the curtesy initiate, and may do many acts to charge the lands, but his estate is not consummate till the death of the wife; which is the fourth and last requisite to make a complete tenant by the curtesy.

Miriam E. Moore had not the possession nor the right to the possession of these lands or any part of them until the death of her mother, Mrs. Mary Darby. Her mother herself had not the right to their possession in her lifetime, but the right to their possession during her lifetime was in Solomon Townsend Warren and John W. Hall and their heirs during her lifetime. The right to the possession of Miriam E. Moore to any portion of these lands did not accrue until the death of her mother, Mrs. Darby, which occurred, as Mr. Moore states in his petition, on or about the 27th day of January, A. D. 1888. At this period her children Miriam E. Moore, Samuel W. Darby and John C. Darby became entitled to the possession of the lands under the will of their grandfather Samuel Warren, senior.

Before that day and before Miriam E. Moore, and of course before her husband, Thomas H. Moore, could become entitled to any portion of said lands, the Legislature of Delaware had in effect abolished the right of a tenant by the curtesy initiate in this State.

In fact, tenancy by the curtesy of England and tenancy by the curtesy as theretofore existing in Delaware ceased to exist.

But to consider the law in reference to this subject independently of our Acts of Assembly, a man was not entitled to tenancy by the curtesy nor a woman to dower out of a reversion or a remainder expectant upon an estate of freehold; but upon a reversion expectant upon an estate for years both of these rights (of dower and of curtesy) accrue, for the possession of the tenant for years constitutes a legal seisin of the freehold in reversion. 1 Sharswood's Bl. bk. 2, chap. 8, p. 126; Stoughton v. Leigh, 1 Taunt. 410; De Gray v. Richardson, 3 Atk. 470; Goodlittle v. Newman, 3 Wils. 521.

The right the husband acquires by marriage in the lands of the wife is thus stated in vol. 2, p. 131, of Kent's Commentaries, Lacy's edition 1889: "If the wife, at the time of marriage, be seised of an estate of inheritance in land, the husband, upon the marriage, becomes seised of the freehold jure uxoris, and he takes the rents and profits during their joint lives. It is a freehold estate in the husband, since it must continue during their joint lives, and it may, by possibility, last during his life. It will be an estate in him for the life of the wife only, unless he be a tenant by the curtesy. It will be an estate in him for his own life, if he dies before his wife, and in that event she takes the estate again in her own right. If the wife dies before the husband, without having had issue, her heirs immediately succeed to the estate. If there has been a child of the marriage born alive, the husband takes the estate absolutely for life, as tenant by the curtesy, and on his death the estate goes to the wife, or her heirs, and in all these cases, the emblements growing upon the land at the termination of the husband's estate go to him or his representatives."

If during her life real estate is converted by operation of law into personal estate the conversion will be treated as her own. Graham v. Dickinson, 3 Barb. Ch. 170, 5 L. ed. 861.

The rents, issues and profits of the wife's lands accruing during coverture belong absolutely at common law to the husband. How effectually these common-law rights of the husband had been changed by the Statutes of this State will appear by reference to those Statutes, and here I will remark that these Statutes are remedial in character and must be construed by courts so as to effectuate the intention of the Legislature so far as the same can reasonably and properly be done.

Our first Statute upon this subject was passed March 17, 1865, and provided "that the real estate, mortgages, stocks and silver plate belonging to any married woman at the time of her marriage, or to which she may become entitled at any time during her coverture, shall remain and continue to be her sole and separate property, and shall not be subject to the disposition of her husband by alienation, transfer, assignment or otherwise; or be liable to the debts or contracts of her husband, except where such debts are judgments recovered against him for her liabilities before marriage: provided, that nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the wife to sell or otherwise dispose of her real estate, mortgages, stocks or silver plate without her husband's consent, evidenced by writing under his hand and seal, or to authorize her to create any incumbrance upon her real estate, or to dispose of the rents, issues and profits thereof, or the interest upon her mortgages, or dividends, or other income arising from her stocks, without his consent, evidenced in the same manner: and, provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, in any manner, the rights of the husband (if he survive the wife), as tenant by the curtesy in the real estate of his wife."

The Act to secure to married women certain of their own earnings, p. 95, vol. 14, has no relation to the case before the court.

By an Act for the protection of married women, passed April 9, 1873, vol. 14, p. 638, § 1, it was provided "that the real and personal property of any female who may hereafter marry, and which she shall own at the time of her marriage, or that any female now married may receive by gift, grant, devise or bequest from any person other than her husband, shall be her sole and separate property, and the rents, issues and profits thereof shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband nor liable for his debts."

This last Act was amended March 17, 1875, by striking out said first section and inserting among other things, in lieu thereof: "Section 1. That the real and personal property of any married woman, which has been heretofore acquired, is now held, or which she may hereafter acquire in any manner whatsoever, from any person other than her husband, shall be her sole and separate property, and the rents, issues and profits thereof shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor liable for his debts."

These are the portions of our Acts properly known as Married Women's Acts having relation to the question now before me. Regarded as remedial, and construed so as to advance the remedy and effect the object intended to be accomplished by the Legislature, what are their effects in the case before me?

Mrs. Miriam E. Moore was not entitled to the possession of these lands or any portion of them until the 27th day of January, A. D. 1888, the day of the death of Mrs. Darby, and the day on which the estates of Solomon Townsend Warren and John W. Hall, trustees thereof, expired. Thomas H. Moore had not then and has not since had any estate and no interest in said lands. He has not had the legal right to enter upon or into the possession of said lands for any purpose whatever; he is not entitled to the perception of the rents and profits of said lands or any part thereof during the lifetime of his wife; he has no estate by the curtesy initiate therein; he is entitled only to the possibility of entering into the possession of his wife's interest therein and enjoying the possession thereof during his lifetime in case he survives his wife, and in case no partition thereof be made between the tenants in common thereof, and unless the conversion of the wife's interest therein into money be in fact and in law not an absolute conversion, but a qualified conversion only. Would such a conversion of land into money under these circumstances have the effect of securing to Thomas H. Moore the preservation and enjoyment of the principal sum of money adjudged as the value of the wife's interest in the lands under the proceedings in partition in this cause?

The doctrine of conversion was thus stated by an eminent English equity judge in a leading case upon this subject "Nothing is better settled than this principle, that money directed to be employed in the purchase of land, and land directed to be sold and turned into money, are to be considered as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted and this, in whatever manner the direction is given, whether by will, by way of contract, marriage articles, settlement, or otherwise; and whether the money is actually deposited, or only covenanted to be paid. Whether the land is actually conveyed, or only agreed to be conveyed, the owner of the fund, or the contracting parties, may make land money, or money land. The cases establish this rule universally." See 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 161, and authorities cited.

The principle properly applicable to this case was decided by the superior court at its fall session in 1874 in the case of State, for the use of Samuel D. Coterdale, versus Randall B. Gorman and others.

The court decided in that case that under the Act for Married Women, passed in 1865, a wife's interest in a recognizance in the orphan's court on the assignment of the real estate of a deceased father cannot be attached for the debts of her husband, except for such as are properly provided for in it.

In that case the court said: they considered that it would be contrary to the spirit and policy as well as the intention of the Statute of 1865, for the benefit of married women to now hold that a wife's sole and separate interest in the real estate of her deceased father secured by recognizance in the orphan's court may be attached for the debt of her husband except such debts as are specially provided for in it. Jefferson v. Brady, 4 Houst. (Del.) 626.

If I understood the argument of the solicitors for Thomas H. Moore, the husband of Miriam E. Moore, it was that the conversion of the interests of Mrs. Moore, and her brothers by a decree of a court of chancery of the real estate belonging to them in common was not a conversion out and out, but a special conversion for the purposes of partition only; and that the share of Mrs. Moore in the amount of the sales of the lands made under the order of the court in this partition cause should not be ordered paid to her absolutely, but that she should be required to give security for her proportion of such sale, so that in case her husband should survive her that amount should be secured so that her husband, in case he should survive her, might have the enjoyment of it during his life as tenant by the curtesy therein.

The position of the counsel for Mr. Moore is not in my opinion tenable. It is not supported by a proper consideration of our Acts of Assembly in reference to the estates of married women, or of the doctrine of conversion as supported by adjudged cases.

Partition of estates held in common is a necessary incident of such estates.

Where such estates cannot in fact be divided between tenants in common the law requires that they shall be valued in money, and that such valuation shall be returned to this court by the freeholders appointed to make partition or valuation. Such valuation being returned to the court, its duty is to decree a sale by a trustee to be appointed for that purpose, the trustee making sale under the authority of his appointment for that purpose. It is the duty of the court to decree the payment to each tenant in common subject only to costs and liens against them respectively.

No decision contrary to the principles here announced has been made by me since I have exercised the duties of chancellor, and none, I presume, have been made to the contrary, by any of my predecessors in office when their attention has been properly called to the provisions of our Acts of Assembly in respect to the rights of married women.

Let a decree be drawn for the payment to Mrs. Moore of her share of the proceeds of sale of the lands held in common by her and her brothers.

MICHIGAN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO., Appt.,
v.

George D. REED.

(.....Mich.....)

A policy of insurance may be rescinded by the insured on discovery of misrepresen- tations in the application, made without his knowledge by the agent of the insurer, although the latter would be bound by the policy if it were not rescinded.

(February 6, 1891.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lenawee County to review a judgment in favor of NOTE.—Fraud in its relations to life insurance.

If a person is induced, by the false and fraudulent representations of the agent of an insurance company, to take a policy of insurance in the company, and to pay the premium thereon, he may rescind the contract, and, in an action against such agent, recover as damages the amount of the premium so paid. Hedden v. Griffin, 136 Mass. 229.

A recent Massachusetts case decides that where a policy of insurance was obtained through fraudulently obtained through fraudu-

defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance premium note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. C. Winne, for appellant:

Suppose what defendant claims with regard to the statement of his occupation is true, and that his employment was embraced in the prohibited list, still it was no fraud upon him, but a fraud of the agent upon the Company and should he have died at any time prior to the date of payment of the note, his beneficiary would have been entitled to $1,000 and likewise if the premiums had been kept up thereafter.

Brodie*, 4 L. R. A. 458, 52 Ark. 11; Dunbar v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 72 Wis. 492; Kansas Protective Union v. Gardner, 41 Kan. 897; lent representation of the agent, that fact alone is sufficient to vitiate the policy, and the party to whom such a policy was issued can maintain an action to recover the premium so paid. Trabant v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 131 Mass. 167.

There seems to be no valid reason why the rules applicable to the rescission of contracts for fraud or mistake should not also apply to a rescission sought by the insurer. Cooke, Life Ins. §134, citing Hoare v. Bremridge, L. R. 14 Eq. 522; Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Reals, 50 How. Pr. 237.

Fraud and false representation defined.

Fraud consists in deception practiced in order to induce another to part with property or surrender some legal right, and which accomplishes the end desired. Alexander v. Church, 1 New Eng. Rep. 824, 58 Conn. 561.

A representation is to be deemed false when the facts fail to correspond with its assertions or stipulations. If a representation is false in a material point, whether affirmative or promissory, the injured party is entitled to rescind the contract from the time when the representation becomes false. Cal. Civ. Code, §§ 2579, 2580.

Effects of fraud.

Fraud avoids a contract ab initio, vitiates all contracts whether intended to operate against a party, a stranger, or the public generally. The guilty party cannot allege his own fraud in order to avoid his own act; and he may be liable in damages where real injury is done. The agreement cannot be adopted in part; all must be disaffirmed, or none. Foreman v. Bigelow, 4 Cliff. 543, 549; Feltz v. Walker, 49 Conn. 98, and cases cited.

Courts of equity have undoubted jurisdiction to compel the surrender and cancellation of deeds where the evidence shows they were obtained by fraud or held for inequitable and unconscionable purposes. Walker v. Hunter, 27 Ga. 338; Hayward v. Dimsdale, 17 Ves. Jr. 111; Hamilton v. Cummings, 1 Johns. Ch. 517, 1 L. ed. 239; Van Doren v. New York, 9 Paige, 388, 4 L. ed. 743; Fonda v. Sage, 48 N. Y. 187; McHenry v. Hazard, 45 N. Y. 580; Whittingham v. Thornburgh, 2 Vern. 206; De Costa v. Scandret, 2 P. Wms. 170; Peake v. Highfield, 1 Russ. 559.

Burden of proof.

It is familiar law that a party alleging fraud should be required to prove it; the burden of proof is with the affirmative. Hickman v. Trout, 88 Va. 478; Heaton v. Shanklin, 14 West. Rep. 327, 115 Ind. 596; White v. Trotter, 14 Smedes & M. 30, 53 Am. 13 L. R. A.

Pickels v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 119 Ind. 291; Continental Ins. Co. v. Pierce, 89 Kan. 396.

The only possible reasons urged by the defendant, that he may escape the payment of the note, is that the agent misstated his occupation in the application.

If it was true, that an untruthful statement misrepresenting Reed's occupation was intentionally inserted in the application by Vanderburg, the policy was not thereby rendered void.

Peoria F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Hall, 12 Mich. 213; Aetna L. S. F. & T. Ins. Co. v. Olmstead, 21 Mich. 253; North American F. Ins. Co. v. Throop, 22 Mich. 159; Michigan State Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 30 Mich. 41; Security Ins. Co. v. Fay, 22 Mich. 467; Kitchen v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 57 Mich. 137.

When the agent fills up the application, knowing or having been properly informed by the applicant, of the facts demanded by the questions therein, mistakes in the application,

Dec. 112; Satterwhite v. Hicks, Busb. L. 105, 57 Am. Dec. 577; Matthews v. Crockett, 82 Va. 394; Mitchell v. Deeds, 49 Ill. 416; Stewart v. Severance, 43 Mo. 322; Hempstead v. Johnston, 18 Ark. 123, 65 Am. Dec. 458; Jones v. Degge, 84 Va. 685; Wallace v. Mattice, 118 Ind. 59; Crawford v. Harlow, 10 West. Rep. 73, 92 Mo. 498; Bostwick v. Benjamin, 63 Mich. 239, 15 West. Rep. 923.

It may be further observed that slight proof is necessary to establish proof of fraudulent intent between parties who occupy confidential relations. Fisher v. Herron, 22 Neb. 183; Long v. Milford, 17 Ohio St. 484, 35 Am. Dec. 638; Fisher v. Bishop, 10 Cent. Rep. 707, 106 N. Y. 25.

Fraudulent intent is rarely a matter of proof by direct and positive evidence. To require conclusive testimony in cases of fraud would result in a practical frustration of justice and render all attempts as to its disclosure abortive. The law is satisfied therefore with a reasonable degree of certainty, and this position is abundantly sustained by the adjudged cases. Southern L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 53 Ga. 535; Conant v. Jackson, 16 Vt. 335; O'Donnell v. Segar, 25 Mich. 367; Stanfield v. Stultz, 93 Ind. 249; Strong v. Hines, 35 Miss. 201; Brower v. Goodyer, 88 Ind. 572; Parrott v. Parrott, 1 Helsk. 681; Mussey v. Young, 73 Mo. 260; Graham v. Roder, 5 Tex. 141; Smalley v. Hale, 37 Mo. 102; Burch v. Smith, 15 Tex. 219; Thompson v. Shannon, 9 Tex. 536.

Liberality in admission of evidence.

In all investigations of questions involved in fraud the courts extend an exceptional liberality to the admission of evidence (Zerbe v. Miller, 16 Pa. 488; Hopkins v. Slevert, 58 Mo. 201; Stauffer v. Young, 59 Pa. 455); and a broad interpretation is to be afforded to all the rules of relevancy. Smalley v. Hale, 37 Mo. 102; Rice, Evidence in Civil Cases, 953.

If desirable to summarize the legal conclusions on this subject, it will be entirely accurate to state that parol evidence is always competent to establish the fraudulent omission or insertion of any material averment in the recitals of a contract, and such evidence is also admissible whenever the obligation has been contracted in fraudem legis. The contractual form of the repudiative matter is of no consequence. Waddell v. Glasell, 13 Ala. 561; Bottomley v. United States, 1 Story, 185; Hunter v. Blyeu, 30 Ill. 228; Townsend v. Cowles, 31 Ala. 428; Lunday v. Thomas, 23 Ga. 538; Pierce v. Wilson, 34 Ala. 596; Hamilton v. Conyers, 28 Ga. 278; Stannard v. McCarty, Morris (Iowa) 124; Bartle v. Vosbury, 3 Grant, Cas. 277.

as to such facts are the mistakes of the Company, and do not avoid the policy.

Meckler v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 38 Wis. 665.

No misrepresentations can be predicated of a fact of which the insurers were fully cognizant.

Mullewille v. Adams, 19 Fed. Rep. 891; Russell v. Detroit Mut. L. Ins. Co. 80 Mich. 407; Crouse v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 79 Mich. 249; O'Brien v. Home Ben. Soc. 117 N. Y. 810; Schreiber v. German American H. Ins. Co. 43 Minn. 367; Deitz v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 81 W. Va. 851.

Although the policy contains a condition, providing that if any of the statements specified in the written application are untrue "this policy shall be null and void," and the false material statements were made by the applicant, yet those conditions do not render the policy absolutely void, but voidable only, at the election of the company which may waive the breach of the condition.

Huntley v. Perry, 38 Barb. 509; Schreiber v. German American H. Ins. Co. supra; Helme v. Philadelphia L. Ins. Co. 61 Pa. 107, 100 Am. Dec. 621; Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Keyser, 83 N. H. 813.

The statement with reference to the occupation of Reed, if it was incorrect, was immaterial. A representation is material when its truth or falsity would probably and naturally have induced the insurer either to enter into the contract or refuse to do so.

Barbeau v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 67 N. Y. 595.

It is not the previous or present business of the applicant, but his future calling, that affects the risk; so it certainly could have been no fraud upon Reed, whatsoever his occupation was therein stated to be, for by accepting the policy with a true copy of his written application annexed to the same, printed in plain English, he was thereby told most plainly, forcibly and emphatically what his rights and obligations were.

See Aetna L. S. F. & T. Ins. Co. v. Olmstead, 21 Mich. 252; Van Buren v. St. Joseph Co. Village Fire Ins. Co. 28 Mich. 399.

It must be presumed that he read the application and was cognizant of the limitations therein expressed.

New York L. Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. ed. 984; Cleaver v. Traders Ins. Co. 8 West. Rep. 815, 65 Mich. 527; McIntyre v. Michigan State Ins. Co. 52 Mich. 188.

Therefore Reed was fully informed as to what business he was, by the terms of the policy, precluded from engaging in "without first obtaining the written consent of the Company."

If false representations are made regarding matters of fact and the means of knowledge are at hand and equally available to both parties, and the party, instead of resorting to them, sees fit to trust himself in the hands of one whose interest is to mislead him, the law will leave him where he has been placed by his own imprudent confidence.

Slaughter v. Gerson, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 379, 20 L. ed. 627; Rockafellow v. Baker, 41 Pa. 319; Hobbs v. Parker, 81 Me. 143; Brown v. Leach, 107 Mass. 364.

Redress has often been refused to a party who claimed to have been induced by fraud to sign a contract or other paper whose contents were misread or misrepresented to him.

Cooley, Torts, 488, citing Maine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Hodgkins, 66 Me. 109; New Albany & S. R. Co. v. Fields, 10 Ind. 187; Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558; Taylor v. Atchison, 54 Ill. 196; Elliott v. Levings, 54 Ill. 218.

There must be a false representation; the complaining party must have believed it to be true, and relied upon it and have been deceived thereby.

Masterton v. Beers, 1 Sweeney, 406; Byard v. Holmes, 34 N. J. L. 296.

There is no evidence that Reed confided in the truthfulness of Vanderburg's answer on returning the policy, "It is all fixed now." There is no evidence that the application was misread or in any way misrepresented to him. Evidence of fraud should be very clear.

Messrs. Watts & Smith for appellee.

McGrath, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is assumpsit, brought in justice court, upon a note given by defendant for a portion of the second semi-annual premium on a policy of insurance issued by plaintiff upon the life of defendant. Defendant, with his plea, gave notice that the signature to the note was obtained by fraud, and that the note was without consideration. Defendant was a switchman in the employ of the Lake Shore Road, at Adrian. One Vanderburg, an agent of plaintiff, who resided at Adrian, and had known defendant for some time, solicited the insurance, took the application, delivered the policy, and took some cash and three notes for the first year's premium. The policy was dated November 28, 1888. Two of the notes were paid, and defendant refused to pay the third, which matured about September 1, 1889. The application was filled out by Vanderburg and presented to defendant for signature. Defendant insisted that Vanderburg had been acquainted with him for years, knew all about his occupation, and filled out the application largely from his (Vanderburg's) knowledge of the facts; that no questions were asked as to occupation, and defendant did not read the application before signing it, but relied upon Vanderburg; that defendant was a switchman engaged at the yard, and was upon and about trains as they were being made up; that the policy, with a copy of the application attached, was delivered to him in January, 1889; that some days afterwards, in examining the policy and copy of the application, he discovered that his occupation was given as "assistant yard-master, does no switching, don't go near trains;" that thereupon he called Vanderburg's attention to this misstatement, and told him that he was not a yard-master; that he did switching and did go near trains; that thereupon Vanderburg took the policy for the purpose of sending it to the Company for the purpose of correction; that afterwards Vanderburg returned the policy to defendant, saying that the change had been made, and that it was all right; that, supposing that the application had been changed to conform to the facts, defendant did not examine it for some time, but when he did finally examine it, he found that it read "assistant yardmaster, don't couple cars or do switching;" that upon this discovery defendant saw Vanderburg, accused him of again misrepresenting defendant, and told him that he (defendant) was not protected by the policy, and tendered it back to Vanderburg; that Vanderburg claimed that he had no right to receive it; that several conversations were had with Vanderburg, who finally advised him to send it back to the Company, which he did on or about September 26, 1889. The application contained the usual printed clause declaring "that the above is a fair and true answer to the foregoing questions, and I hereby agree that these statements, with this declaration, shall form the basis of the contract for assurance, and that any untrue or fraudulent answers . . . shall violate the policy and forfeit all payments made thereon." The policy provides in terms that "no agent has power to change the terms of this contract," and contains the further provision that "the person whose life is hereby insured shall not engage in blasting, . . . or be regularly employed . . . as a mariner, engineer, fireman, conductor, laborer, in any capacity . . . upon railroad trains."

The plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "(1) You are directed to find a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of principal and interest of note in issue. (2) Even should you find that the agent, Vanderburg, wrote wrongfully the answers in the application for insurance by Reed, which untruthful answers were known to him, Reed, or not, this fact would not relieve the plaintiff from the obligation fixed in the policy; and, in case he should have died during any of the time prior to the time fixed for the payment of the note, plaintiff would be obliged to pay the wife of insured $1,000, and hence defendant is liable on his note. (3) There is no evidence before you that you can consider that will warrant you to find a verdict for the defendant." The court refused these requests, and instructed the jury as follows: "You are instructed, as a matter of law, that if Mr. Reed, in answering the question as to what his occupation was, said to Mr. Vanderburg that he was engaged in the yard there as a switchman, making up trains, and doing general work about the yards there in connection with trains, and Mr. Vanderburg put in his application, which was the foundation for the issuing of the policy, the statement that he did not go near the cars or do switching, then, I think, gentlemen of the jury, that that would be such a misstatement or fraud practiced upon the insured here as that he would be entitled to have these proceedings rescinded; that is, the policy and notes set aside and held for naught, from the time at least when such rescission should take place upon his part. . . . You will take all these circumstances into consideration; and if he did know it, but afterwards acted on the policy as if it was in force, and he was bound by it, and the Company was bound by it, then he could not assert the defense which he is seeking to assert here; or if the agent, Mr. Vanderburg, put into this application the language as used by the defendant in stating what his occupation was, as he claims that he did, why then, of course, Mr. Reed would not have the right to assert that by way of defense to this note, because, if there was any fraud then, it would be the fraud of the defendant, and not the fraud of the Company or its agent." The jury brought in a verdict of no cause of action.

We think the court was correct, both in the refusal to give the plaintiff's requests and in the instructions given. The application here contained absolutely no restriction upon the powers of the agent. The applications are usually filed in in the handwriting of the agent, as was done in this case; and agents are nowhere in the blank prohibited from filling in the application. Indeed, on the face of the printed blank, the very first sentence is as follows: "This blank must be filled by the agent;" and again, in a blank left at the head of a printed blank, is the following: "Agents will note here anything specially regarding the policy applied for, and to whom and where it is to be sent." Although these appear in what might be termed the "caption" to the application, and not in the body of the application, yet to a person not familiar with these blanks it would be misleading if it is intended that the application is to be filled out by the applicant. Again, in the body of the application is the following: "N. B. Agents will be particular to see that all questions in the application are fully answered, particularly whether the age and date of birth agree." Again, in the general printed declaration in the application is the following: "It is hereby agreed that the policy shall not be in force unless the premium is actually paid to the Company or its authorized agents." At the bottom of the application are the following printed words: "Approved and recommended by (S. W. Vanderburg, agent;" the name of S. W. Vanderburg being written in in this case. At the head of the filing blank, upon the back of the application, occurs the following: "Agents will not fill up this filing." Vanderburg received the premium in notes and cash for the Company, and must be considered the duly authorized agent of the Company. Had the blank been presented to and read over by the insured before it was filled in, there is nothing contained in it which did not warrant his acting with the agent, just as he claims he did. The application was attached to the policy, and delivered to defendant. The policy contains this provision: "No agent has power to change the terms of the contract;" and also the following: "For the information of the assured, and in order that any unintentional errors or omissions which hereafter may be found to exist may be corrected, a copy of the application upon which this policy is based is hereto attached." It must be conceded that the representation in the policy as to the occupation of the insured is untrue, and, if made by the defendant, it would be a good defense to an action upon the policy. The court instructed the jury that, if made by the defendant, it would be no defense to the action upon the note. The jury found that it was not the act of the insured, but of the agent of plaintiff. It has been repeatedly held that, when an application is reduced to writing by an agent of the insured, upon oral statements of the applicant, the conversation between the agent and the applicant at the time of putting it in writing is admissible as bearing on the question of the actual contents of the paper, or the representations of the insured; and that, when it appears that the insured fairly and correctly informed the agent as to any fact, and the agent unskillfully, carelessly, or fraudulently misrepresented the insured as to that fact, such unskillfulness, carelessness, or fraud is the unskillfulness, carelessness, or fraud of the company, and is no defense to an action on the policy. Michigan State Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 80 Mich. 42; North American F. Ins. Co. v. Throop, 22 Mich. 146; Crouse v. Hartford Ins. Co. 79 Mich. 249, and cases cited.

In Attna L. S. F. & T. Ins. Co. v. Olmstead, 21 Mich. 251, Justice Cooley says: "The agent of the insurance company assumes to have all the requisite knowledge for preparing the proper papers, and volunteered to make them out. He had all the necessary information for that purpose, and nothing was concealed from him. If the application is not in due form, and if it fails to give all the information called for, it must be either because the agent was too ignorant of his business to be properly intrusted with the agency; or because he was so negligent or reckless that he did not trouble himself to draft them correctly; or, lastly, because he was disposed to take Olmstead's money on fraudulent pretense of giving him indemnity when he knew he was giving none whatever. The general rule, undoubtedly, is that, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, a party must be conclusively presumed to understand the force of his contracts, and to be bound by their terms. But it cannot be tolerated that one party shall draft the contract for the other, and receive the consideration, and then repudiate his obligation on the ground that he had induced the other party to sign an untrue representation, which was, by the very terms of the contract, to render it void. . . . The forms and requirements of the different insurers are different, and when an agent, who at the time and place is the sole representative of the principal, assumes to know what information the principal requires, and, after being furnished with all the facts, drafts a paper which he declares satisfactory, induces the other party to sign it, receives and retains the premium moneys, and then delivers a contract which the other party is led to believe, and has a right to believe, gives him the indemnity for which he paid his money, we do not think the insurer can be heard in repudiation of the indemnity on the ground of his agent's unskillfulness, carelessness, or fraud. If this can be done, it is easy to see that the community is at the mercy of these insurance agents, who will have little difficulty, in a large proportion of the cases, in giving a worthless policy for the money they receive."

In the present case, upon the discovery of the fraud, defendant had the right to rescind the contract. He was not bound to subject the beneficiary named in the policy to a lawsuit after his death, to determine the validity of the policy, especially as in that event his testimony would be wanting. Again, it is not claimed here that the Company had actual notice of the facts as to defendant's occupation, but that they had constructive notice only: but it must be remembered that a copy of the application was attached to the policy, and delivered to the defendant, in which case, under the express provisions contained in the policy relating to the correction of "unintentional errors or omissions" in the application, it was defendant's duty to call attention to this misrepresentation, otherwise the defendant might have been chargeable with a fraud upon the Company; for while the Company would not be able to avoid a policy by reason of the rule of law that its agent's wrong was the Company's own wrong, of which it could not take advantage, it would be otherwise had the insured conspired with the agent, or had the insured been fully informed as to the representation made, and the contents of the application, and neglected to bring it to the attention of the Company.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs of both courts to defendant.

The other Justices concurred.

1. Definite plans and specifications must accompany an advertisement for bids for building a public bridge, under a constititutional provision requiring bridge contracts to be given to the lowest bidder; and a statute permitting the commissioners to advertise at the same time for plans, specifications and bids and to adopt one of the offered plans with its specifications and accept the accompanying bid is unconstitutional.

2. The Act of March 18, 1879, forbidding contracts in behalf of a county

NOTE.—In awarding public contracts statutory requirements must be observed.

Where, by the recitals of a municipal charter, its officials are prohibited from contracting for the purpose of furnishing materials and supplies in its behalf, except upon compliance with certain specified rules, the municipality is relieved from liability upon a contract made by a municipal officer in violation of the charter requirement, and the contractor furnishing the city with such materials and supplies is without remedy as against the municipality. *McDonald v. It is fundamental that those seeking to deal with a municipal corporation through its officials must take great care to learn the nature and extent of their power and authority. Hodges v. Buffalo, 2 Denio, 110; Donovan v. New York, 33 N. Y. 233; Cornell v. Guilford, 1 Denio, 510; Lowell F. C. Sav. Bank v. Winchester, 8 Allen, 100.

In contracting, the board must pursue the course pointed out by the Statute, and cannot legally contract in any other way. This course is clearly pointed out. The board must first adopt plans and specifications of the work required to be done so for which there is no unexpended appropriation, applies to bridges, and does not unlawfully interfere with the jurisdiction over bridges vested by the Constitution in the county court.

3. An appropriation for preliminary work, estimates, etc., towards securing a public bridge does not authorize a contract on behalf of the county to have such bridge built.

4. In the absence of an adequate remedy at law an injunction will lie at the suit of a taxpayer to restrain the making of an unauthorized contract on behalf of a county for the construction of a bridge.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Chancery Court for Pulaski County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin the making of a contract for the construction of a bridge. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. M. Moore and W. S. McCain, for appellant:

The appropriation of $8,000 made by the county court, was for preliminary purposes, and did not authorize a contract for the construction of the bridge.

In People v. Buffalo County Comrs., 4 Neb. 150, where the law required the contract to be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest bidder, no plans or specifications were submitted by the commissioners on which bids could be based. Contractors were directed to furnish their own plans and specifications, and submit them under seal with their bids. It was held that without plans and specifications there could be no competitive bidding, and the contract was pronounced invalid. To the same effect, see *Boren v. Hemingway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal presents for determination three questions: First. When a board of commissioners for building a bridge across a stream more than 400 feet wide have advertised for and received bids with competitive plans and specifications, can it adopt a plan and specification thus received, and accept the accompanying bid? Second. Can such board make a contract for building a bridge before any appropriation therefor has been made, or when there is an unexpended appropriation "for preliminary work, estimates, etc., towards securing such bridge?" Third. If such board is about to make such a contract, will a court of equity, at the suit of a taxpayer of the county, interfere by injunction?

1. If the first question could be determined by the provisions of the Act of February 19, 1891, our response would be that the board was authorized to adopt a plan and specification submitted in response to such notice, and to accept the accompanying bid. But it is insisted for the appellant that this Act is unconstitutional, because it contravenes section 16, art. 19, of the Constitution of the State, which is in the following words: "All contracts for erecting or repairing public buildings or bridges in any county, or for materials therefor, or for providing for the care and keeping of paupers, where there are no almshouses, shall be given to the lowest responsible bidder under such regulations as may be provided by law." The point made is that the Act does not admit of competitive bidding in awarding contracts, but provides a plan by which the lowest bidder cannot be known, or the giving of contracts confined to such bidders. The constitutional provision was designed to secure economy in the line of public improvements to which it relates. Extravagance therein might arise either from the inattention or incompetency of the contracting officer, and his consequent failure to obtain favorable offers for contracts; or it might arise from the corruption or favoritism of such officer, and his consequent refusal to accept favorable offers when made. To prevent extravagance from the first source, the plan of public letting is adopted, the public are informed of contracts to be let, and its self-interest and rivalry are appealed to for proper offers upon them; to prevent extravagance from the latter source, all discretion is withheld from the contracting officer; he is bound to give the contract to the lowest bidder, and cannot let it out for individual gain or as a reward to another. The method prescribed is well understood, clearly defined, and of distinctive character, specially adapting it to a conservation of public interests. It embodies three vital principles,—an offering to the public, an opportunity for competition, and a basis for an exact comparison of bids; and any statutory regulation of the matter which excludes or ignores either principle destroys the distinctive character of the system, and thwarts the purpose of its adoption. Any arrangement which excludes competition prevents a letting to the lowest bidder. And it does not matter that such an arrangement maintains the form of public letting; if it excludes the essential principle of competition, there can be no real public letting. This is recognized as so essential that in some cases, where all the forms were preserved, but the contracts to be let were according to plans protected by a patent and the subject of a monopoly, it was held that such contracts could not be made because the monopoly prevented competition. 1; Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 487, and cases cited.

When a contract to build a bridge is to be let, there are two kinds of competition that may arise: first, that between persons desiring to build different kinds of bridges; and, second, that between those desiring to build the same kind. And as was said by Judge Christianity, in discussing a provision similar to that under consideration, the bidding which it contemplates is of the latter kind,—bidding for the same particular thing, to be done according to the same specifications. For, says he, no bids for different kinds of work, and referring to different specifications, could be recognized as coming in competition with each other for the purpose of determining the lowest bid within the requirement of this section, without opening the door to the same corrupt combinations, and furnishing facilities for the same fraudulent practices, which it was the purpose of this provision to prevent. Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 26 Mich. 263.

As the competition contemplated is that between those desiring to do the same particular thing according to the same specifications, it is obviously essential that an opportunity should be given all persons to enter into competition for the specific thing which is the subject of the letting; and such opportunity cannot be afforded, unless the specific thing to be let has been determined upon and made known.

The Constitution contains no express provisions with regard to plans and specifications, but the requirement of an award to the lowest bidder implies the further requirement that such information shall be put within the reach of bidders (as will enable them to understand the offering and bid intelligently, and enable the representatives of the county to know who is the lowest bidder. Detroit v. Hosmer, 79 Mich. 384.

There can be no intelligent bidding for a contract unless all bidders may know what the contract is; and this cannot be known unless the plan of the work to be contracted for, and the specifications according to which it is to be done, have been adopted; for they, with the price to be agreed upon, go to make up the contract.

In the case of Boren v. Darke County Comrs., 21 Ohio St. 311, the Supreme Court of Ohio held, under a Statute embodying the provisions of our Constitution, that a bid could not be entertained which contemplated work or material not included in the plans and specifications according to which the contract was offered. This ruling was placed upon two grounds: first, that it could not be known who was the lowest bidder; and, second, that the contract thus bid for had not been submitted to competition.

In the case of People v. Buffalo County Comrs., 4 Neb. 150, the Supreme Court of Nebraska, considering the question upon a similar provision, ruled that, from the necessity of the case, plans and specifications must be adopted in advance of the offering as a basis upon which bids are to be made, and that where county commissioners advertised for plans and specifications with accompanying bids, they could not adopt plans and specifications and accept a bid thus received, because no opportunity had been given for competitive bidding, and no basis had been fixed on which to make bids.

In the case of Bigler v. New York, 5 Abb. N. C. 51, an action was brought upon a contract with the city to recover the price of lumber furnished; and the recovery was resisted on the ground that the contract was invalid because it had not been let to the lowest bidder. The advertisement was for bids to furnish nine different kinds of timber during the term of one year, specifying each kind of timber, but not specifying the quality of either or the aggregate. The court said, in regard to the proposal for bids: "We find in this contract that there were no plans and specifications as required by the provisions of the Dock Law; that the contract was general in every particular: that there was no way in which there could be competitive bidding, for the reason that we find no amount of timber is specified. Certain qualities of timber are specified, but there are no quantities—no amount of any kind—specified, so that there could be a comparison of bids. If the contract system is to prevail, it is necessary the contract should be in such a form that there shall be what is called 'competitive bidding.'" Illustrating the opportunities afforded for favoritism and fraud where contracts are offered upon indefinite plans and specifications, the court, continuing, says: "He [the favored bidder] puts a high price upon that of which they want a good deal, and a very low price upon that of which they want very little; and another man bids conscientiously, supposing they want an equal quantity of each character, and puts reasonable prices to each class of lumber, and he averages his prices accordingly. How are you going to compare those bids? If you foot up so many pieces at so much per thousand, you will find that the one will be lower than the other; when it comes to be filled, the first will be found to be infinitely higher than the other,—a fact which would be known to the officers of the department, in consequence of their knowing how the work will be carried on, and what proportion of timber of the various kinds would be furnished." The court concludes that without specifications as to quality and quantity of the various things to be furnished there could be neither competitive bidding nor comparison of bids. Id. p. 70.

An Act of the New York Assembly provided that every bidder for canal work should accompany his bid with a bond conditioned that, if the contract should be awarded him, he would within ten days enter into a contract for the performance of the work, upon the terms prescribed by the contracting board. The supreme court held that the terms of such contracts should be prescribed by the board before the bidding, and could not be afterwards. People v. Contracting Board, 38 Barb. 510.

The charter of the City of St. Paul provided that contracts for paving the streets should be let to the lowest bidder upon notice of the time and place of letting. A notice called for proposals for two contracts for paving different parts of a street. A bid was offered, and accepted, for paving the entire street under one contract. In a suit upon the contract made in pursuance thereof, the Supreme Court of Minnesota said: "No bids were asked for such a contract as that made with the plaintiff, and, the contract let not being the same that was advertised, the acts of the city or ward officers in making it were void, and created no liability on part of the defendant." Nash v. St. Paul, 11 Minn. 174 (Gil. 110). We are constrained to believe that the rule announced in that case is the rule fixed by our Constitution, and that the contracts made must be the same as those advertised for letting. When it is determined to build a bridge within a given time, and the location, plans, and specifications have been adopted, all the terms of the contract are fixed except the price to be paid; the obligation to build a bridge according to the terms thus fixed is the thing to be offered to competition; and until it is formulated by the defining of those terms so that they, in connection with the bid to be thereafter accepted, will comprise a complete contract, there is nothing to be let, and nothing to which competition can be directed. It is idle to talk of competition where the minds of bidders are not directed to the thing offered. When the subject of competition is undefined and uncertain, and left to be moulded by the various competitors, it will assume as many forms as they have conceptions, and each will bid upon the thing of his own creation,—a thing upon which no other can bid. But the absence of competition is not the only difficulty; for when all bids are upon different things, or the same thing differently fashioned, there is no basis on which to compare them, or by which it can be determined with certainty which is the lowest bid, and such determination must rest in the discretion of the contracting board. But since the Constitution was designed to withhold all discretion in such matters, and thereby remove all opportunities for fraud or favoritism, any system which devolves such discretion is in violation of its provisions. It demands, in the letting of contracts, a basis upon which bids can be compared with mathematical precision, and which leaves nothing to official discretion after the bids are received; and no Act which provides regulations for letting without this basis can stand. If different plans and specifications were adopted, and bids invited at the same time for contracts according to each, whether the board could compare the bids upon different plans submitted, and accept the lowest bid upon the plan then selected,—is a question not raised or considered. See Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 26 Mich. 263. We only decide that no contracting officer or tribunal has any authority to make a contract for building a bridge unless the same contract, in every material respect, had been submitted to public bidding, and that this requires that it should be submitted with reference to definite plans and specifications. Such being the meaning and effect of the constitutional provision, is the Act of the Legislature void in so far as it provides that the board of commissioners shall advertise at the same time for plans, specifications, and bids, and afterwards adopt plans and specifications and accept a bid thus obtained? Upon an examination of the Statutes, it will be seen that, when the Act under consideration was passed, the laws in relation to bridges as well as county buildings authorized the advertisement of proposals only after the adoption of plans and specifications; a simultaneous advertisement for all was first brought into the Statute by the Act under consideration. See Mansf. Dig. §§ 499, 1098. This Act preserves the form of a public letting; but for what, or upon what basis, are bids invited? The commissioners are not required to advertise for bids upon a basis fixed by them, but each bidder is invited to define a basis for his own bid. It is plain that no two bids will be made upon the same basis, unless by accident, and that there can be no competition among bidders; and, when the bids are received, there is no standard by which to measure them, and therefore no means by which it can be absolutely known which is the lowest. In this respect, we think, the effect of the Act would be to nullify the Constitution, and it cannot be sustained.

Construing the complaint according to the established rules of construction in this State, we think it is sufficiently alleged that the board of commissioners advertised for bids on a contract, the terms of which had not been defined by the adoption of plans and specifications, and that, as the thing to be let was not defined, bidders could not compete with each other in the letting. According to those allegations, which are admitted to be true by demurrer, there was nothing to submit to the competition of bidders, no letting to the lowest bidder was possible, and the steps taken would not authorize the county court to make a contract, or order one to be made, and its action in that regard would be without jurisdiction and void.

We have not overlooked the allegation that the board had adopted what it denominated "general specifications;" but it appears from the advertisement of the board, which is exhibited with the complaint, that the board invited proposals and competitive plans and specifications at the same time, stating that all plans must comply with the general specifications furnished by the county. It thus appears that the specifications adopted were general, and not definite. "General specifications" were not sufficient, but it was essential that such definite and detailed specifications accompany the offering as would disclose the thing to be undertaken with circumstantial fullness and precision. The building of a bridge according to "general specifications" might be carried forward with such variety of detail and circumstances as to affect very materially its proper cost; and every bidder should know, not only the general plan, but every particular of detail and circumstance which could affect the cost of the work or the advantage of the contract. This is necessary, not only to active and intelligent competition among bidders, but also to a certain and proper comparison of bids. An advertisement for bids for building a bridge 500 feet long, 30 feet wide, and of a stated capacity of burden, would contain "general specifications,"—if the words are not so contradictory as to make the term meaningless,—if, in response to this notice, bids with definite plans and specifications were returned. A. might offer to build a pontoon bridge at one price, B. a suspension bridge at another price, and C. a bridge on piers at another, and each bid might "comply with the general specifications;" yet there could have been no competition among bidders, and there would be no basis by which to determine with safety who was the lowest bidder. This supposes an extreme case; but the same conditions must arise, modified only in degree, wherever the plans and specifications adopted are so general as to admit of any substantial variety of detail in their absence. As there is nothing else in the Act of 1891 inhibited by the Constitution, its remaining provisions may stand, and must be held to be the law. Cooley, Const. Lim. §§ 210, 211; State v. Marsh, 37 Ark. 356.

2. Upon the second question stated, the appellant relies on a section of the Act of March 18, 1879 (Mansf. Dig. § 1451), which is as follows: "No county court or agent of any county shall hereafter make any contract on behalf of the county unless an appropriation has been previously made therefor, and is wholly or in part unexpended." It is contended that this Act has no application to contracts for bridges. According to its terms, it applies to any and all contracts that can be made by the county court or an agent of the county; and it is a part of the Act which provides for levying taxes and appropriating revenues for building bridges. We think its language and connection both imply that it was intended to regulate such contracts. It was urged in the argument that the Constitution conferred the jurisdiction of bridges on the county court, and that, if this Act was intended to apply to contracts for bridges, it would be void as interfering with the constitutional jurisdiction of that court. We hardly think that much reliance was placed on this ground, and a little consideration discloses its weakness. If the Act is void for this reason in its application to contracts for bridges, it is void in all respects, for the jurisdiction of the county court is co-extensive with the matters to which such contracts could relate. But the Constitution does not confer on the county court unlimited power in regard to bridges; it only vests in that court the exclusive jurisdiction to administer the law on that subject, and so long as this is permitted there is no room for complaint. Moreover, the clause which prescribes that such contracts shall be given to the lowest bidder provides that they shall be made under such regulations as may be provided by law (Const. § 16, art. 19); and the validity of a statutory regulation similar to, but more restrictive than, the one under consideration was affirmed by this court in the case of Lawrence County v. Coffman, 86 Ark. 641. We think the Act applicable in making contracts for bridges, and, further, that a contract to build a bridge is not authorized by an appropriation for "preliminary work, estimates, etc., towards securing such bridge." It is the policy of the Act to require the concurring judgment of the levying court, and of the county judge, that a bridge should be built before a contract for building it can be made. When the levying court makes an appropriation to pay for one, that signifies its favorable judgment, and the county judge may afterwards signify his by letting the contract. But we do not think the appropriation relied on signifies the favorable judgment of the levying court. It is more reasonable to conclude that it was made with a view to reaching a decision than as the announcement of one reached. Under the Statute then in force, an examination of sites, and a procurement of plans and specifications, were preliminaries to making a contract, and they were no doubt intended in the designation of the appropriation. Soundings and surveys would be necessary to determine whether it would be practicable to build at any desirable location, and plans and specifications would be needed in estimating the probable cost of the work. We think, from the designation of the appropriation, that it was intended to defray the cost of obtaining that information, and it might lead to an appropriation for building the bridge, or to a determination to abandon it. While we think a contract cannot be made before there has been an appropriation for it, we do not think that, when an appropriation has been made, the contract will be limited to the amount appropriated. When the levying court appropriates any sum for the work, that signifies their judgment that the work should be done, and the county judge may then proceed to contract for it without further consulting them; the only limitation upon his power being found in other directions.

3. The ground of complaint in this case was not that the contract would be inexpedient or unjust, or that it would involve an extravagant outlay, but that it was about to be made without authority. So made, it would be void, and could not properly create a charge upon the taxable property of the county. If the contract should be made, and the bridge built, its cost would either be paid by taxation, or the contractor would sustain a heavy loss. Such a contingency would necessarily occasion injurious embarrassment, confusion, and contention to the county, the taxpayers, and the contractor, which would have been avoided by suit before the complications arose. We cannot say that the appellants could have obtained adequate relief by certiorari; for the want of jurisdiction arises from matter dehors the record. The remedy by appeal is inadequate; for the law does not give the taxpayer his day in court, or provide that he may appeal without it. Since the remedy at law is not adequate and complete, we are of opinion that injunction is the proper remedy. Worthen v. Roots, 34 Ark. 356; High, Inj. § 1251, and cases cited.

If the views herein expressed are correct, it follows that the chancellor erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and for further proceedings.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for York County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Horace Keesey and V. K. Keesey, for appellant:

The devising clause, "also, I direct that my beloved wife Anna shall have and hold the property in Bottstown, where I now reside," gives a fee, and the next clause does not mean to lessen or restrict the estate previously devised, but rather was placed there to show she was given the sole control during her lifetime. It is rather difficult to conceive how a testator could evince an intention to give greater powers than are by this will granted to his widow. See Roberts v. Unger, 2 Pearson, 241.

To doubt is to solve the question and make a fee.

It is never to be presumed that a testator intends to die intestate of any portion of his estate, and where he states, in an introductory clause, that he intends to dispose of his estate, that intention is stated and nothing less than a clear omission makes an intestacy of any part of the estate.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We agree with the court below that this is a close case. Its solution must mainly depend upon the proper construction of the will of Michael B. Shaffer, deceased. The testator, after expressing his desire "to settle my worldly affairs," thus disposes of the real estate in controversy: "Also, I direct that my beloved wife, Anna, shall have and hold the property in Bottstown where I now reside, said Anna to have the sole control of the same during her lifetime, and at the discretion of my beloved wife, Anna, she shall order my executor to sell the real estate at public sale, or at private sale, all my real estate to the best advantage of my wife. And I hereby empower my executor to make deeds of conveyances for the same as fully as I could have done in my lifetime, and the money realized from the sale of my real estate, my executor shall pay over to my beloved wife, Anna, and she, the said Anna, shall have power to dispose of the same by bequeath, or as she directs. . . . Also I direct that my wife, Anna, shall have and hold all my personal property for her own."

The learned judge below held that the widow of the testator took but a life estate in the land, with a power to compel a sale thereof, and to appoint the proceeds; and that the testator intended to die intestate in case his widow failed to exercise these powers.

From the case stated it appears that the widow never did exercise these powers; the real estate in controversy remained unsold at the time of her death. This contest is between the heir-at-law of the testator and the executor of his wife. The court below entered judgment upon the case stated in favor of the heir-at-law.

A careful consideration of the case leads us to a different conclusion. The testator evidently intended to dispose of his entire estate. He was childless; his wife was the sole object of his bounty; there is no other person named or referred to in the will. The first sentence of the will, in the paragraph above quoted, carried the fee. He says his wife "shall have and hold the property in Bottstown where I now reside," while this language in a deed would not carry the fee it is otherwise in a will. Having thus given the fee, what was there to cut it down to a life estate? Admittedly nothing except the next sentence, in which the testator says: "Said Anna, to have the sole control of the same during her lifetime," etc. But this was mere surplusage. After giving a fee it cannot be cut down to a life estate by the unnecessary provision that she should have the control of it during her life. The testator may have thought that in some way which he did not understand, his executor might interfere with his widow's enjoyment of the property, and the clause in question may have been inserted to prevent this. In either view of the case the language is without legal effect, and might well have been omitted. He then orders the executor to sell the property whenever the widow shall direct, and then follows this significant sentence: "And the moneys realized from the sale of my real estate, my executor shall pay over to my beloved wife, Anna, and she, the said Anna, shall have the power to dispose of the same by bequeath or as she directs." The learned judge below construed this as merely a power of appointment of the proceeds of the sale. Whereas it is an absolute gift of the money, and the superadded power of appointment is the merest surplusage. It detracts nothing from a fee for a testator to say that his devisee shall have the sole control of the property during her lifetime, and an absolute gift of money is not qualified by a superfluous authority to bequeath it.

We have here a childless testator who gives the sole interest in the land to his wife. We think the case comes within the 9th section of the Act of April 8, 1833, which declares: "All devises of real estate shall pass the whole estate of the testator in the premises devised, although there be no words of inheritance or of perpetuity, unless it appears by a devise over, or by words of limitation or otherwise in the will, that the testator intended to devise a less estate."

The will of Michael Shaffer contains no devise over, nor do we find any express limitation of the estate to his wife for life only. I have not discussed the authorities. It is sufficient to refer to Morris v. Phaler, 1 Watts, 389; Musselman's Estate, 39 Pa. 469; Second Reform Presby. Church v. Diabrow, 52 Pa. 219; Grove's Estate, 58 Pa. 429.

The judgment is reversed, and judgment is now entered in favor of the defendant in the case stated.

Jane E. WENGERD'S APPEAL.

The respective legacies vest at the death of the testator under a will converting the estate into money and directing the distribution of one third of it in equal shares among the children of testator's son, and in case of the death of any child before the payment to him of his share, such share to be divided between the survivors, and no share is devested by the death of a legatee before actually receiving it.

APPPEAL by Jane E. Wengerd from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Cumberland County disallowing her claim upon the estate of John Wengerd, Sr., deceased, for a legacy given by Wengerd to claimant's husband and by him willed to her. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. J. E. Barnitz and F. E. Belts-hoover, for appellant:

The law always and justly favors the first taker as the first object of the testator's bounty and will not permit any other intent to prevail unless it cannot be avoided.

King v. Frick, 135 Pa. 575; Mickley's App. 92 Pa. 514; Green's Estate, 140 Pa. 253; Gill's Estate, 45 Phila. Leg. Int. 237; Little's App. 9 Cent. Rep. 809, 117 Pa. 14; Muller's Estate, 19 W. N. C. 320.

It has been uniformly held in this State from Corbin v. Wilson, 2 Ashm. 178, through all the cases where the question has ever been considered down to the present, that "a bequest of personal property relates to the time of the testator's death, unless a contrary intent is clearly indicated in the will."

See Coggin's App. 124 Pa. 10; 3 Jarman. Wills, p. 672; Rammell v. Gillo, 15 L. J. N. S. Ch. 35; Hutcheon v. Mannington, 1 Ves. Jr. 362; Martin v. Martin, L. R. 2 Eq. Cas. 403; Minors v. Battison, L. R. 1 App. Cas. 428; Girdlestone v. Creed, 10 Hare, 487.

The rights of the legatee could not be defeated by the accidental circumstances of the case.

Law v. Thompson, 4 Russ. 92.

Mr. J. W. Wetzel for appellee.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contention in this case arises over the following clause in the will of John Wengerd, deceased:

"I direct my executors, hereinafter named, to sell at public or private sale, my house and lot on the east side of Penn Street, known as the pastorage; and for the purpose of enabling them to do so, I hereby authorize them to make, execute, acknowledge and deliver the necessary deed or deeds to grant and convey the same to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, and the proceeds of the said sale, together with the proceeds of all bonds, notes and cash on hand, with the proceeds of my personal property, I direct my said executors, after paying the legacy hereinbefore mentioned, my just debts and funeral expenses, and the expenses of administration, to divide into three equal shares, which I hereby bequeath as follows: viz.: to Mary Gettle one third; to Elizabeth Kozer one third; and to John Wengerd, Harry Wengerd and Catharine Wengerd, children of my son David Wengerd, deceased, the remaining one third to be equally divided, between them share and share alike, and in case of the death of any of the children of my son David, before the payment to them of their said share, then to be divided between the survivors."

John Wengerd, one of the grandsons above named of the testator, died about eleven months after the death of the latter. He had received $200 of his share before his death. He left a will in which he made his widow, Jane E. Wengerd, the appellant, his sole legatee and executrix. She now claims, under her husband's will, the balance due him under the will of his grandfather. The court below rejected her claim, hence this appeal.

The question is, When did the legacy to John Wengerd vest, if it vested at all? And if it vested at the death of the testator, was it devested by the accident of John's death before the full and final distribution of his grandfather's estate? That the executors regarded his interest as vested, is clear from the fact that they paid him $200 on account of it. And it is equally clear, had the distribution been made, as it might well have been, prior to John's death, he would have been entitled to the share. The testator had no debts; with the exception of a house and lot, his estate not otherwise disposed of consisted of cash securities and money which could readily have been distributed almost immediately after his death. The account was not filed until two years after the testator died, and then in obedience to a citation. We do not think the executors can defeat the rights of a legatee by delaying distribution.

In considering the nice question whether a legacy is vested or contingent regard must always be had to the position of the parties. In construing a will where the bequest is ambiguous the inclinations of the courts are always towards vesting the legacies. Coggin's App. 124 Pa. 10. The presumption that a legacy was intended to be vested applies with far greater force where a testator is making provision for a child or a grandchild, than where the gift is to a stranger, or to a collateral relative, as in Haverstick's App. 13 L. R. A.

103 Pa. 394. It would be straining a point to hold that this testator intended that his grandchild should be deprived of his share, though he should die leaving a child or children, by the mere accident of his death the day before the money was distributed. This would enable an executor, under some circumstances, absolutely to defeat the will of his testator, by withholding or refusing distribution for a certain period. We cannot assume that this testator intended to lodge such a power in the hands of the executor of his will.

The doctrine of this State from the time of Corbin v. Wilson, 2 Ashm. 178, has uniformly been that a bequest of personal property relates to the time of the testator's death, unless a contrary intent is clearly indicated in the will. "If any immediate legacy is given without specifying a time for payment, and is given over in case the legatee dies before it becomes payable, the word 'payable' can only have reference to the death of the testator." Jarman, Wills, 809; and the same learned author says in vol. 3 of the same work, p. 612: "Executory gifts over in the event of legatees dying before receiving their legacies have given rise to much litigation. Actual receipt may be delayed by so many different causes that the court is unwilling to impute to the testator an intention to make that a condition of the legacy, and thus indefinitely postpone the absolute vesting of it."

In Rammell v. Gillose, 15 L. J. N. S. Ch. 35, where the will directed that the fund should go in equal shares to testator's children when they should attain twenty-one years of age, but in the event of the decease of any of said children before they should have received or become possessors of their share, said share was to go to their children, it was held that those who had attained the age of twenty-one took vested interests even though they died before receiving the money. In Hutcheon v. Mannington, 1 Ves. Jr. 362, there was a gift over, if the legatee should die before he may have received it, and Lord Thurlow said: "I am to compute what time would be sufficient to enable these parties to receive their legacies. It is all too uncertain. Suppose we have given real estate in the manner you specify; it is clear that it will neither depend on the caprice of the trustee to sell, for that would be contrary to all common sense, nor upon his dilatoriness; in some way it may be sold immediately; but I should not inquire when a real estate might have been sold with all possible diligence, for it might be the very next day, or that very evening, and therefore the court always in such a case considers it as sold the moment the testator is dead; for where there is a trust, there is always considered here as done which is ordered to be done, and the court cannot measure the time."

In this case it is an immeasurable purpose. I can do nothing with it, and it must be considered as vested from the death of the testator." Martin v. Martin, L. R. 2 Eq. Cas. 408; Minors v. Battison, L. R. 1 App. Cas. 428, and many other English cases, hold the same doctrine. The only case cited in opposition to this line of authority is Haverstick's App., supra, which, while it gives color to the appellee's contention, differs in some respects from the case in hand. There the appellant claimed as the heir of his deceased wife. The clause in the will was: "Should any of them die before the distribution of my estate, without heirs, then the part allotted to such shall be divided equally among the others named." The court held that the words "heirs" meant "children," and that the appellant was not entitled as heir to the legacy. The whole contention was over this point.

The decree is reversed at the costs of the appellee, and it is ordered that the record be remitted with instructions to make distribution in accordance with this opinion.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA & SANTA FÉ R.
CO., Plff. in Err.,

v.
Samuel A. TEMPLE.

(.....Kan.....)

A contract between a railroad company and a shipper of stock stipulated

*Head note by GREEN, C.

NOTE.—Contracts of carrier may provide for reasonable exemptions.

In the United States, a condition commonly inserted by common carriers in their contracts relates to the time and manner of presenting claims for damages; and the courts have been liberal in sustaining such regulations. Lawson, Carriers, 144.

The carrier is bound to perform the service upon being paid therefor, and it is a dangerous policy to allow it to exonerate itself, even from its full liability at common law, by an artifice, to the injury of those who are, in the ordinary course of business, compelled to employ its services. Fillebrown v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 55 Me. 462, and cases cited; Blossom v. Dodd, 43 N. Y. 264; Southern Exp. Co. v. Moon, 39 Miss. 822; Orndorff v. Adams Exp. Co. 3 Bush, 194; Jones v. Voorhees, 10 Ohio, 145.

And in a case where one of the conditions of a telegraph company, printed in their blank forms, was that the company would not be liable for damages in any case where the claim was not presented in writing within sixty days after sending the message, it was ruled that the condition was binding on an employer of the company who sent his message on the printed form. Wolf v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 62 Pa. 83.

The condition printed in the form was considered a reasonable one, and it was held that the employer must make claim according to the condition before he could maintain an action. Exactly the same doctrine was asserted in Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 Jones & S. 390.

Early adjudications, notably that of Gould v. Hill, 2 Hill, 623, and Jones v. Voorhees, supra, were in contravention of the established English rule, and held that a common carrier could not limit his liability by recitals in the contract of carriage which would absolve him from the results of negligence, however gross. This doctrine, however, must be regarded as having been expressly repudiated. Dorr v. New Jersey S. Nav. Co. 4 Sandf. 136, 8 N. Y. Legal Obs. 345, 11 N. Y. 485; Parsons v. Monteath, 13 Barb. 353; Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Chase, 1 E. D. Smith, 115; Peek v. North Staffordshire R. Co. 10 H. L. Cas. 473, 494; Austin v. Manchester, S. & L. R. Co. 11 Eng. L. & Eq. 506; Carr v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. 7 Exch. 707, 14 Eng. L. & Eq. 340.

The weight of modern adjudication favors the proposition that as between the carrier and consignor an express contract is valid which by its terms and stipulations limits the responsibility of 13 L. R. A.

that, as a condition precedent to his right to recover damages for any loss or injury to such stock, he should give notice in writing to some officer of the railroad company, or its nearest station agent, before the removal of such stock from the place of delivery. In an action to recover damages for injuries to such stock while en route, where the condition of the stock was made known to the station agent of the railroad company at the place of destination, and such the carrier. Camden & A. R. Co. v. Baldauf, 16 Pa. 67; Falkenau v. Fargo, 55 N. Y. 642; Walker v. York & N. M. R. Co. 3 Car. & K. 279; Slim v. Great Northern R. Co. 26 Eng. L. & Eq. 297, 14 C. B. 647; Kimball v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 26 Vt. 256; Wallace v. Matthews, 39 Ga. 617; Reno v. Hogan, 12 B. Mon. 63; Roberts v. Riley, 15 La. Ann. 103; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Weiner, 49 Miss. 725.

Restrictions upon the right to limit liability.

It is a well-recognized principle, however, that these exemptions from liability must include such only as are just and equitable in contemplation of law. Peek v. North Staffordshire R. Co. 10 H. L. Cas. 473, 498; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, 10 Am. Rep. 366.

And it is a rule of extended application that the carrier cannot, by special contractual form, so abridge his liability as to relieve him virtually from any responsibility, even from his own gross carelessness or that of his employé. So tenaciously have the courts enforced this principle that it may well be regarded at the present time as forming an exception to an otherwise universal rule, which permits a reasonable limitation from liability. The cases supporting the averment, and which refuse to limit the liability for negligence and carelessness, are as follows: Camden & A. R. Co. v. Baldauf, 16 Pa. 67; Goldrey v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 30 Pa. 242; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Pa. 315; Farnham v. Camden & A. R. Co. 55 Pa. 63; Laing v. Colder, 8 Pa. 479; Empire Transp. Co. v. Wamsutta Oil Co. 63 Pa. 14, 3 Am. Green, C., filed the following opinion:

This was an action for damages, commenced in the District Court of Finney County by Samuel A. Temple, against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company. The plaintiff alleged that on the 21st day of March, 1887, he shipped over the defendant's railroad from Kansas City to Pierceville, Kan., a bay mare and three mules; that a written contract for the transportation of the stock was made, a copy of which was attached to his petition; that the Railroad Company broke the contract by negligently and violently striking the car in which the stock was being transported against another car, and thus throwing the animals together upon the floor of the car, and injuring them; resulting in the death of the mare and the crippling of the mules; that the condition of the stock was made known to the agent of the Railroad Company at Pierceville while they were in the car at the station; that the agents inspected the stock, and consented and requested that the mare and mules be removed from the car, and, after such removal, and before they had been intermingled with other stock, inspected the injured animals; that before bringing suit, and after the death of the mare, written notice was given to the defendant, through its agent, of the plaintiff's claim for damages. The contract of shipping contained the following condition: "And for the consideration before mentioned said party of the second part further agrees that as a condition precedent to his right to recover any damages for loss or injury to said stock he will give notice in writing of his claim therefor to some officer of said party of the first part, or its nearest station agent, before said stock is removed from place of destination above mentioned, or from the place of delivery of the same to said party of the second part, and before said stock is mingled with other stock." The defendant filed a general denial, and for a further defense alleged that the plaintiff had not complied with the condition precedent in the contract for transportation requiring written notice of the claim for damages. The defendant filed a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, which was overruled. No evidence was introduced upon the part of the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $345. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment was rendered on the verdict. The plaintiff in error brings the record here for review, and the principal assignment of error is that there was not such a substantial compliance with the condition precedent, as to a written notice of a claim for damages, under the contract, as to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

Complaint is made that the court refused certain instructions asked for by the defendant in error, to the effect that, if the plaintiff did not give a written notice of his claim for damages to some officer of the railroad company, or its nearest station agent, before the stock was removed from the place of destination or place of delivery, and before they were mingled with other stock, then their verdict should be for the defendant. Further, that if they should find from the evidence that the plaintiff did not serve upon the defendant a written demand for damages for injury or loss of the mare in question until April 7, 1887, after the death of the mare, and her removal from the place of destination or delivery, or after the animals had mingled with other stock, then their verdict should be for the defendant. We think the instructions requested were properly refused. Upon this branch of the case the court instructed the jury as follows: "You are instructed that the Railroad Company has a right to limit their responsibilities to the owners in the carrying of stock or goods by a special contract, so long as the limitation does not affect their liability on account of negligence or misconduct. Plaintiff further alleges that the animals were removed from the car in which the injury was sustained by the advice and with the knowledge and the consent of the employes of the defendant prior to the time that written notice was given of any claim of damage because of said injuries. Should you find from the testimony that the animals were so removed, and that the mare died from the injuries so received, and that the mules were injured so as to be depreciated in value, and that the death of the mare and the injuries to the mules were caused by the carelessness and negligence of the agents and servants of the defendant Company, and that the Company had a good, fair, and reasonable opportunity to examine and inspect all of such stock, and to know of its condition after it was removed without unreasonable inconvenience, you will then find that the service of the notice of application for damages was made in due time, and that the Company is not absolved from liability because of the fact that the written notice introduced in the testimony was not served upon the station agent or other employé of the Company named in said contract prior to the removal of the stock from the car at the place of destination. The purpose of such notice is that the Company may have a fair and reasonable opportunity of examination and inspection of the condition of the live-stock transported under its management before it shall be placed beyond its reach or beyond the possibility of certain identification."

The court stated the law correctly. The plaintiff in error seems to rely upon the cases of Goggin v. Kansas Pac. R. Co., 12 Kan. 416, and Sprague v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 34 Kan. 352. In the former case no written notice was given for more than a year after the cattle were injured, and in the latter case no notice was given before suit was commenced. In the case before us written notice was given within a few days after the stock arrived at Pierceville, and before the mules were taken from the place of destination. While the carrier may stipulate by contract that notice of a claim for damages shall be given within a specified time in order to be valid, still the construction upon such stipulations must be reasonable, and adapted to the circumstances of each case. 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 15. This court said, in the case of Goggin v. Kansas Pac. R. Co., supra: "Of course it is not understood that by the phrase 'before or at the time the stock is unloaded,' it must be the identical moment, but so immediately that the object sought by the notice can be attained. Nor would such a notice be reasonable in the case of an ordinary shipper who did not accompany and superintend his stock, nor would it probably prevent a recovery for injuries sustained which could not readily be seen, and actually should not be discovered till the time for giving the notice had expired." Rice v. Kansas Pac. R. Co. 63 Mo. 814. Oxley v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 65 Mo. 629.

It is claimed that the court erred in permitting a witness for the plaintiff to testify to a conversation had with some employé of the Railroad Company at Argentine, where it seems the stock was injured. In this conversation the employé told him how the accident had occurred; that there had been a jam, and the stock had been injured. The evidence may not have been competent, but we fail to see how the Railroad Company was prejudiced. It was established that the car and stock were in good condition at Kansas City. When next seen at Argentine the mare and mules were injured, and the car damaged. There was no controversy about there having been an accident, and the statement of the employé of the Railroad Company was immaterial error. We need not notice the other errors, as they are of the same nature.

It is recommended that the judgment of the District Court be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

v.

WILSON.

(.....Tenn.....)

The duty to keep a "person upon the locomotive always upon the lookout ahead" imposed upon every railroad company by Mill. & V. Code, § 1298, in default of which it is by section 1299 made responsible for all damages from accident or collision, is absolute and renders the company liable for all accidents happening while it is running a train with the locomotive at the rear, whether it has a lookout upon the front car or not.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shelby County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's failure to comply with statutory requirements as to lookouts. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. G. Weatherford for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John H. Watkins for defendant in error.

Snodgrass, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error recovered judgment against the Little Rock & Memphis Railroad Company for $1,500, damages for injuries sustained while drunk and asleep on its track in Fulton Street, Memphis, Tenn. The accident occurred at a point about thirty yards north of Market Street, during the night of October 10, 1889, and while the employes of the Company were, by means of an engine in the rear of a train of nine cars, pushing the train into the Company's yard south of Market Street. The front car of this train ran over Wilson, causing the loss of one arm and partial loss of the other. By consent of parties, a jury was waived, and the case tried by Hon. W. D. Beard, sitting as special judge in place of Judge Estes, who was incompetent. His finding of law and facts and judgment thereon were reduced to writing, and so given on demand of parties. They are, in substance and effect, that the Railroad Company was guilty of negligence, which proximately caused the injury, in failing to keep a lookout at some place on the front car of the train, or on the ground, either in front of the car, or on the side and so near the road that he could command a view of the road-bed in front of the moving train; that a lookout so placed could have discovered Wilson in time to have prevented the accident, notwithstanding Wilson's negligence in being there, and so the Company was responsible for failure to take this precaution, which he held evidenced a lack of reasonable care and prudence. The plaintiff's negligence was considered in mitigation of damages, and recovery only to amount stated was allowed. The Railroad Company appealed, and assigned errors.

It is not necessary to state them in detail, because the determination of one question settles them all, so far as they relate to the judgments on the verdicts. But there is a preliminary one proper to be noticed. It is that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the second plea, because the declaration showed the accident within the limits of the City of Memphis and therefore the Statute to prevent accidents on railroads (Mill. & V. Code, § 1298) does not apply. This is an erroneous assumption. We have held in a case at this term the contrary of this proposition. We repeat the holding here, but content ourselves by a reference to that case, without repetition of its assignment. Katzenburger v. Lano (Tenn.) ante, 185.

The material question, as indicated, as determining all others involved in the assignment of errors, is whether the Statute applies to a train in which the engine is in the rear; the argument upon this being that the Statute provides that the lookout shall be upon the locomotive ahead, and only contemplates the placing of a lookout ahead when the locomotive is leading, instead of following, the train; and this appears to have been the view of the circuit judge, because he did not predicate the liability of the defendant upon the failure to observe the statutory precautions, but upon the due observance of common-law duty to exercise reasonable care and prudence.

There is, of course, a manifest difference in the situation, as respects the view taken of the law to be applied. If the Railroad Company was liable for failure to observe statutory precautions at all, the burden of proof is on it to show that it did observe them (Code, § 1300), and, if it fails to show this, it is liable (§ 1299), notwithstanding the negligence of the injured party, which can only go in mitigation. If, however, it was not a case in which the statutory precautions were required to be observed because of the situation or order of arrangement of the train, then defendant's negligence would have to be shown, and plaintiff's might be considered in bar of the action, as at common law,—about the only difference which our Statute occasions,—for we have repeatedly held that its precautions suggested were only those indicated by the wisdom and prudent requirement of the common law, in cases where the Statute is now applicable. In those cases, however, where it is not applicable, the onus of proof remains as it was, and the effect of contributory negligence continues the same as it was at common law. But it is obvious, as has been often held, that, if the court applied the right rule of law, it is immaterial upon what consideration it was done. If, then, in fact, the Statute applied, the ruling of the circuit judge was right, to the effect that the plaintiff's negligence did not bar the action, and we must therefore determine that question.

The argument that the Statute does not apply, because the engine was in the rear of the train instead of in front, and that consequently a lookout ahead on the locomotive is dispensed with, proceeds upon the erroneous assumption that, if the Railroad Company, for convenience or otherwise, takes the engine from the front end of the train, and uses it in the rear, or at some other place in the train, a lookout is dispensed with in front. This is manifest when we look to the object of the Statute. It contemplates an engine in front, with perfect head-light, a bell to be rung, and machinery for blowing the whistle, reversing the engine, and taking the precautions indicated in the special and general terms of the Statutes, including, of course, a place for the lookout to be and an engineer, fireman, and some other person always there as a lookout. Now, in case the engine had been in front, and its head-light or machinery for alarm or stopping taken away from it, or the lookout taken off of it, it would not be denied that the Company was liable; but because the Company had taken not one, but all, of these things away, the argument is that it escapes statutory liability. Thus stated, it seems perfectly manifest that the proposition is erroneous. Putting it in other words, it is that, although the Railroad Company could not take away any one of these and avoid liability, it could take them all away, and do so. That the whole includes all of its parts is a proposition not more axiomatic than that all the parts are necessary to make up the whole. If, therefore, observance of the Statute as a whole consists in keeping an engineer, fireman, or other person upon the locomotive, always upon the lookout ahead, in order that objects appearing on the track may be discovered, and the other precautions taken for which the Statute provides, it follows that all these things are necessary to be severally done, in order that the whole requirement be complied with. The lookout must be kept ahead, on the locomotive, and the locomotive must, of course, be kept there for him to be upon, or he cannot be upon it, and kept in the place required. The keeping of the locomotive there is therefore one of the parts of the observance, like all others absolutely essential to constitute the whole observance. And the same is true as to other things not specifically mentioned as included within the purpose of the Statute, and which, by construction, have been held essential; as a head-light for night use on running trains. So of those things mentioned in the Statute, and properly belonging to the engine, and parts of its machinery, as the whistle and bell. These must be ahead or in front of the train, because it is not contemplated that collisions will occur in the rear; nor would the Statute be met by having a light and a lookout in front, while the engine is in the rear. The Statute intends, not a lookout as a formal matter, but a lookout on the locomotive in front, and the machinery and appliances on it at hand and in immediate control, so that, as soon as an object appears, the observance of it, and the attempts to avoid collision, may be prompt and immediate; for in the majority of cases they must be so, if they serve any purpose. To have a lookout, with a lantern in front, watching in a dim light for an obstruction, which could only be seen a few yards off, and then signaling an engineer in the rear, to ring a bell or blow a whistle far away from the object, and take such precaution as could be then and there done to avoid an accident, would be practically to provide for accidents instead of against them. The man with the lantern could see, at best, but a short distance. The engineer must take some little time to observe his signal. Then, when he does so, if he rings the bell or causes the whistle to be sounded, he is at a greater distance from the object, and these alarms may not, therefore, be so well heard or understood or apprehended. In this case the engine was 270 feet from the front of the train. The Statute, in making the engineer or fireman or some other person on the locomotive represent a lookout, manifestly contemplates looking, alarming, and acting as practically contemporaneous. It is no more contemplated that the engine, therefore, would be in the rear, than that the lookout should. Both must be in front, if the Statute is complied with.

It may be argued that this is inconvenient; that a railroad company must sometimes back its trains on its tracks. This may be entirely true, but it proves nothing. The Company can do all its running that way, if it prefers. The Statute does not prohibit it absolutely and at all events. The Statute merely makes it liable for any injury inflicted while doing so. If for reasons of convenience or economy, the company prefers to take the risk, it may do so; but it cannot complain that it suffers the legal consequences of the risk thus taken. Of course, it can reduce the risk to a minimum, by keeping someone in front of the train, and warning off or actually removing obstructions. If it prevents injury, it prevents loss; but this it must do if it avoids the consequence of disregarding the Statute. Nothing else will answer. In the present case the Company elected to attempt the running of the train in a street without observing the statutory precautions, but in the observance of others which it deemed sufficient. These, however, proved insufficient, and plaintiff's injury was the result of that election and this judgment. His recovery was the legal consequence. It was made small by properly considering his contributory negligence, and there is nothing, in its amount or otherwise, of which the defendant can complain.

Let the judgment be affirmed, with costs.

John Fearn, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

WEST JERSEY FERRY CO.

1. A deposition taken in an action by deponent's wife, to which he was made a formal party, brought to recover damages for personal injuries to her, alleged to have resulted from a carrier's negligence, is not admissible in an action against the same defendant, prosecuted by the wife as administratrix of deponent to recover damages for injuries to him, alleged to have been received at the same time and place and through the same cause as those sued for in the first action.

2. The mere existence, during the storm which caused it, of snow on the deck of NOTE.—"Deposition" defined.

"Deposition" is a generic expression, embracing all written evidence verified by oath, and thus includes "affidavits;" but, in legal language, a deposition is evidence given by a witness under interrogatories, oral or written, and usually written down by an official person; while an affidavit is the mere voluntary act of the party making the oath, and is generally taken without the cognizance of him against whom it is to be used. Yet the terms may be convertible, as in the rules of law of the 13 L. R. A.

supreme court. Stimpeon v. Brooks, 8 Blatchf. 456, 457; Anderson, Law Dict. title, Deposition.

When rejected as evidence.

Depositions, except to perpetuate testimony, cannot be read unless taken in reference to an issue made up at the time they were taken. Morrow v. Hatfield, 6 Humph. 108. See, contra, Blackburn v. Morton, 18 Ark. 384.

Where a deposition was taken in another case, and there was a stipulation that it should be used a ferry-boat raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the ferry company which will establish its liability to respond in damages to a passenger who receives injuries by falling on the slippery deck.

3. Where the cause of the accident by which a passenger was injured is known as well to the passenger as to the carrier, the presumption of negligence which arises from the mere fact of the injury of a passenger while on the carrier's vehicle has no application, but the passenger must affirmatively show negligence.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank P. Prichard and J. Davis Duffield, for appellant:

The deposition of John Fearn was taken in a case in which he was a party, and read in evidence, and the parties are technically and in fact the same, and for the same cause of action; and it is certainly a "question" in "issue" and was admissible.

Act of March 28, 1814, § 1; Purd. Dig. 729, pl. 94; Act of May 23, 1887, § 9, Pub. Laws, 161.

At common law, it is generally deemed sufficient for the admissibility of depositions taken in one suit and offered in another that the matters in issue were the same in both causes, and the parties against whom the deposition was offered had full power to cross-examine the witness. Complete materiality, or identity of all the parties, is not necessary.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 558; Haupt v. Henninger, 87 Pa. 188. See Kohler v. Henry, 4 Phila. 81; Hobart v. McCoy, 3 Pa. 419; Galbraith v. Zimmermann, 100 Pa. 874; Fulton v. Sellers, 4 Brewst. 42.

Statutes providing for the perpetuation of evidence are in furtherance of justice and a clear administration of the law, and should receive a liberal construction.

Pratt v. Patterson, 81 Pa. 114.

If a deposition be evidence for any purpose, as against a general objection it is admissible.

Baldorf v. Farmers Nat. Bank, 61 Pa. 179; Peters v. Horbach, 4 Pa. 184.

Under the term "parties" are comprehended all persons standing in relation of privies in blood, privies in estate, and privies in law.

Jackson v. Lawson, 15 Johns. 544.

A privy is a person so connected with another in an estate, a right or liability as to be affected as he is affected.

Anderson, Law Dict. title Privy.

Evidently a man and wife joining in a former suit to her use under the Act (not in her right) are both privies "in estate" and "in law;" and the husband is besides actually a party and liable for costs.

See 1 Greenl. Ev. § 558; Magill v. Kauffman, 4 Serg. & R. 316; Clark v. Sanderson, 3 Binn. 192; Kohler v. Henry, supra; Ottlinger v. Ottlinger, 17 Serg. & R. 142; Cooper v. Smith, 8 Watts, 536.

The requirement in actions of ejectment that titles should be the same in one action as those litigated in the other, in order that the deposition on the trial, "with the same force and effect, and subject to the same exceptions and objections in all respects, as if taken in this case," the court held the effect of the stipulation was to place the deposition upon the same footing as if it had been taken in the action, and said that a party who appears at the time of a deposition, and examines the witness without objecting to his competency, cannot afterwards interpose the objection. Brooks v. Crosby, 22 Cal. 50.

When depositions were read on a former trial by consent, it was held that upon a second trial ordered on appeal, the consent not being limited, plaintiff was entitled to read them. Vattier v. Hinde, 22 U. S. 7 Pet. 252, 8 L. ed. 675, affirming 1 McLean, 110; Edmondson v. Barrell, 2 Cranch. C. C. 228, 232.

A deposition taken in another and different cause is not competent evidence against one not a party to the suit in which it was taken, to prove any fact, except it may be proper for the purpose of showing notice of the pendency of the proceeding in which it was used. Cookson v. Richardson, 60 Ill. 187.

The deposition of a plaintiff, taken in the lifetime of a deceased party, cannot be read after the death of that party when the suit is against the administrator of the deceased (Beaty v. McCorkle, 11 Heisk. 568); and it is error to permit the reading, over objection, of the deposition of one who was a party to the suit in his own right, and also as administrator of a deceased party, where the deponent's testimony was in regard to statements and transactions with his intestate. Taylor v. Mayhew, 11 Heisk. 596; Weeks, Depositions, § 474.

Depositions taken in a former case between the same parties cannot be read in a case pending, 18 L. R. A.

unless some peculiar reasons exist making their introduction necessary, as that the witnesses cannot themselves be called. O'Harra v. Hunt, 19 Ohio, 460.

Both the state and federal courts are substantially unanimous in holding that a deposition taken in a former suit is incompetent as evidence in a subsequent trial against one not a party to the first proceeding, and who was denied the legal right to file cross-interrogatories at the time of its issuance, or to cross-examine a hostile witness when on the stand. Rutherford v. Geddes, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 220, 18 L. ed. 343; Tappan v. Beardale, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 427, 19 L. ed. 974.

A party is one who appears on the record as a plaintiff or defendant. Woods v. De Figaniera, 16 Abb. Pr. 1, 1 Robt. 607, 25 How. Pr. 522.

Code provisions on the subject.

The California Code provisions allow depositions once taken to be read in evidence, as the language of the following section (2084) indicates: "When a deposition has once been taken it may be read by either party in any stage of the same action or proceeding, or in any other action between the same parties, upon the same subject, and is then deemed the evidence of the party reading it. Depositions taken in another court between the same parties and in regard to the same subject matter may be read in evidence upon parol proof of the existence of such former action." Ayers v. Chisum (N. M.), 1 West. Coast Rep. 520.

So the deposition is admissible, notwithstanding the complaint has been amended subsequent to the taking thereof, provided the subject matter remains the same. Anthony v. Savage, 3 Utah, 277. See also N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 870 et seq.

tion be admissible, is founded upon a very good reason.

Sample v. Coulson, 9 Watts & S. 68.

No such reason exists in actions for negligence.

Norris v. Monen, 3 Watts, 465; Hoeker v. Jamison, 2 Watts & S. 488; Wright v. Cumpsty, 41 Pa. 102; Bath v. Bathersea, 5 Mod. 10; Goodrich v. Hanson, 33 Ill. 498.

Depositions taken in a former suit between the same parties, involving the same question or subject matter, are admissible when the question arises again for judicial determination.

Wads v. King, 19 Ill. 801; Harger v. Thomas, 44 Pa. 180; Melen v. Andrews, 1 Mood. & M. 336; State v. Johnson, 12 Nev. 121; O'Brian v. Com. 6 Bush, 571; *Com. v. Nowhere is "matter in question," or "subject matter," construed as meaning "cause of action," although the latter is included in the former as the less in the greater; and of course where the cause of action is the same, at common law even, "what a witness swore to on a former trial may be given in evidence in case of his death."

Miles v. O'Hara, 4 Binn. 111; Lightner v. Wike, 4 Serg. & R. 208; Chess v. Chess, 17 Serg. & R. 410.

It is generally deemed sufficient if the matters in issue are the same in both cases, and the party against whom the deposition was offered had full power to cross-examine the witness.

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 164, 553; Starkie, Ev. 10th ed. p. 61; Mathews v. Colburn, 1 Strobb. L. 258; Pyke v. Crouch, 1 Ld. Raym. 730; Buller, Nisi Prius, 7th ed. 232a; *Williams v. The touchstone of admissibility of depositions is the power or right to cross-examine on that "question" in the issue (fact or facts), identical in both cases.

This is the case of a passenger against a carrier, who has undertaken to carry him safely, and is bound to use such precautions as "human care and foresight" can suggest for his safety [Sir James Mansfield in Christie v. Griggs, 2 Campb. 79], and provide such appliances as will contribute to and promote his safety.

In the case of an injury to a passenger there is a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Fuller, 3 Pennyp. 176; Sullivan v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 30 Pa. 234.

An injury upon a railroad while the passenger injured was in the exercise of ordinary care is prima facie evidence of the company's liability.

New Jersey R. & T. Co. v. Pollard, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 341, 22 L. ed. 877; Pawling v. Hopkins, 132 Pa. 617.

Frequently householders, after sweeping off the snow on their pavements, put ashes on the ice found underneath. This is an exhibition of ordinary care or precaution, and shows the common-sense judgment of the community as to what ordinary or reasonable care is when there is ice or snow on the pavement, and there is no reason why it should not be law as to carriers. If the ice caused the plaintiff to fall, it is proper for the jury to consider whether, under all the circumstances proven, it was allowed to remain an unreasonable length of time.

Carrier must provide cars or vehicles adequate, that is, sufficiently secure as to strength and other requirements; and for the slightest fault or negligence, in that regard, the carrier is liable.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 L. ed. 141.

Messrs. A. H. Wintersteen and George Tucker Bispham, for appellee:

In order for notes of prior testimony to be admissible in a subsequent proceeding three conditions must co-exist: (1) an opportunity to cross-examine in the earlier suit; (2) the same parties in interest in both suits; (3) the issues in the two suits must involve the same subject matter.

Haupt v. Henninger, 37 Pa. 138, 140; Harger v. Thomas, 44 Pa. 128, 130; Miles v. O'Hara, 4 Binn. 108, 111; Norris v. Monen, 3 Watts, 465; Sample v. Coulson, 9 Watts & S. 62; 1 Wharton, Ev. § 177.

The appellant seeks to avail herself of the rule of a presumption of negligence in case of accident to a passenger. But where the cause of the accident is known, the plaintiff must always show a duty of the defendant to the plaintiff violated before any presumption of negligence whatever arises.

Harley v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 182 Pa. 58; Hayman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 10 Cent. Rep. 835, 118 Pa. 508.

The only negligence that can exist in these cases is in allowing the snow and ice to accumulate and remain an unreasonable time in a dangerous condition.

McCollum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions which confront us in this case are, first, whether the deposition of John Fearn was admissible, and second, whether there was error in the refusal to take off the nonsuit. The deposition was taken in a suit in the circuit court of the United States in which Mary Ann Fearn was the plaintiff and the West Jersey Ferry Company was the defendant. In that action the plaintiff claimed damages for personal injuries caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant Company. In this case the administratrix of John Fearn claims that he received an injury through the negligence of the same Company, which caused his death. It is contended by the appellant that the injuries for which these suits were brought were received at the same time and place, and were attributable to the same cause, to wit: the neglect of the defendant Company to keep its boat in a reasonably safe condition for the ingress and egress of its passengers. Assuming that the claim of the appellant is correct, it does not follow that a deposition taken in one action is admissible as evidence in the other. The actions are not between the same parties, although we have the same defendant in each. The fact that the plaintiff in the first action was the wife of the plaintiff in this action, or that she is now his widow and administratrix, can make no difference in the rule which allows testimony taken in one action to be given in evidence on the trial of another which involves the same subject matter and is between the same parties or their privies. The joinder of the husband in the former suit was merely formal, and it did not give him control of, or an interest in, it. It was the wife's claim that was litigated, the judgment was obtained in her right, and it was exclusively hers. Identity of subject matter in whole or in part, and identity of parties in interest, must unite to render a deposition in one case admissible in another. This is the doctrine of our cases, of the Act of 1814, and of the Act of 1887, which contains the last legislative deliverance on this subject. Haupt v. Henninger, 37 Pa. 138; Harger v. Thomas, 44 Pa. 128; Act of March 28, 1814 (Purd. Dig. 10th ed. 625); Act of May 23, 1887 (Pub. Laws, 158).

The appellant's offer was not within this rule and the deposition was properly rejected.

In considering the question raised by the second specification of error it must be borne in mind that there is no evidence in the case which suggests any defect in the construction of the boat, and that the sole complaint is that its deck was slippery. This condition and its cause are adequately described in the appellant's testimony. It appears that it commenced snowing about the time Fearn left the Pennsylvania Station for the ferry and that it was snowing when he entered the boat. As a result of the brief storm, then in progress, the deck was covered with a thin coating of snow, and in crossing it to reach the cabin he slipped and fell. Nearly five years after this occurrence, alleging that he was injured by his fall and that it was caused by the negligence of the defendant Company, he brought this action. After his death his administratrix was substituted as plaintiff and on the trial the evidence of his widow and son was relied on to sustain the charge of negligence. This developed the situation at the time of the accident, the commencement and progress of the snow storm and the condition of the boat as affected by it, substantially as we have stated. Assuming, as the appellant contends, that the cause of the accident was the slippery condition of the deck, it is obvious that this condition was produced by the snow falling upon it. It is not pretended that it was the duty or within the power of the Company to prevent the snow falling on the deck of its boat, but it is claimed that its obligation to its passengers required it to immediately remove the snow and restore the condition which existed before the storm. It is well known that rain or snow falling upon the sidewalks of a town or city, the steps and platforms of railway cars, and the decks of ferry-boats will render them slippery and consequently more difficult to walk upon. But it is not practicable to absolutely prevent this condition while the rain or snow is falling, and the mere existence of it during the storm which causes it raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the municipality, the railway or ferry company. In our case it commenced snowing but a few minutes before the accident and was snowing at the time of it. There was no accumulation of ice or snow on the deck formed or left there from a prior rain or snow fall. There was not a spark of evidence from which an inference could be drawn that there was any ice on the deck where Fearn crossed it. Where the snow was displaced by his fall the deck had a slippery appearance caused by the moisture from the snow upon it. It is shown by the testimony and the photographs produced by the appellant on the trial that it was the same appearance presented by the decks of ferry-boats of like construction, in a rain storm, or when wet from any cause. It was therefore incumbent upon the appellant to prove an omission or violation of a duty which the company owed to him. The cause of the accident was known as well to the appellant as to the Company. In such case the presumption of negligence arising from the mere fact that a passenger was injured while on the appellant's boat has no application. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Napheys, 90 Pa. 185; Hayman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 118 Pa. 508, 10 Cent. Rep. 835. and Farley v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 132 Pa. 58. As the appellant failed to show any omission or violation of duty by the Company in connection with the cause of the accident, we think the nonsuit was properly ordered. We find nothing in Neslie v. Second & Third Streets Pass. R. Co., 113 Pa. 300, 4 Cent. Rep. 699, which is in conflict with this conclusion. In that case there was ice on the step of the car, caused by a storm the day before, and the ice "had been suffered to remain on the step from the previous day," and it was held that, "whether it remained there for such time and in such form as to establish the negligence of the defendant" was a question for the jury. Here there was only a slippery condition of the deck caused by a storm in progress when the accident occurred.

Judgment affirmed.

Levi CURTIS et al., Appts.

2 Cases.

1. To hold the owners of an insolvent bank individually liable as partners

NOTE.—Banking a legitimate object of co-partnership.

The objects of a co-partnership may embrace all kinds of legitimate and lawful enterprise. Chester v. Dickerson, 54 N. Y. 1, 45 How⁹ Pr. 323, 13 Am. Rep. 550.

And it need not be confined to dealings in personal property, but may embrace operations in real estate. Ludlow v. Cooper, 4 Ohio St. 1; Buffum v. Buffum, 49 Me. 108; Cowles v. Garrett, 30 Ala. 341.

But the business must be a lawful one, and not contemplate a fraud or a violation of law or a moral duty. Bartle v. Nutt, 20 U. S. 4 Pet. 184, 7 L. ed. 825; Gordon v. Howden, 12 Clark & F. 237.

The partnership relation; how proved.

The actual existence of a partnership may be disclosed by evidence which establishes (1) a distinct agreement for a partnership in so many words; or (2) an agreement to share profit and loss; or (3) an agreement to share profits; or (4) such a state of things as is sufficient to establish a quasi partnership. 1 Lindley, Partn. § 91, 141-147.

Evidence of general reputation that one is a partner in a firm is incompetent to charge him as such, and while a formidable array of authorities sustains this proposition, there is some serious dissent, which is entitled to consideration. Our first state-for its debts plaintiff must show that it was a partnership enterprise of which defendants were members; and until a prima facie case of partnership is made out the burden cannot be placed on defendants of showing that it was incorporated or was a limited partnership, to relieve themselves from liability.

2. Evidence tending to show the organization of a bank under a legal character, the holding of stock in it and the receipt of dividends thereon is sufficient to make a question for the jury whether the bank was not a corporation rather than a partnership concern.

3. If the absence of the books and papers of an insolvent bank affords a presumption as to its character against either party to a suit to hold members of the concern individually liable as partners for its debts, it must be against plaintiff where the documents are in possession of his witness in another State, beyond the reach of process, while defendants are simply small stockholders without means of reaching them or compelling their production.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Bradford County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to hold defendants individually liable as partners for the debts of an insolvent banking concern. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. D. A. Overton and M. F. Elliott, for appellant, Levi Curtis:

To constitute a partnership as between the parties there must be a contract making them such.

Upon the issue as to whether a member of a firm is a dormant partner, evidence of a general reputation is admissible. Metcalf v. Officer, 1 McCrary, 325; Rice, Evidence, 1156.

The contradiction referred to as to the integrity of this proposition is best evidenced by the decision in Bowen v. Rutherford, 60 Ill. 41.

Corporate existence, how shown.

Where a company has been incorporated by a special Act of the Legislature, it is, in general, sufficient to give in evidence the Statute, and to show the actual use of the privileges of an incorporated company under the name designated in the Act, to Plaintiff having dealt with a de facto corporation, as such, cannot now be permitted to show that it was not one de jure.

Where persons supposing in good faith that they are incorporated and stockholders in a valid corporation do business as a corporation for a series of years without the corporate existence being challenged by the State, parties who deal with the company as a corporation cannot hold the stockholders personally liable in case they afterwards discover that the company was not validly incorporated in consequence of some defect or irregularity in the proceedings of the supposed incorporation.

Gartside Coal Co. v. Maxwell, 22 Fed. Rep. 197, 6 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 359.

Messrs. E. Overton and H. F. Maynard for appellant, Michael Coleman.

Individual members cannot set up their own faults or mistakes of organization, or false and fraudulent representations whereby they were induced to become stockholders, as a defense against creditors.

McHose v. Wheeler, 45 Pa. 32.

Even if it were true that the appellant was induced to subscribe for his stock by false and fraudulent representations imputable to the company, yet, as the rights of the creditors have intervened subsequent to the time the appellant became a stockholder, his remedy, if he has any, is a special action on the case for fraud against the individuals by whom the fraud was perpetrated, but it affords no defense to proceedings instituted by a creditor.

The existence of the corporation may be proved by producing the books of the company containing the license issued to the corporation by an officer of the State, under a statute, to enable it to act as such. Culver v. Third Nat. Bank, 64 Ill. 528.

It may also be proved by a certified notice of the formation of the corporation, made in pursuance of the statute, sworn to by its president, treasurer, clerk and directors, and recorded, as provided by the Statute, in the registry of deeds. Chamberlin v. Huguenot Mfg. Co. 118 Mass. 532.

Negligence not subject to a standard rule.

It is impossible to give the measure of culpable negligence in those occupying fiduciary relations for all cases, as the degree of care required depends upon the subjects to which it is to be applied. First Nat. Bank of Lyons v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 60 N. Y. 278.

What would be slight neglect in the care of a quantity of iron might be gross neglect in the care of a jewel. What would be slight neglect in the care exercised in the affairs of a turnpike corporation, or even of a manufacturing corporation, might be gross neglect in the care exercised in the management of a savings bank intrusted with the savings of a multitude of poor people, depending for its life upon credit and liable to be wrecked by the breath of suspicion. *Hun v. Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned judge before whom this case was tried correctly stated the principles that controlled the liability of partners to third persons dealing with them. There is no doubt that where the relation is shown to exist, each partner is liable individually for all the debts of the firm. It is also true, as a general rule, that participation in profits makes one a partner as to persons dealing with the firm, although this rule is not without some well-recognized exceptions. Edwards v. Tracy, 62 Pa. 374; Hart v. Kelley, 13 L. R. A.

83 Pa. 286. The business of banking is one in which a partnership may lawfully engage; and it is immaterial that the names of the partners do not appear in the firm name. Shamburg v. Ruggles, 83 Pa. 148. The liability of the partners depends, not on the name of the partnership, but on the existence of the partnership relation. These rules were correctly stated on the trial. The ground of complaint is the manner of their application to the facts of this case. In his charge to the jury the learned judge drew attention to the evidence showing the organization of the bank, the holding of stock by the defendants, and their receipt of dividends, and then submitted the questions to the jury in the following order: first, was the bank indebted to the plaintiff as alleged; second, was the bank a partnership, and third, were the defendants members of the firm. Having simply stated the second question, he proceeded to consider and discuss the third, and, among other things, said to the jury: "Did they (the defendants) invest their money in this business, and did they stipulate for a share of the profits of the business?" To enable them to understand the significance of their finding upon this question he immediately added: "If they did, they became partners and individually liable for all the debts of the firm, unless they can protect themselves from this liability. If the institution was an incorporated bank, then they would not be individually liable. But if it was incorporated the burden is upon the defendants to show it. And if it was a limited partnership the burden is on the defendants to show it." This instruction was calculated to divert attention from the second question, which was the important one, and fix it on the third. It assumed that there was competent and adequate proof before the jury to establish, prima facie, that the bank was a private enterprise owned and conducted by a partnership; and it put the burden of proof on the defendants. It left the jury to infer that until the defendant should assume the burden put upon them and show affirmatively that the bank was incorporated, or was organized as a limited partnership, they should be held liable as partners. But the learned judge went still further. Having put the burden on the defendants of showing the character of the bank, and having explained to the jury what the defendants must show in order to "protect themselves from liability," he proceeded to say: "No evidence has been given before you that it (the bank), was incorporated, and no evidence that it was a limited partnership." This left the jury no alternative: they must find that the defendants invested their money in the bank, with a view to share in the profits of the business, for this was not denied; and this they were told made them partners. They could protect themselves only by showing the incorporation of the bank, or its organization as a limited partnership, and this, they were told, had not been done. The conclusion naturally followed that they were liable as partners. Now the important question in this case, which lay at the threshold of the plaintiff's cause of action, was whether this bank was a partnership. The plaintiff alleged it, and claimed to recover against the defendants as members of the banking firm. The burden of proving the partnership was on him, and until this proof was given the defendants were not called upon to enter upon their defense. They were not bound to prove the character of the organization of the bank in order to "protect themselves," until they were first put in danger of a verdict against them by proof that the bank was a partnership, and that they were members of the firm. As they did not deny that they were stockholders, the only open question was that of the character of the bank, and this is the question to which the attention of the jury should have been drawn. What was the evidence upon this question? The plaintiff showed the fact that the bank was organized, that it conducted a banking business under the management of a board of directors with a president, vice-president, and cashier, until 1887, when it failed. This was all. No articles of co-partnership, or contract between the founders of the bank, were shown. How the organization was effected, or the business of the bank done, did not appear. There was not even a single act or declaration of any officer, director, stockholder, or clerk, tending to show that the bank had ever been represented, at any time or to any person, as a partnership. There was no proof that the defendants or either of them had ever attempted to exercise any control over the business of the bank or had participated in it in any other way than by the receipt of a few small dividends. On the other hand, it appeared in the evidence that Kirby, the founder of the bank, represented that he had obtained a legal charter for it, while he was engaged in soliciting subscriptions to the stock. The certificates held by the defendants, which were put in evidence by the plaintiff, described the bank as "organized under an Act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and as having an authorized capital of $100,000 divided into shares of $100 each." This description is certainly appropriate to an incorporated bank, and no inference can be drawn from it favorable to the position of the plaintiff, that it was not such. Moreover the defendants were severally upon the witness stand and testified in the most positive manner that they were not partners with Kirby and others, but stockholders, as they understood and believed the fact to be, in an incorporated bank; and that the stock was sold to them, and bought by them, as and for the lawfully issued stock of a bank doing business under a valid charter. From this evidence the jury would have been justified in finding against the plaintiff; and if their attention had been drawn to it, as its importance required, the result of their deliberations might have been just opposite to what it was. The position of the parties is not without some bearing on this question. The real plaintiff was the wife of one of the sons of the man who organized the bank, presided over its affairs for fourteen years, and conducted it into hopeless bankruptcy. Her husband had been in the employ of the bank for years as a clerk and bookkeeper. He had the means of knowing, and it is fair to presume did know, the character of the bank and the manner in which it was organized. His brother, who was the assignee both of his father and of the bank, and had actual custody of all the books and papers of both at his place of business in another State, was present at the trial as a witness for the plaintiff. Whether the bank rested on a contract between its founders, or on a charter from the State, he was in a position to know, and to bring the document before the court. With these two witnesses the plaintiff was in a position to show all that the books and papers of the bank, or its founder, contained relating to the organization. The defendants, on the other hand, were simply small stockholders shown to have had no connection with or knowledge of the business of the bank, and no access to its books or papers. How, in a contest between parties so situated, can it be said that the burden of showing the nature and character of the organization of the bank is on the defendants?

The books and papers from which this evidence is to be drawn are in another State, beyond the reach of process, and in the hands of the plaintiff's witness and brother. The defendants have no means of reaching them or compelling their production. Under such circumstances if the absence of exact proof of the nature of the organization affords a basis for a presumption against either party it must be against him who is in a position to produce such proof. It was error therefore to say, on the facts of this case as they were presented in the court below, that the burden of proving a charter, or an organization as a limited partnership, was on the defendant. The burden of proving a partnership as alleged, was on the plaintiff, and until this was shown, the defendants were not called upon to enter upon a defense. It was error also to say that there was no evidence tending to show an incorporation of the bank. There was some evidence and it should have been submitted to the jury in such manner as to draw their attention to the importance of the question. Something has been said in the argument about the unconscionable position of bankers, who first invite the public confidence and, when they have secured it, betray it, and then seek to escape from the legal consequences of their own frauds. We quite agree with all that has been said by way of censure of such conduct, but it is not quite appropriate upon the facts of this case. The defendants took their stock in an organized bank, doing business as a savings bank. They had nothing to do with its current business. They neither invited the plaintiff to make deposits, nor embezzled the money when deposited.

It is not alleged that they aided in bringing about, or profited by, the ruin of the bank. They are, rather, among the sufferers from the ruin wrought, apparently, by the president.

While he squandered the money of depositors he sunk also the money of the stockholders. If the defendants are now liable to the creditors of the bank, it is not for their own fault or fraud, but because of their misfortune in being associated in business with one who has wasted the money of his partners, and that of the customers of the firm, at the same time, and left both remediless.

This is their position if the bank was a partnership. They must in that case bear their own loss and make good, to the extent of their ability, the losses of the depositors. But he who asserts their liability as partners must show it, and the sufficiency of the showing must be determined by the jury under proper instructions.

The judgment is reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

William SCHWENK, Surviving Partner,

1. The discretion of the master is absolute in selecting which of several styles of apparatus in common use he will use in his business; and he cannot be made to respond in damages to an employé injured while using the apparatus selected, on the ground that some other style might, under the circumstances, have been safer.

2. The attention of the jurors should not be drawn to the price for which they would be willing to suffer the injury for which they are to assess damages, in laying down the rules which are to guide them in making such assessment.

3. The degree of care and prudence which must be exercised by a child to avoid the charge of negligence is measured by his capacity to see and appreciate danger whether he is under or over fourteen years of age, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary such capacity will be held to be that which is usual to children of his age and experience. Fourteen years is simply the age after which capacity is presumed and the burden of showing lack of it placed on the child.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Northumberland County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Plaintiff was a minor about fourteen years of age. He was employed at defendant's colliery as slate picker. At the time he received

NOTE.—Implements furnished an employé must be reasonably safe.

A master does not guarantee the safety of the implements furnished to his servants, and is not liable for injuries resulting from a defect in the implements furnished which could not be discovered by careful inspection or the application of appropriate tests. Probst v. Delamater, 1 Cent. Rep. 507, 100 N. Y. 266.

And in an action by an employé against his employer to recover damages for injuries incurred by reason of defects in the implements furnished, the burden of proof is on the party plaintiff to show defendant's negligence in the exercise of his duty to the employé in the selection of improper implements. Painton v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 83 N. Y. 7; DeGraff v. N. Y. Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 123; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Harper, 44 Ark. 524.

Even where the knowledge of defects comes to the servant, it is a question for the jury to decide as to whether his negligence amounted to a contribution on his part, and it is only in a very extreme case that the court will decide it to be a matter of law. *McMahon v. the injuries complained of he was engaged in driving a mule attached to a car hauling dirt from the breaker. The work required that he should ride on the car to the dump and unhitch the mule while the car was running on an up grade with enough momentum to carry it to the end of the dirt bank, the place where it was to be dumped. The mule was hitched to the car by means of a spreader and chain. The attachment was in front, beneath the car. Plaintiff claimed that the car was not properly constructed; that the attachment should have been at the side of the car, or if in front, it should have been in a more elevated position.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. W. B. Faust, W. H. M. Oram, C. M. Clement and S. P. Wolverton, for appellant:

A boy fourteen years of age is competent to drive a mule hauling a dump car. It was therefore not negligence to put this plaintiff at such work. The average boy of fourteen years was fully competent to know the danger.

O'Keefe v. Thorn, 24 W. N. C. 379; Rickert v. Stephens, 133 Pa. 538; Zurn v. Tellow, 134 Pa. 213.

An infant of the age of fourteen years is presumed to have sufficient capacity to be sensible of danger and to have the power to avoid it, and this presumption will stand until overthrown by clear proof of the absence of such discretion as is usual with infants of that age.

It was not a question for the jury to determine as to which of the three kinds of hitches described by the witnesses should have been used at this colliery, nor whether it would have been a safe thing to employ a boy of this age in the use of any other hitch. The undisputed evidence was that boys of this age did this work with the style of hitch in evidence.

See Faber v. Carlisle Mfg. Co. 126 Pa. 389; Titus v. Bradford, B. & K. R. Co. 136 Pa. 625.

Where an employer has furnished his employes with tools and appliances, which, though not the best possible to be obtained, may by ordinary care be used without danger, he has discharged his duty and is not responsible for accidents.

Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Sentmeyer, 92 Pa. 276; Allison Mfg. Co. v. McCormick, 11 Cent. Rep. 396, 118 Pa. 519; Drew v. Gaylord Coal Burden of proof is with the party alleging want of due care.

The burden is upon the plaintiff to establish negligence of the master and his own care. The presumption is that the master discharged his duty, and this presumption must be fairly overcome by proof of his personal fault or negligence. McMillan v. Saratoga & W. R. Co. 20 Barb. 449; Rose v. Boston & A. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 217; Wright v. New York Cent. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 562; Malone v. Hathaway, 64 N. Y. 5, 21 Am. Rep. 573, notes 580, 581; De Graff v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 125; Davis v. Detroit R. Co. 20 Mich. 105, 4 Am. Rep. 364.

This presumption is not overcome and an inference of negligence indulged from the existence of a defect in the machine, although a servant may be injured in consequence of that defect. De Graff v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. supra; Wood, Mast & Serv. § 358, 419; Terry v. New York Cent. R. Co. 22 Barb. 574; Curran v. Warren Chem. & Mfg. Co. 36 N. Y. 153; *Mobile & O. R. Co. v. It was for the plaintiff to prove that proper tests had not been applied, the law presuming that ordinary care had been exercised. Wood, Mast & Serv. § 419; *Rose v. Boston & A. R. 13 L. R. A.

This duty not an absolute one.

The duty of the master to furnish safe, suitable and sound tools, machinery and appliances for the use of the servant in the performance of the work of the master, and to keep them in repair, is not an absolute one, and is satisfied by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence on the part of the master in the manufacture, selection and repair of such appliances. Fuller v. Jewett, 80 N. Y. 46; Painton v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 83 N. Y. 7; Ellis v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 552; Burke v. Witherbee, 98 N. Y. 552.

When servant assumes risk.

The rule that a servant assumes the risk by continuing in the employment with knowledge of the defect applies even to a case where the defect was due to improper construction of the machine, or existed when the machine was furnished by the master; but there is a wide difference between its application to such a case and to a case like the present, where the defect was not one originally existing, but was one which resulted from the use of a good and safe machine. *Thomp. Messrs. Voris Auten and C. R. Savidge, for appellee:

This case is ruled by Rummel v. Dilworth, 181 Pa. 509.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have had occasion several times recently to lay down the rule that the test of liability of an employer to an employé for injury received in the course of the employment is not danger but negligence. The employer is bound to furnish machinery and appliances that are of ordinary character and reasonable safety, and the former is the conclusive test of the latter. Whatever is according to the general, usual and ordinary course, adopted by those in the same business, is reasonably safe within the meaning of the law. As said by our brother Green in North-ern Cent. R. Co. v. Husson, 101 Pa. 1, an employer is not liable "because a particular accident might have been prevented by some special device or precaution not in common use," and by our brother Williams, in Iron Ship Building Works v. Nuttall, 119 Pa. 149, 11 Cent. Rep. 662: "It is not enough that some persons regard it as a valuable safeguard. The test is general use." Nor can the jury be permitted to set up their judgment against the general customs of the business. Titus v. Bradford, B. & K. R. Co. 136 Pa. 618. In the present case it was in undisputed evidence that there were three kinds of hitches to the dumper in common use, each having its own peculiar advantages adapted to different conditions of the dirt bank. Much evidence was given as to whether it would not have been practicable and better, under the conditions of this colliery, to use the side hitch, or the box centre hitch. This question, though made the burden of the contest, was entirely irrelevant. It was exclusively for the determination of the defendants themselves. Where, as in the present case, the evidence shows clearly that several methods are in general use, the choice being a matter of judgment depending on the surrounding conditions, the owner has the absolute discretion to select according to his own judgment. The necessary control of his own business demands that this right shall be strictly maintained. Except to make another man's will for him after his death, there is nothing which a jury is more apt to think it can do better than the owner, especially under the stress of a claim for damages by one who has been injured, than to say how another man's business ought to have been managed, and nothing in which juries should be held more strictly and unflinchingly within their proper province. As already said, there was a large amount of evidence as to the superiority of the side or upper hitch, the admission and discussion of which tended naturally to lead the jury 13 L. R. A.

to suppose that they might find a verdict on their own judgment which was the best, and this was put explicitly before them by the charge that "the proper question for you to determine is as to which of these hitches was the proper hitch for these parties to make use of at this colliery." This was giving the jury an entirely erroneous view of the point of the case and of their province in regard to it. They should have been told that if they found from the evidence that the lower hitch was the one in general use upon dirt banks with an up grade there was no negligence in the use of that hitch by the defendants. The ninth assignment of error must be sustained.

As the case is to go back for another trial, we may also say that the measure of damages quoted in the eighth assignment is somewhat vague, and the expression "you would not be willing to lose your arm for the world, or for the wealth of a Vanderbilt," though followed by the caution that that would be no test of value, was an undesirable form of putting the matter to the jury and tended to inflame damages in a class of cases where juries are prone enough to measure verdicts by sympathy with the injured more than by regard for the strict right of the parties.

The error complained of in the second and fourth assignments is in brief the charge that while the law presumes a boy of fourteen to be capable of appreciating danger and therefore responsible for his own negligence, yet he is not to be held to the same degree of prudence as a man of mature years. It is notable that in the legion of cases upon negligence in our books this particular question has received little attention. But the principles upon which it must be settled are firmly established. All the cases agree that the measure of a child's responsibility is his capacity to see and appreciate danger, and the rule is that in the absence of clear evidence of lack of it, he will be held to such measure of discretion as is usual in those of his age and experience. This measure varies, of course, with each additional year, and the increase of responsibility is gradual. It makes no sudden leap at the age of fourteen. That is simply the convenient point at which the law, founded upon experience, changes the presumption of capacity, and puts upon the infant the burden of showing his personal want of the intelligence, prudence, foresight, or strength usual in those of such age. The standard remains the same, to wit: the average capacity of others in his condition. That this is the rule as to children under fourteen is held in all our cases from Rauch v. Lloyd, 31 Pa. 358, to Sandford v. Heatonville M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 136 Pa. 84. That it also applies to infants over fourteen follows from the same reasoning, and is expressly ruled in Oakland R. Co. v. Fielding, 48 Pa. 320. In that case plaintiff's son, a youth between sixteen and seventeen, while running with a fire engine stepped into a hole in the street, fell and was run over. The judge charged the jury, upon the point of contributory negligence, that they must consider the age, strength, size, and activity of the plaintiff's son, and if it was the habit of boys of his age and capacity to run with the engines to a fire, and to assist in drawing them, the jury may take the fact into consideration in determining whether or not the plaintiff's son was guilty of negligence or misconduct; the plaintiff's son was bound to exercise the same degree of caution, prudence, and discretion that other boys of his age and capacity ordinarily exercise. If he did this he was exercising ordinary care and prudence, but if not he was guilty of negligence." This was affirmed upon the reasons given by the judge below.

Nagle v. Allegheny R. Co., 88 Pa. 35, much relied on by appellant, is in entire harmony with the foregoing. In that case a boy of fourteen ran across a railroad track without looking, and the court held that this was negligence per se, and sustained a nonsuit. "At fourteen," says Paxson, J., "an infant is presumed to have sufficient capacity and understanding to be sensible of danger and to have the power to avoid it. And this presumption ought to stand until it is overthrown by clear proof of the absence of such discretion and intelligence as is usual with infants of fourteen years of age."

In the present case there was evidence that the unhitching of a dumper of this kind was manifestly dangerous, and on the other hand that it was entirely safe and commonly performed by boys. It is quite clear that the amount of danger depended very largely on the length and weight of the chain, the condition of the track and the speed of the mule. These factors made up a varying standard which was necessarily for the jury to determine, and the judge was right in leaving it to them, and in the rule of law which he gave for their guidance.

The other points were based upon the assumption that the evidence was undisputed, and included a peremptory direction in defendant's favor. The learned judge was right in refusing them for that reason.

Judgment reversed and venire de novo awarded.

1. The International Cigar Makers' Union, the object of which is "to promote the mental, moral, and physical welfare of its members," is neither a manufacturer, dealer, nor trader, so as to be entitled to protection in the use of a trade-mark.

2. Equity will not protect a labor union in the use of a nontrade-mark label which it distributes to all its members to be placed upon their work, the object of which is to discriminate between union and nonunion labor and to coerce the latter into joining the union by recommending to the public the goods on which such labels appear because made by union labor, and denouncing all other goods as the product of "inferior, rat shop, cooley, prison, or filthy tenement-house workmanship."

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Lancaster County enjoining him from making use of certain devices or labels upon cigars manufactured in his shop. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. D. G. Eshleman and N. Franklin Hall, for appellant:

The label in question does not fall within the definition of a trade-mark, and therefore cannot be protected as such.

Unless the person be a trader, that is, unless he or she is engaged in mercantile business of some kind, a title to a trade-mark could not be acquired.

Mr. M. Brosius, for appellees:

It is not important whether this label is called a trade-mark, a trade label, a trade sign, or trade device. The purpose of it is to identify the origin and manufacture of goods that are sold in the markets of the country, and it is entitled to protection.

Anyone who makes or manufactures goods or commodities for the market without regard to the ownership of the raw material or of the completed commodity has a right to the use of a sign, mark, or symbol to identify his manufacture—to the end that he may have the benefit of any superiority he may have given it, derived either from superior skill or the place or conditions of the manufacture.

Re Sykes, 43 L. T. N. S. 626.

The trade-mark or sign may be used to indicate, not the owner, but some other person who has expended labor on the article.

Plaintiffs and the other members of this association on behalf of whom these plaintiffs sue have a property right in this label or trade-mark, and are entitled to apply to the court to interfere by injunction.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal is a new one; at least it is new in this State. It involves important consequences to employers and employes, and it touches the rights and obligations of workmen in their relation to each other. The facts upon which the question is presented as found by the learned master are as follows. The Cigar Makers International Union of America is a voluntary, unincorporated association of workmen organized, as its constitution affirms, "for promoting the mental, moral, and physical welfare of its members." It has devised and registered the label which is the subject of this controversy, and claims an exclusive right to control its use. The office of the label is to advise the public that the cigars in the box which bears it were made by members of the union. Every member of the union in the United States and Canada is entitled to have this label upon the cigars made by him. The plaintiffs represent neither the Cigar Makers' International Union, the alleged owner of the label, nor Strasse, the officer whose name appears upon it, but a subordinate local organization known as No. 126, located at Ephrata, Lancaster County, Pa. No. 126 did not devise or register the label and does not claim to own it, but asserts the ownership of the international organization to which it is a tributary and whose jurisdiction it acknowledges. The defendant is a manufacturer whose shop is, as the learned master finds, "a strict union shop" belonging to Union No. 126. His workmen, ten or twelve in number, are members of the union. He as the owner of a union shop, and his men, by virtue of their membership, are entitled to the use of the label on the cigars made by them. He procured a quantity of imitation or counterfeit labels, because, as he alleges, he was refused the genuine when he applied for them, and avowed his purpose to use them. The plaintiffs then filed a bill and asked the court to enjoin the defendant against the use of the imitation labels for any purpose whatever. Upon these facts the master recommended and the court made the decree asked for. The grounds upon which an injunction will issue to restrain the infringement or appropriation of a trade-mark are well settled. They are, first, the protection of property in a trade-mark; and second, the prevention of fraud by an imitator. In either case it issues at the suit and for the protection of the owner of the device or trade-mark infringed. The plaintiffs represent Union No. 126, which has no other ownership in, or control over, the International Union's label than any others of the hundreds or thousands of subordinate unions scattered over the United States and the Canadas. If it can maintain this bill, then each and every subordinate union can do the same thing, although no one of these devised, registered, or claims to own the trade-mark, and may prevent its use by workmen and in shops which, under the general rules of the international body are entitled to use it. But we are not disposed to impale this case upon what may be thought to be a technical point. On the other hand we will consider whether the International Cigar Makers' Union is a trader, whether the label in question is a trade mark, and whether upon any ground of equitable relief the plaintiffs are entitled to consideration in a court of equity. The first question is disposed of by the learned master upon the pleadings. The organization that devised, registered, and owns the label is neither a manufacturer nor dealer, and has no trade in which a trade-mark can be used. The second question would seem to go with the first. Trade-marks are provided for by the Act of Congress of July 8, 1870. Registration is made under it by furnishing a statement to be recorded in the patent office, showing "the names of the parties applying for the registration, with their residences and places of business; the class of merchandise, and a description of the goods composing the class, by which the trade-mark has been or is intended to be appropriated, together with a description of the trade-mark and facsimiles of it." This provision of the Act clearly contemplates an actual business conducted by the person or persons named, the adoption of a trade-mark in that business and its appropriation to a particular "class of merchandise" produced or sold by the parties making the registration. Any device, figure, or inscription which seems to indicate the personal origin of the goods may be adopted as a trade-mark. Laughman's App. 128 Pa. 19, 5 L. R. A. 599. Such trade-mark will be protected against fraudulent imitation, whether registered or not. Hoyt v. Hoyt, ante, 348, decided at the present term.

Registration affords evidence of ownership. Its object is to secure to the maker or dealer the fruits of his skill, industry, and reputation by a positive legislative provision. Pratt's Appeal, 117 Pa. 411, 10 Cent. Rep. 596. But the Act of Congress referred to makes it clear that it is a maker or a dealer only who is entitled to protection, for it declares that the commissioner of patents "shall not receive and record any proposed trade-mark which is not and cannot become a lawful trade-mark." Now if the Cigar Makers' International Union was a business organization engaged in making cigars for sale, it could adopt and use a trade-mark in its business and acquire property in it; but it is not a business organization. It neither makes nor sells cigars but directs its attention to cigar makers, and seeks "to promote the mental, moral, and physical welfare of its members." These are worthy objects. They deserve and should receive the encouragement and support of all right-minded men. It is obvious, however, that they are personal and social objects, not commercial ones. They do not look toward the production or sale of any class or quality of cigars or tobacco, but towards the personal elevation and comfort of cigar makers. I conclude, therefore, that the Cigar Makers' International Union of America is neither a trader within the meaning of the common law, nor within the purview of the Act of Congress. Not being a trader in any sense, it can have no distinctive trade-mark. Registration under such circumstances is not authorized by the Act of Congress, and if made confers no title, and gives no standing ground in a court of law or equity. I come now to inquire whether the adoption of the label for the purposes set forth in the bill gives to the International Union any ground for equitable relief. We have seen that this label is not a trade-mark, and that the union is not in a business that enables it to adopt or acquire a trade-mark. Still it is urged that as the defendant was about to use an imitation of the label he should be enjoined whether the label is a trade-mark or not. But what is this label? And why should it be protected? It purports to be "issued by the authority of the Cigar Makers' International Union of America" to the person who uses it. The name of the workman who made the cigars does not appear upon it, nor the owner or location of the shop at which they are made. It does not point out the personal or the local origin or ownership of the goods on which it is placed. On the other hand, it issues to every one of the many thousands of workmen who make up the membership of the union, and it certifies, in the name of the union, that the cigars in the box on which it is placed were made "by a first-class workman, a member of the Cigar Makers' International Union." Who this first-class workman was, where he lived, for whom he worked, the label does not tell. He is indorsed as a "first-class workman" because he is "a member" of the union. As to all who are not members, the label proceeds to define the position of the organization that issues it by describing their work as "inferior, rat shop, cooley, prison or filthy tenement-house workmanship." The label then proceeds in these words: "Therefore we recommend these cigars to all smokers throughout the world." The value of this label is in the recommendation and the reasons given for it. The label is thus seen to be something quite different from a trade-mark in its character, its purpose and the manner of its use, viz., a device to distinguish between union and non-union workmen, and to discriminate against the work of the latter. It says to the public in spirit and in effect: "Buy the cigars that bear this label because they were made by a member of this union. Do not buy those not bearing it because they were made by workmen who do not belong to us. Such cigars are the product of 'inferior, rat shop, cooley, prison, or filthy tenement-house workmanship.'" It is the request of a powerful labor organization to "all smokers throughout the world" to take sides with it in its contest with those who are outside of its membership by refusing to buy the work of such persons. It is an attempt to use the public as a means of coercion upon them, compelling them to unite with the union in order to find a market for their goods or their labor. Right here let us distinguish broadly between an object and the means employed to reach it. Organization is the privilege, perhaps I might say the duty, of labor; and an organization seeking to promote "the mental, moral, and physical welfare of its members," by securing fair wages, steady work, and the comforts of home for them, occupies a legitimate field of usefulness and is capable of doing great good to its members and to the public. The Cigar Makers' Union is no doubt seeking to do such a work and accomplishing much in that direction. What we are now considering is one of the means it employs to increase its membership and to hurt workmen who do not belong to it. The real question now before us is whether the international organization of workmen shall have the help of a court of equity in making war upon all cigar makers who do not belong to it, and in driving their work out of the market by representing it as coming from "inferior rat shops, from coolies, prisoners, or filthy tenement houses." A "first class workman" is one who does first-class work, whether his name is on the rolls of any given society or not. Filthiness and criminality of character depend on conduct, not on membership of the union. Legitimate competition rests on superiority of workmanship, and business methods, not in the use of vulgar epithets and personal denunciation. When the Cigar Makers' International Union of America stigmatizes those who do not belong to it and seeks to induce the public to discriminate against them and their work by covering them with opprobrious epithets, it is not engaged in "promoting the mental, moral, and physical welfare of its members," but in trying to hurt and destroy those who do not choose to become members. While the courts would aid the former purpose in all ways within their power, they cannot help the latter. We cannot justify the defendant's conduct. There is no rule of morals or of business upon which he can defend himself in the preparation and use of spurious labels. But it is not every wrong action that a chancellor will enjoin, because the purpose of an injunction is to protect the plaintiff in the exercise and enjoyment of a clear legal right, for an infringement of which the law does not afford an adequate remedy. If, therefore, the right of the plaintiff is doubtful, equity will withhold its aid. The plaintiff in this case has no trade-mark to protect and no right to a decree resting on the law relating to trade-marks. What they have is a label which recommends the purchase of cigars made by union men, and warns against the purchase of all others as inferior and unwholesome because made in "rat shops, or prisons, or by coolies, or tenants of filthy tenement houses." Their right to use such a label may well be doubted, whether the question be treated as one of morals or of law. But the plaintiffs come into a court of equity and seek to enlist the conscience of a chancellor in their behalf. They must come, with clean hands, with a conscientious regard for the rights of others, ready to do equity on their part, and seeking only equity at the hands of the court. They do come in this case with the avowed purpose to do harm to non-union men, to prevent the sale of their work, to cover them with opprobrium; and they ask a court of equity to say that they have a right to do it. We decline to say so.

The decree of the court below is reversed, the injunction dissolved and the bill dismissed.

As we cannot approve the conduct of the defendant, we shall not award him costs, but direct that each party pay the costs it has made, and that the fees of the master be paid in equal parts by the plaintiffs and the defendant.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Skipwith WILMER, Assignee, etc., of the Druid Mills Manufacturing Co., Appt.,

t.
Douglas H. THOMAS et al.

(.....Md.....)

The good-will and all trade-marks, not personal in their character, of an insolvent manufacturing company, will pass to a purchaser at a sale of the plant by the assignee for benefit of creditors, under an assignment transferring all the property of whatever kind owned by the insolvent, and an advertisement of sale describing the property as "old established and valuable cotton duck mills."

APPPEAL by the assignee for benefit of creditors of the Druid Mills Manufacturing Company from an order of the Circuit Court for Baltimore City setting aside his report of NOTE.—Good-will regarded as property.

Good-will is a firm asset. Whether it survives to a partner has not been uniformly decided. After a voluntary dissolution, each partner has a right to use the old firm name, unless otherwise agreed. It is the subject of sale, like other personality. See Barber v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 312, 315-322; 14 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 1-11, 329-341, 649-650, 713-725; 18 Cent. L. J. 162-165; 19 Cent. L. J. 362-368; 19 Alb. L. J. 502-503; 3 Kent, Com. 64; 1 Pars. Cont. 153; Musselman's App. 62 Pa. 81; Hammond v. Douglas, 5 Ves. Jr. 539; Crawshaw v. Collins, 15 Ves. Jr. 218, 227; Anderson, Law Dict. title Good-will.

It is a subject of value and price. It may be sold, bequeathed, or become assets in the hands of the personal representative of a trade. If the restriction as to time is held to be illegal because extended beyond the period of the party carrying on the trade himself, the value of such good-will, considered in these various points of view, is altogether destroyed. Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Ad. & El. 438, 446.

A good-will in business is recognized as property in law, and is protected as such. Howe v. Searling, 6 Bosw. 358, 365.

The good-will of a concern (so far as it is local, and arises from an established place of business), while it cannot well be divided, may be sold by assignees. Allen v. Woonsocket Co. 11 R. I. 220. See Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. Jr. 386; Meiherish v. Keen, 27 Beav. 236, 28 Beav. 453; Turner v. Major, 3 Gift. 442.

The good-will survives to the remaining partner, sale of the cotton manufacturing plant of the insolvent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Randolph Barton and Skipwith Wilmer, in propria persona, for appellant.

Messrs. R. D. Morrison, Howard Munikhuyser and Nicholas P. Bond, for appellees:

The deed conveyed "all its estate and property of whatever kind and wherever situated."

The good-will and business, not being expressly mentioned, did not pass.

Lord Eldon, in Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. Jr. 336, said the "good-will" was "nothing more than the probability that the old customers would resort to the old place;" but it has been held that this is too narrow a view, and that "it must mean every positive advantage that has been acquired by the old firm in the progress of its business, whether connected with the premises in which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the business."

Churton v. Douglas, Johns. V. C. 174, 188; Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 522, 32 L. ed. 528.

Judge Story defines it to be "the benefit or advantage, which is acquired by an establishment beyond the mere value of the capital stock, funds or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage and encouragement which it receives from constant or habitual customers, on account of its local position or common celebrity, or reputation for skill or affluence, or punctuality, or from other accidental circumstances or necessities, or even from ancient formalities or prejudices."

Story, Partn. § 99. See Smith v. Gibbs, 44 N. H. 343; Boon v. Moss, 70 N. Y. 473; Morgan v. Perhamus, 36 Ohio St. 522; Bell v. Ellis, 53 Cal. 624; Hove v. Searing, 19 How. Pr. 26.

Included in the sale of a "good-will" is the right to prevent the vendor from interfering in the enjoyment of the purchase by resuming business in the same locality (Dwight v. Hamilton, 113 Mass. 175; Ginesi v. Cooper, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 596; Williams v. Wilson, 4 Sandf. Ch. 379, 7 L. ed. 1141; Churton v. Douglas, supra); and to prevent the vendor from using personal efforts to induce the old customers to leave the vendee. Ibid.

Can it be held that a firm, individual, or corporation, which by misfortune is compelled to make an assignment for the benefit of creditors, intends to, or does, give to its assignee the right to make a sale carrying with it these consequences?

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question presented on this appeal is whether the purchasers of the Druid Mills manufacturing property, at the sale thereof by the trustee, under and by virtue of a deed of assignment made by the manufacturing company for the benefit of creditors, will acquire, with the property purchased by them, the right to the good-will and business of the insolvent corporation, including the brand or trade-mark used by the company to mark the goods manufactured by it before the assignment. By the deed of assignment and a sale of it cannot be compelled by the representatives of the deceased partner. It is not partnership stock of which the executor may compel a division, but belongs of right to the survivor. Hove v. Searing, 10 Abb. Pr. 270, 19 How. Pr. 17. See Dougherty v. Van Nostrand, Hoffm. Ch. 68, 6 L. ed. 1066.

The good-will of a business may be sold the same as any other personal property. See Musselman's App. 62 Pa. 31; Hove v. Searing, 19 How. Pr. 14; Dougherty v. Van Nostrand, Hoffm. Ch. 68, 6 L. ed. 1066; Partridge v. Menck, 2 Barb. Ch. 101, 5 L. ed. 572; Pearson v. Pearson, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 145.

Or it may be the subject of a contract of sale. See Cruess v. Fessler, 39 Cal. 336; Holmes v. Holmes, 37 Conn. 278; M'Farland v. Stewart, 2 Watts, 111; Palmer v. Graham, 1 Pars. Eq. 478.

Where a partner sells out all his share in the business, the presumption is that he meant to include the good-will. See Churton v. Douglas, Johns. V. C. 174.

Where a trader sells for value his business and good-will to another, he may be restrained from soliciting his old customers to deal with him, as if no sale had been made. See Hall's App. 60 Pa. 458; McCORD v. Williams, 96 Pa. 78; Ginesi v. Cooper, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 603. Disapproved, however, on the point that he might be restrained from dealing with his old customers, in Leggott v. Barrett, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 306.

Must pertain to an established business.

While the good-will of a business is property that may be sold or mortgaged, yet it is property of a very peculiar and exceptional character. It is intangible property which, in the nature of things, can have no existence apart from a business of some sort that has been established and carried on at a particular place; and it cannot be sold by judicial decree, or otherwise, unless it be in connection with a sale of the business on which it depends. Story, Partn. § 99; Robertson v. Quidington, 28 Beav. 529; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1355, and notes; Smith, Merc. Law, 188.

Is a fit subject of transfer.

While it has been held that good-will is not a transferable or partnership asset (Hove v. Searing, 19 How. Pr. 14, decided in 1860), the great weight of modern authority is in favor of the contrary rule. Williams v. Wilson, 4 Sandf. Ch. 379, 7 L. ed. 1141; Marten v. Van Schaick, 4 Paige, 479, 3 L. ed. 523; Case v. Abeel, 1 Paige, 401, 3 L. ed. 693; Lewis v. Langdon, 7 Sim. 421; Banks v. Gibson, 11 Jur. N. S. 680; Johnson v. Helleley, 34 Beav. 68; Macdonald v. Richardson, 1 Giff. 81; Dougherty v. Van Nostrand, 1 Hoffm. Ch. 68, 6 L. ed. 1066; Musselman's App. 62 Pa. 31; McFarland v. Stewart, 2 Watts, 111; Holden v. McMakin, 1 Pars. Eq. 270; Willett v. Blanford, 1 Hare, 271; Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 22 Beav. 84; Sheppard v. Boggs, 9 Neb. 268; Bining v. Clark, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 264; Mellersh v. Keen, 28 Beav. 453; Bradbury v. Dickens, 27 Beav. 53; Austen v. Boys, 2 DeG. & J. 626; Turner v. Major, 3 Giff. 442.

But a mortgage of the "machinery, type, presses, cases, furniture, paper, forms and tools" of a newspaper company, together with the "good-will" of its business, cannot be foreclosed as to the good-will after all the tangible property covered by the mortgage has been alienated, worn out or destroyed, and the corporation has become consolidated with another newspaper corporation. Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. St. Louis Diap. Co. 36 Fed Rep. 722.

dated the 12th of December, 1890, the Druid Mills Manufacturing Company, an insolvent corporation, assigned and conveyed to the appellant, as trustee, "all its estate and property, of whatever kind and wherever situated," in trust for the benefit of creditors, with power to the trustee to sell either at public or private sale, and on such terms as might seem best for the interest of the creditors. The trustee advertised the property for sale at public auction, and in the advertisement he described the property as the old-established and valuable cotton-duck mills, at Woodberry, well known as "Druid Mills," containing about 12,000 spindles and 200 looms, in full operation, and adding, after full description of the particulars of the plant, "that the machinery is of the most modern, and is constructed for the manufacture of all numbers, widths, and weights of cotton duck, awnings, stripes, yarns, twines, etc.,—all the well-known 'Druid Mills' brand." The trustee sold the property to the appellees under this advertisement, and according to the foregoing description; and in his amended report of the sale he states that he "offered at public sale the well-known Druid Mills, as then in full operation and a going concern, with all the real and leasehold property, machinery, and plant, together with the good-will and business of the said Druid Mills Manufacturing Company of Baltimore County, subject to the operation and effect of a certain mortgage described in the advertisement of sale; and that he then and there sold the same to Douglas H. Thomas, Christian Devries, and Charles C. Homer, as a committee, representing the creditors of the said company, at and for the sum of $120,000, that being the highest bid." These purchasers, upon the report being made, came into court, and, while admitting the facts stated in the trustee's amended report, objected to the ratification of the sale upon two grounds: (1) that the deed of trust or assignment did not assign or transfer to the trustee the right to sell and convey to the purchasers of the Druid Mills property the exclusive right to continue the business, and to the brand or trade-mark of the company; and (2) that the advertisement of sale did not distinctly state that the brand and trade-mark of the company would be offered for sale. Upon these exceptions, an order pro forma was passed setting aside the sale as reported, and the trustee has appealed. That the good-will of an established business, as also the brands or the trade-marks used to distinguish and specially denote the product or manufacture of the establishment, are property, and form the subjects of contract and sale, is a principle too well settled to need the citation of authorities for its support. Indeed, it is often the case that a large portion of the intrinsic marketable or assessable value of a manufacturing establishment consists in the good-will maintained by it, and in the brands or trade-marks to which it has acquired an exclusive use, by which to denote the origin and make of its goods when placed upon the market. And so important a contribution to the value of the establishment are these elements or accessories of the business that in the sale or assignment of such manufactory or business establishment, to be continued as formerly, the sale or transfer of such an establishment ordinarily carries with it, by reasonable intentment or implication, the right to such good-will and trade-marks, as incidents to or accessories of the business carried on by the establishment. This would now seem to be settled by a great preponderance of authority, though after a considerable conflict of judicial opinion.

This court, in the case of Witthans v. Mattfeldt, 44 Md. 305, has said that, where a trade-mark is used to designate the place and the person by whom the goods are made, the right to such trade-mark passes to the purchaser upon the sale and transfer of the business and manufactory at which the goods are made. And the Supreme Court of the United States, in Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 620, 25 L. ed. 769, 770, in speaking of the right to dispose of a trade-mark, in connection with a business establishment, said: "As to the right of Pike to dispose of his trade-mark in connection with the establishment where the liquor was manufactured, we do not think there can be any reasonable doubt. It is true, the primary object of a trade-mark is to indicate by its meaning or association the origin of the article to which it is affixed. As distinct property, separate from the article created by the original producer or manufacturer, it may not be the subject of sale. But when the trade-mark is affixed to articles manufactured at a particular establishment, and acquires a special reputation in connection with the place of manufacture, and that establishment is transferred either by contract or operation of law to others, the right to the use of the trade-mark may be lawfully transferred with it. Its subsequent use by the person to whom the establishment is transferred is considered as only indicating that the goods to which it is affixed are manufactured at the same place, and are of the same character, as those to which the mark was attached by its original designer. Such is the purport of the language of Lord Cranworth in the case of Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. 11 H. L. Cas. 528. See also Ainworth v. Walmesley, 35 L. J. Ch. 355, and Hall v. Barrows, 10 Jur. N. S. 55." And, in addition to the cases thus referred to, see the recent cases of Lawrence Mfg. Co. v. Tennessee Mfg. Co. 138 U. S. 537, 34 L. ed. 997, and Symonds v. Jones, 82 Me. 302, 8 L. R. A. 570.

The trade-mark or brand used by the Druid Mills Manufacturing Company was simply "Druid Mills" imprinted upon their goods, and, while there is no question made as to whether or not such mark or imprint constitutes a legal brand or trade-mark such as will be protected, the questions made by the exceptions are whether that or any other valid brand or trade-mark used by the company to designate and identify its manufacture passed to the trustee by the deed of assignment; and, if it did pass, then, whether, by the terms of the advertisement of sale, the right to such brand or trade-mark passed to the purchasers of the manufacturing establishment as sold by the trustee.

The deed of assignment transferred to the trustee all the property of the assignor of whatever kind owned by it. This was certainly broad enough to include the property in the good-will of the business, and in the brand or trade-mark of the company. All the property in the business and the plant were assigned, and we can have no doubt but that it was intended that the important accessories of good-will and the brand should pass. It can hardly be supposed that it was intended that the manufacturing establishment should be sold by the trustee without them, as such sale could not be otherwise than greatly to the loss and prejudice of the creditors of the company. It was manifestly the intention and desire of the assigning company that the manufacturing establishment should be sold by the trustee to the best advantage, and to be operated by the purchasers; and the fact that the good-will and trade-mark or brand were not mentioned eo nomine in the deed of assignment in no manner excludes the construction that they did pass to the trustee; for, as laid down by Upton in his work on the Law of Trade-marks, p. 53, "there can be no doubt that a contract, by which a manufacturer disposes absolutely of his business, and vests in another the right to manufacture the goods which he has before produced, and which have become known in the market by a distinguishing trade-mark, though it were silent upon the subject of such trade-mark, by necessary implication vests in the purchaser the exclusive right to its use as it was before used." The terms of transfer employed in the assignment before us are not less comprehensive than those employed in Bankrupt or Insolvent Laws, which declare what property of the bankrupt or insolvent shall pass to the assignee; and yet, in cases occurring under those laws, it has been repeatedly held that the right to a trade-mark, not personal in its character, but which denotes simply the place or establishment at which the goods are manufactured, passes to the assignee. As an instance of this, we may refer to the case of Warren v. Warren Thread Co., 134 Mass. 247. The Insolvent Law of Massachusetts provided that "the assignment shall vest in the assignee all the property of the debtor, real and personal, which he could have lawfully sold, assigned, or conveyed." Upon this provision of the Insolvent Law the supreme court of that State held that, as the trade-marks there involved were designs or symbols designating the place or the establishment at which the thread was manufactured, and not implying any peculiar personal skill in the manufacturer designing them, they passed to the assignee of the insolvent. In that case the court said: "Under this Statute, all the plaintiff's property which he could assign passed to his assignee. It includes, ex vi termini, his manufacturing establishment, machinery, tools, and fixtures, manufactured goods, and the right to use the trade-mark in connection with the establishment and goods." And, if a trade-mark will pass in such case, there can be no reason why it should not pass in a case such as the present, where the object of the assignment is virtually the same as that provided for by the Insolvent Law, and where the terms of the assignment are equally comprehensive as those declaring the effect of the assignment under that law. There are many cases to the same effect as that just referred to, but to which we need only refer by name. Hudson v. Osborne, 39 L. J. Ch. 79; Pepper v. Labrot, 8 Fed. Rep. 29; Atlantic Milling Co. v. Robinson, 20 Fed. Rep. 217. And having determined that the deed of assignment, by legal operation, passed the good-will of the business, with the brand or trade-mark thereof, with the right and power in the trustee to sell the same with the manufacturing establishment, we can perceive no difficulty in holding that, under the advertisement of sale, the trustee sold the good-will and trade-mark of the business to the same full extent as they came to him under the assignment. They formed part, though but incidents, of the property assigned to him; and the purchasers, upon the ratification of the sale, will acquire the exclusive right to such good-will and trade-mark of the business as fully and in like manner as the same were used and enjoyed by the manufacturing company for the assignment. It follows that the pro forma order appealed from must be reversed. Order reversed, and cause remanded.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

George C. ALTGELT, Appt.,
v.
CITY OF SAN ANTONIO et al.

1. A city with power to provide for itself a water supply cannot contract to give a water company the exclusive right to furnish such supply for a term of years.

2. A taxpayer cannot maintain a suit to set aside a city's water supply contract although it is void for granting a monopoly, unless he shows injury to himself as a taxpayer,—as, that he is thereby compelled to get water from the grantee or is prevented from getting it on better terms.

3. A city cannot exempt a water-works company from taxation in consideration

NOTE.—Municipality cannot create a monopoly. It is abundantly settled that a municipality, acting under charter rights granted by legislative enactment, cannot create a monopoly, unless the power so to do is clearly indicated by the recitals of said charter. New Orleans C. R. Co. v. Crescent City R. Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 308, 5 Fed. Rep. 160; Meadville Fuel Gas Co. v. Meadville Nat. Gas Co. (Pa.) 8 of the furnishing by it to the city of water at a reduced rate.

4. To restrain the collection of taxes made excessive by an illegal exemption, the tax-payer must show the amount of the excess, or facts from which such amount may be computed.

A PPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the District Court for Bexar County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to procure the cancellation of a certain contract and to enjoin the collection of an alleged illegal tax assessment. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. George C. Altgelt, appellant, in propria persona:

The contract granting the exclusive right for twenty-five years to supply said City with water, and the supplemental contract by which the property of the corporation is released from city taxation, are unauthorized by law, and are void as against public policy. Equity will interfere to restrain the performance of such contracts at the suit of one or more taxpayers of the City.

It is now universally conceded that "powers are conferred on municipal corporations for public purposes; and, as their powers cannot be delegated, so they cannot be bargained or bartered away. Such corporations may make authorized contracts, but they have no power, as a party, to make contracts or pass by-laws which shall cede away, control, or embarrass their legislative or governmental powers, or which shall disable them from performing their public duties." Dillon, Mun. Corp. 97.

An Act authorizing a board of town auditors to cause the streets of the town to be lighted with gas and to enter into a contract for that purpose, does not confer a power to make an absolute binding contract for a term of years, but only subject to a termination thereof by a modification or repeal by subsequent legislation of the provision giving the power. Richmond County Gas-Light Co. v. Middletown, 50 N. Y. 228.

A taxpayer of a municipal corporation may maintain a suit to enjoin the corporate authorities from entering into an unauthorized contract. Sackett v. New Albany, 88 Ind. 478, 2 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 85; Madison v. Smith, 83 Ind. 502; Noble v. Vincennes, 42 Ind. 125; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 922.

While a city has authority to make contracts for a supply of water for the public use. Vincennes v. Callender, 86 Ind. 484.

The authority is, in a general sense, a discretionary one, and is by no means without limitation. The authority is so far of a discretionary character as to authorize the corporate officers to determine when the wants of the city demand a supply of water, and with this decision courts cannot interfere. But the power cannot be so exercised as to create a corporate debt beyond that limited by law, nor can it be so exercised as to surrender or suspend legislative power. Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1, 7 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 627.

Though the use of a street for water mains may not be of common right, yet when the use would assist in the maintenance of a claim of exclusive right to sell water, the courts, in view of the constitutional declaration that monopolies "shall never be allowed," will give no sanction to a contract entered into by the city resulting in a monopoly. The exercise of such a franchise, involving, as it does, a use of the public streets, is subject to control. Brenham v. Brenham Water Co. 67 Tex. 545. Compare Norwich Gas Light Co. v. Norwich City Gas Co. 25 Conn. 19; State v. Cincinnati Gas Light & C. Co. 18 Ohio St. 232; Memphis v. Memphis Water Co. 5 Heisk. 495; Crescent City Gas Light Co. v. New Orleans Gas Light Co. 27 La. Ann. 138; Anderson, Law Dict. title, Monopoly.

This question was argued with great skill and thoroughness in State v. Cincinnati Gas-Light & C. Co. 18 Ohio St. 232. Where the charter conferred on the gas company power "to manufacture and sell gas, to lay pipes," etc., provided the consent of the city council be obtained for that purpose. Under a power given to the city council "to cause said city, or any part thereof, to be lighted with oil or gas," and to levy a tax for that purpose, it contracted to invest the defendant with the full and exclusive privilege of lighting the city for the term of twenty-five years. It was held that, while there was no doubt that the city might by contract provide for lighting by gas, there was no necessity for making such right exclusive, and that the city had no authority to make the grant.

Judge Brewer holds that, in the absence of express authority in its charter, the City of Kansas had no power to grant to a street railway company the sole right, for the space of twenty-one years, to construct, maintain, and operate its railway over and along the streets of the said city. *Jackson County H. Messrs. Denman & Franklin, for appellee:

The City of San Antonio has authority under its charter to enter into a contract with a corporation or an individual to supply it with water for fire protection and other public purposes.

Brenham v. Brenham Water Co. 67 Tex. 542.

The contract complained of by appellant in his petition does not create a monopoly and is not void.

Rep. 893; Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394; Memphis v. Memphis Water Co. 5 Heisk. 495.

In making such contract the city exercises its business and not its legislative powers. An individual may sell his services for a term of years, or may agree to receive a certain commodity exclusively from one person for a term of years, and neither contract will create a monopoly. If this be true, a municipality, whenever it is authorized to act as an individual, has the same power to make such a contract.

See Greenhood, Pub. Pol. 676, 677; Gale v. Kalamazoo, 23 Mich. 344, 9 Am. Rep. 84; Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1; Indianapolis v. Indianapolis Gas Light & C. Co. 66 Ind. 396; Dillon, Mun. Corp. 3d ed. §§ 473, 474, note.

The power to contract being in the City, it must be held to have discretion as to the character of contract to be made under the power. In the exercise of that power it could bind itself for twenty-five years, and its action in so doing would not be void.

Memphis v. Dean, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 64, 19 L. ed. 326; Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1, 49 Am. Rep. 419; Pelestine v. Barnes, 50 Tex. 551; East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gas-Light & C. Co. 98 Ill. 415, 38 Am. Rep. 97.

If the City has exceeded its authority in making a contract running for twenty-five years, that does not vitiate the whole contract, although the courts may refuse to enforce it for the full term. The difference between acts done ultra vires that are void, and those that are simply voidable, must be kept in mind.

See Miners Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal.

543, 99 Am. Dec. 379; McPherson v. Foster, 43 Iowa, 48, 22 Am. Rep. 215; East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gas-Light & C. Co. 98 Ill. 415, 38 Am. Rep. 97; *State Board of Agriculture v. The term complained of in the contract does not "exempt" the property of defendant from taxation in the sense in which the word "exempt" is used in the State Constitution. The effect of the contract is that the water-works company is permitted to pay in water what it might otherwise be required to pay in money. The exemption is not a gift, but full consideration is paid therefor. It is not an exemption, it is a trade.

Appellant is not entitled, as a municipal taxpayer, to the relief asked by him.

If the exemption from taxation complained of is illegal, the whole tax levy would not be void.

McPherson v. Foster, 43 Iowa, 48, 22 Am. Rep. 235; Cooley, Taxn. 537, and note 3.

If the contract complained of is not void but only voidable, appellant cannot ask this court to direct the municipal authorities to avoid it. It is within the discretion of those authorities to either adopt or reject a voidable act of their predecessors, and this discretion is not subject to control by the courts.

2 High, Inj. p. 813; Waterbury v. Laredo, 60 Tex. 523.

Hobby, J., filed the following opinion:

The appellant brought this suit in the District Court of Bexar County to vacate a contract set forth at length in his petition, and entered into by the City of San Antonio with the San Antonio Water-Works Company, incorporated under the general laws of this State. The appellant also sought to restrain said City from paying to said Company any of the municipal funds by virtue of said contract, which was alleged to be illegal and unauthorized, and from making any appropriation of public money to satisfy said contract. The defendant's exceptions to the petition were sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, the cause was dismissed, and this appeal is the result. It will be unnecessary to state all of the grounds upon which the exceptions were predicated, or to set forth the entire petition. So much of the pleadings will be referred to as is thought to be essential to a proper understanding of the question arising out of them.

It appears from the petition that on or about the 3d of October, 1877, the City of San Antonio entered into a contract in writing with what is now known as the "San Antonio Water-Works Company" for the purpose, as stated in the preamble of the contract, "of supplying said City with water for fire protection, sanitary, public, and domestic purposes, said company using the head of the San Antonio River as a source of supply." By the first section of the contract it was provided, in substance, that the company would erect the necessary buildings and machinery, etc., upon land to be set aside by the City for that purpose, to accomplish the object in view. The second section provided for a system of pipage, etc., to be laid from the source of the supply of water, and for the distribution of the water throughout the City, and the location of fire hydrants at such points as the city council might decide to be proper. The third made provisions also for laying pipes, main conductors, aqueducts, etc., to conduct water throughout the City, and for the necessary buildings and machinery. The fourth section stipulated that such additional hydrants should be erected as were required by the city council. The fifth section provided for flushing the gutters on streets, and sprinkling said streets, and for supplying water for the fire department, etc. The sixth section guaranteed that the works should be of the most durable material, etc., and capable of affording a supply to the citizens of the City of a specified number of gallons, etc. The seventh prescribes the time within which the work shall be completed, and provides for the erection of a reservoir. The eighth section regulates the rate at which water will be supplied to private consumers. Such is a synopsis of the obligations entered into by the water-works company. The first section of that part of the contract containing the grants, etc., made by the City, provided for a lease of six acres of land to the company for a reservoir. The second conceded to the company full power to enter upon the streets, squares, alleys, etc., and to take up pavements, etc., to lay pipes and construct culverts, to conduct and distribute the water, etc., giving the company the right of way, free of cost, over all public grounds controlled by the City. The third was as follows: "The said City further obligated itself not to grant to any other body of men or persons, during the continuance of said contract, the right to furnish water for fire hydrants or other public purposes." The sixth section provided, among other things, "that said contract should subsist for a period of twenty-five years from the completion of said works, at the end of which time said City should have the right to buy the works at an appraised value; but, if said City did not buy at the end of twenty-five years, said contract should run until the works are finally purchased, and the right to purchase the same should inure to the City every five years thereafter, after giving twelve months' notice."

The water-works, except the reservoir, were to be completed not later than July, 1878. A supplemental contract was entered into between the City and the company in January, 1881, by the terms of which it was stipulated that, for the use of the 100 fire hydrants then established in accordance with the first contract, the City should pay an annual rent of $50 each, instead of $100, as originally required. "And, in consideration of said reduction of the rent of said 100 fire hydrants, the said City further remitted and relinquished to the water-works company all city taxes whatever, which might otherwise be assessed and levied upon any of the property of said water-works company, and owned or held by said company for the purpose of operating their works, such property, however, not to exceed in value the sum of $250,000; so that said water-works company should be discharged from the payment of all city taxes during the continuance of the original contract aforesaid, by the terms thereof." The petitioner further alleged that these contracts were illegal, and against public policy, because they attempted to create a monopoly on the part of said water-works company to supply water to said city, and because they attempted to exempt from taxation by said City the property of said defendant (the water-works company), which otherwise would be liable to taxation as other property within said municipal corporation. He further alleges that, "by exempting the property of said San Antonio Water-Works Company from taxation, the rate of taxation upon property within said City is increased, and continues to be increased; and that thereby petitioner, and all other inhabitants and taxpayers of said City, have been compelled to pay higher taxes than he and they would otherwise be compelled to do; and that such taxation, increased as aforesaid, will continue unless the injunction hereinafter prayed for is granted. Petitioner avers that since the making of said supplemental contract said City of San Antonio has exempted from taxation the property of its said co-defendant to the value of $250,000, and will continue so to exempt the same unless the relief hereinafter prayed for is granted. Petitioner further shows by the grant or supposed grant of exclusive privileges to said San Antonio Water-Works Company by said City all competition is avoided, and that in consequence thereof excessive and unreasonable rates and prices for water are charged and collected from the inhabitants of said city, including petitioner."

The exceptions of the appellee to the plaintiff's petition, which were sustained by the court, raise the following questions: Was the contract set forth in the petition, and entered into between the City of San Antonio and the water-works company, unauthorized and invalid because it attempted to create a monopoly and an exclusive privilege upon the part of said company to furnish said water, and because the city council could not impair and embarrass the exercise of the power conferred on said City by its charter to provide water for said City? And was it also illegal because it attempts to exempt from taxation by said City the property of said water-works company? If for the above reasons, or either of them, it is determined that the contract was illegal, then the next question is whether this suit can be maintained by plaintiff under the allegations contained in his petition. If under either of them it can be, the judgment should be reversed. In so far as the first question above mentioned is involved, there is no material distinction between this case and that of Brenham v. Brenham Water Co., 67 Tex. 545, where it was decided.

Without attempting to enumerate the different provisions of the contracts respectively entered into by these cities, and the sections of their charters authorizing said cities to enter into contracts to supply the inhabitants and the cities with water, and without citing the statutes which were looked to in the case cited in determining this question, it will be sufficient to say that said charters and contracts are substantially the same, and the statutes referred to are the same, and are now in force. It follows, therefore, that, for the reasons given and elaborated in that case by Chief Justice Stayton, the contract in the case under consideration is illegal and unauthorized. But it does not follow, we think, in this case because the contract is, as alleged by plaintiff, unauthorized and illegal, and creates a monopoly, or attempts so to do, and surrenders for the period of twenty-five years the legislative power with which the city is invested, that for these reasons alone the plaintiff can in this suit vacate or set aside said contract. In the case mentioned the suit was by the water-works company to enforce the contract. This was resisted by the City of Brenham upon the ground that it attempted to create a monopoly, and was a surrender of the legislative power in the City with reference to that subject for twenty-five years. In the case under consideration the City is not complaining. On the contrary, the contract is recognized by the City, and, as long as it is so recognized by the City through its properly constituted authorities, it cannot be vacated by plaintiff upon these grounds. The plaintiff does not show by his averments that he, as a taxpayer of the City, is authorized to maintain this action by reason of any injury resulting to him from the contract of October, 1877, entered into by the City of San Antonio. It does not appear from the petition that he is prevented from obtaining water upon any better terms, nor does it appear that he is compelled under the terms of that contract to get water from the defendant water-works company, only we do not mean to say that a taxpayer of a municipal corporation cannot maintain a suit like the present, under proper averments showing injury to him as such taxpayer, resulting from an illegal and unauthorized contract. But the petition does not present such a case with respect to the contract originally entered into by the City, in October, 1877. It does sufficiently appear, however, from the allegations of the petition, that the release from or exemption by the City of San Antonio of the property of the defendant water-works company during the continuance of the contract, which is alleged to have been done under the supplemental contract of January, 1881, operates to the injury of plaintiff. It is shown that this exemption of said property, valued at $250,000, resulted in increasing the rate of taxation upon property in the City, and that thereby petitioner, and all other inhabitants and taxpayers of said City, have been, and will continue to be, compelled to pay higher taxes than they would otherwise be required to do. That the City of San Antonio did not have the power to exempt this property from taxation is well settled in the case of Austin v. Austin Gas Light & C. Co., 69 Tex. 187. In the same case it was held that the power to commute taxes was but an incident of the power to exempt, and, as the latter power did not exist, so the incidental power must be denied. This is decisive of the question in this case.

We are of opinion that, under the plaintiff's allegations of injury resulting to him as a taxpayer from the exemption by the City of the property of the water-works company, thereby increasing the rate of taxation on his property, and compelling him to pay higher taxes than he would otherwise be required to do, he is entitled to maintain this suit; and there was error in dismissing it; and for the error in dismissing the suit we think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Stayton, Ch. J.:

Report of the commission of appeals examined, their opinion adopted, and the judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

A rehearing was subsequently granted and on June 19, 1891, Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the last term of the court at this place the judgment in this case, upon the report and opinion of the commission of appeals, was reversed, and the cause remanded. Both parties having insisted that there was error in the opinion and judgment of the court, and moved that they be set aside, a rehearing was granted. A reconsideration has not changed our opinion upon the main questions in the case, but we now think that we were in error in holding the allegations in the petition sufficient to authorize a judgment for appellant enjoining the collection of taxes assessed against him in excess of what they would have been if the exemption from taxation had not been allowed the water company. The plaintiff nowhere avers the amount of such excess, nor does he allege any other facts or amounts from which the excess may be arrived at by a mathematical calculation. In this respect the petition is not sufficient to support an action to restrain the collection of illegal taxes. In such cases, the amount of the unlawful assessment must be averred. In fact, it is apparent from the form of the petition and the prayer that the object of the suit was not merely to enjoin the collection of excessive taxes. Except upon this question we stand by the conclusions announced in the former opinion. It held that the suit was maintainable only as an action to restrain the collection of an excessive tax assessment resulting from an illegal exemption. We hold that it is not good for that purpose, and it follows that the judgment shall be affirmed. It is due to the commission of appeals and to the learned judge who wrote the former opinion to say that this court is responsible for the error in that opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

M. J. P. DEMPSEY, Exr., etc., of Casper
H. Borgess, Deceased,

Isaac PFORZHEIMER et al., Appts.

1. One who sells another goods on credit during the interval between the making and recording of a mortgage on the latter's stock in favor of a third person under which no possession was taken, and who after the recording of such mortgage takes another mortgage on the stock to secure his claim, under which he takes possession, has a right to the stock which is superior to that of the first mortgagee, under How. Stat., § 6193.
2. The cancellation of an indebtedness and substitution for it of a new contract is not shown by the taking of notes for its amount secured by mortgage, although the notes are payable at different future dates and the mortgage provides for future indebtedness, if an intention to cancel is not directly shown and there were no subsequent dealings, while the entire indebtedness was to become payable at once on default as to any installment.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of plaintiff's interest in a stock of jewelry. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dickinson, Thurber & Stevenson, for appellants:

The court, in construing section 6193 of Howell's Statutes, has held that it was designed to protect and afforded protection, not only to those who obtained judgment or levy of attachment between the date of the giving and the date of the filing of the chattel mortgage, but that those who became creditors

NOTE.—Chattel mortgage; registration and filing equivalent to delivery.

Under the statutes of several States, registration or filing the mortgage is equivalent to delivery of the property. Sturgis v. Warren, 11 Vt. 433; Morrill v. Sanford, 49 Me. 593; Bullock v. Williams, 16 Pick. 33; Shurtleff v. Willard, 19 Pick. 202; Frank v. Miner, 50 Ill. 444; Crooks v. Stuart, 2 McCrary, 13; Field v. Baker, 12 Blatchf. 433; Morrow v. Reed, 30 Wis. 81; Donaldson v. Johnson, 2 Chand. (Wis.) 160.

The mortgage must either be filed as the law requires, or the mortgagee must take possession of the property. The taking of possession is sufficient. Morrow v. Reed, 30 Wis. 81; Cooper v. Brook, 41 Mich. 488; Gill v. Griffith, 2 Md. Ch. 270; Waite v. Mathews, 50 Mich. 392; Fromme v. Jones, 13 Iowa, 474; Gregg v. Sanford, 24 Ill. 17.

As between the parties themselves, it is not necessary that a chattel mortgage should be filed or recorded. Beeman v. Lawton, 37 Me. 543; Lemay v. Williams, 32 Ark. 198; McTaggart v. Rose, 14 Ind. 230; Hall v. Snowhill, 14 N. J. L. 8; Fuller v. Page, 26 Ill. 358; Wilson v. Leslie, 20 Ohio, 161; Kilbourne v. Fay, 29 Ohio St. 264; Douglass v. Vogeler, 6 Fed. Rep. 53; Winsor v. McLellan, 2 Story, 492; Coggeshall v. Potter, 1 Holmes, 75; Griffin v. Wertz, 2 Ill. App. 437; Hudson v. Warner, 2 Harr. & G. 415; Hodgeson v. Butts, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 133, 2 L. ed. 391; Merrick v. Avery, 14 Ark. 370.

But a chattel mortgage which is not recorded within ten days after its execution is void as to a third person, although such person has actual notice of its existence. Ross v. Menefee, 125 Ind. 432.

Validity under Recording Acts.

The Registry Acts do not make a chattel mortgage absolutely void for omission to file it, but simply declare it void as to judgment creditors and 13 L. R. A. subsequent purchasers in good faith. As to other persons it is valid without filing. Steele v. Benham, 84 N. Y. 634; Thompson v. Van Vechten, 27 N. Y. 568; Porter v. Parmley, 62 N. Y. 185; Hayman v. Jones, 7 Hun, 238; Fraser v. Gilbert, 11 Hun, 634; Moses v. Walker, 2 Hilt. 539; Johnson v. Jeffries, 30 Mo. 423; Kohl v. Lynn, 34 Mich. 390; Hackett v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 85; Gill v. Pinney, 12 Ohio St. 38.

An attaching creditor having actual knowledge of a prior bona fide chattel mortgage made by his debtor is bound by it, although the record of the mortgage is erroneously indexed. Kern v. Wilson (Iowa) May 13, 1891.

A chattel mortgage is valid, though not filed, against the claim of a general creditor which has never been reduced to judgment. Button v. Rathbone, 43 Hun, 147.

If made in good faith it will be sustained against a voluntary assignee for the benefit of the creditors of the mortgagor. Wilson v. Esten, 1 New Eng. Rep. 18, 14 R. I. 621.

A chattel mortgage not on file or recorded as required by statute is not void as against a wrongdoer. Johnson v. Jeffries and Moses v. Walker, supra.

That a chattel mortgage is not recorded is not a defense that can be made by the administrator or heir of the mortgagor, though his estate is insolvent. Mayer v. Myers (Ind.) May 25, 1891.

When personal property is mortgaged without a delivery thereof to the mortgagee, and the mortgage is not recorded, a party who buys the property of the mortgagor and takes possession of it, although he has knowledge of the mortgage, will hold it against the mortgagee. Crawford v. Harter, 5 West. Rep. 37, 22 Mo. App. 631.

The rule that an unrecorded chattel mortgage is void as against subsequent good-faith purchasers applies in favor of a creditor who, in ignorance of whilst the mortgage is not filed are protected as well.

Fearey v. Cummings, 41 Mich. 888.

The contention that the defendants could not establish the invalidity of the Borgess mortgage, except by attachment or execution levy upon the property, and that attack could not be made under the lien created by the chattel mortgage executed to the defendants, is not well founded.

Putnam v. Reynolds, 44 Mich. 114.

The rule in equity, requiring a preceding judgment at law, is purely an equitable one based on the fact that unless there be a debt due the complainant, he has no ground of complaint; that the existence as an unsecured debt can only be made certain by means of a judgment that a court of chancery cannot render this judgment. It follows, therefore, that a prior judgment establishing the plaintiff's claim of indebtedness should not be required in a proceeding in a court possessing power and authority to investigate and determine the validity of the claim.

Bump, Fraud. Conv. p. 521; Reese River S. Min. Co. v. Atwell, L. R. 7 Eq. 347.

The prior judgment, where required, serves two purposes. It established the indebtedness, and further enables a direct lien upon specific property to be obtained by the levy of "process," i. e., execution. It follows that where it is not needed to prove the debt, it is not needed at all, provided "process" other than execution or liens otherwise created, will suffice. Process is anything that will create the desired lien—not necessarily judicial process.

See Fearey v. Cummings, 41 Mich. 888; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 524, citing cases; Hastings v. Belknap, 1 Denio, 190; Frisbey v. Thayer, 25 Wend. 396; Coles v. Marquand, 2 Hill, 447; Slocum v. Clark, 2 Hill, 475; Martin v. Black, 9 Paige, 641, 4 L. ed. 848; Hanes v. Tiffany, 25 Ohio St. 549.

All that the law requires to enable a creditor to assail a mortgage for want of filing, is that he shall in some manner have acquired, or at least asserted, the right to have his debts satisfied out of certain specific property, and this right is denominated a lien. What lien can be more certain, specific and binding than a mortgage by which the debtor gives absolute authority to his creditor to seize and dispose of his property.

See Brown v. Brabb, 10 West. Rep. 892, 67 Mich. 17; Root v. Hart, 62 Mich. 420.

Messrs. Keena & Lightner, for appellee:

As against all persons, except such as can bring themselves within the terms of the Statute, plaintiff's mortgage was perfectly valid.

Brown v. Brabb, 10 West. Rep. 892, 67 Mich. 17; Jones, Chat. Mort. § 251.

Defendants must claim either as "creditors of the mortgagors," or as "subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith."

That they cannot claim as subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith seems apparent from the fact that they took their mortgage with full notice of plaintiff's mortgage.

Kohl v. Lynn, 84 Mich. 860; American Cigar Co. v. Foster, 36 Mich. 368, 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 208.

As to their being creditors they asserted their the mortgage, receives a portion of his debtor's stock of goods in payment of his debt. Button v. Rathbone, supra.

A chattel mortgage registered in the county where made, but not in the county to which the mortgagee consents that the mortgagor may remove the chattels, is void as to a purchaser or mortgagee thereof in the latter county without actual notice of the prior mortgage. Reed v. Spikes (Tex. App.) Nov. 12, 1890.

Effect of actual notice.

The general rule is that actual notice of an unrecorded mortgage dispenses with the necessity of filing. Nat. Bank of the Metropolis v. Sprague, 21 N. J. Eq. 590; *Steele v. Renewal of mortgage; rules in different States.

The object of refileing a chattel mortgage is merely to extend and continue in operation the effect of the first filing as to the amount remaining unpaid for another year. Dillingham v. Bolt, 37 N. Y. 200; Marsden v. Cornell, 62 N. Y. 219.

The statement must be made by the mortgagee; it cannot be made by the mortgagor or third persons. So the filing of a new mortgage in place of the old one is not sufficient. Osborn v. Alexander, 40 Hun, 328.

If the property remains in the hands of the mortgagor, the mortgagee must refile his mortgage within the year, although default has been made in the payment. Ely v. Carnley, 19 N. Y. 496; Steele v. Benham, 84 N. Y. 634; Porter v. Parmley, 52 N. Y. 187; Marsden v. Cornell, 62 N. Y. 219.

The Michigan statute requires the first renewal affidavit of a chattel mortgage to be made within thirty days next preceding the expiration of the year from the filing of the mortgage. Burrill v. Wilcox Lumber Co. 9 West. Rep. 115, 65 Mich. 571.

In Wisconsin, filing an affidavit more than thirty days before the expiration of two years from the filing of a chattel mortgage is not sufficient to keep the mortgage valid, under the statute requiring such affidavit to be filed within thirty days before such expiration. Rice v. Kahn, 70 Wis. 323.

In Ohio, a chattel mortgage not reverified and refiled within thirty days before the expiration of one year after the original filing, is void against creditors and bona fide purchasers and mortgagees. Cooper v. Koppes, 13 West. Rep. 465, 45 Ohio St. 625.

Refileing the mortgage four days after one year creates no lien against a levy in favor of an execution creditor made thereafter. Ibid.

On a failure to refile a chattel mortgage, as required by law, before the expiration of the year, the mortgage ceases to be valid against subsequent bona fide purchasers or creditors, and cannot be revived by any act of the parties so as to give it priority over other liens. Herder v. Walther, 29 N. Y. S. R. 410.

A chattel mortgage which was filed, but has not been renewed, is invalid as against bona fide purchasers or creditors. Gibson v. Ferris, 30 N. Y. S. R. 868.

In Kansas, a subsequent mortgagee who becomes such before the expiration of the year from the first filing of a prior chattel mortgage cannot take advantage of an omission to renew the latter within claim to the property under their mortgage. The benefit of the Statute can be invoked only by creditors who have a lien, by process, upon the property in question. The defendants were confessedly not such creditors.

Priority of lien.

A chattel mortgage, being first in date and first of record, is not affected by a parol agreement prior thereto, as to the order of priority of such mortgage and others which are made subsequent to it. Lazarus v. Henrietta Nat. Bank, 72 Tex. 354.

Under the Oregon statutes, in cases of successive chattel mortgages upon the same property, the one first filed is entitled to priority. Pittock v. Jordan, 19 Or. 7.

In Nebraska, the lien of a chattel mortgage continues between the parties so long as the debt subsists, although the mortgage is not filed or refiled, as required by the Nebraska statute. Sandford v. Mumford (Neb.) May 6, 1891.

Novation.

The validity of a chattel mortgage is not affected by the fact that it is given in place of old mortgages not recorded within the time required by statute, where such mortgages were executed to secure an existing indebtedness. Johnson v. Stellwagen, 10 West. Rep. 848, 67 Mich. 10.

A mortgagee occupies the position of mortgagee for a valuable consideration where the mortgage is taken for the surrender of a prior mortgage and accrued interest thereon. Constant v. Rochester University, 2 L. R. A. 784, 111 N. Y. 804.

A mortgagee who releases his mortgages and accepts a later mortgage covering also debts not secured by the first, supposing there were no other liens on the property, is not entitled to a reinstatement of the released mortgages, in the absence of any proof that he released them in reliance upon the mortgagor's representations. McKeen v. Haseltine (Minn.) July 1, 1891.

Novation is a substitution of a new obligation for an old one. See note to Spycher v. Werner (Wis.) 5 L. R. A. 414.

There must be a substitution of the new obligation for the old. See note to Pope v. Vajen (Ind.) 13 L. R. A.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 22d day of October, 1886, William H. Harris and Charles T. Karpp, in partnership in the general jewelry business in Detroit, and both residents of that city, borrowed $2,000 of Casper H. Borgess. To assure the payment of the same, they executed to him, under the firm name of Harris & Karpp, a chattel mortgage for that amount. Said mortgage was taken by said Borgess in good faith to secure such indebtedness, but it was not filed in the city clerk's office until December 26, 1887, at 9:08 o'clock A. M. This mortgage covered all the goods "now contained or hereafter to be contained" in the jewelry store; also the fixtures and safe therein; and was payable on or before October, 1889. On December 30, 1887, Harris & Karpp executed a mortgage to the defendants in this suit to secure a previous indebtedness incurred in the purchase of merchandise between the date of the execution and the filing of the Borgess mortgage; and said merchandise was sold by defendants in ignorance of the existence of the indebtedness to Borgess or the execution of the mortgage to him. The two mortgages embraced substantially the same property. The mortgage to defendants recited that it was to secure an indebtedness of $2,528.53, which was the amount of the merchandise sold as above. It also contained the following recital in addition: "And whereas, Mortgage of stock of goods.

A mortgage of all the goods, etc., in and about a certain building is valid as to all articles that can be identified. Pond v. Baker, 1 New Eng. Rep. 400, 58 Vt. 298.

A schedule annexed to the mortgage is a part of it, and where it refers to after-acquired property such property is included, and the lien of the mortgage thereon is superior to the lien of an execution subsequently levied upon the goods purchased after date of the mortgage. Page v. Kendig (N. J.) 6 Cent. Rep. 323.

In such case the lien attaches as soon as the property is acquired by the mortgagor. Ludlum v. Rothchild, 41 Minn. 218.

While a mortgage on a stock of merchandise may not be enforceable as to goods not in store at the time of the mortgage, such a mortgage having been enforced by the lower court without defense, this court cannot assume that the stock had been replenished, but must assume that the lien existed and was properly enforced. Hoffman v. Brunga, 83 Ky. 401.

A stipulation in a chattel mortgage that renewals to the stock should be deemed covered by a mortgage does not render the mortgage invalid on its face, but is ineffectual of itself to vest in the mortgagee a lien upon such after-acquired property. Fisher v. Syfers, 7 West. Rep. 918, 109 Ind. 514.

A contract of sale cannot be extended by implication, or be considered as creating a lien or mortgage upon goods bought by the purchaser after the date of the contract. Edwards v. Symons, 8 West. Rep. 784, 65 Mich. 849.

Where one in possession mortgages goods under circumstances which indicate him to be the absolute owner, to a third person who has knowledge of the rights of the true owner, the latter is not estopped to set up his claim against the mortgagee. Bray v. Flickinger, 69 Iowa, 167.

the said parties of the first part [Harris & Karpp] expect to buy from the parties of the second part [the defendants] from time to time, during the continuance of this mortgage, goods on time, and on such terms of credit as may be agreed upon; and whereas, the indebtedness of the said parties of the first part to said parties of the second part is therefore liable to change in amount and time of payment; and whereas, the said parties of the first part have agreed that the payment of the existing indebtedness of said parties of the first part to said parties of the second part, and also the payment of the other indebtedness for goods to be purchased by said parties of the first part from said parties of the second part, shall be secured in the manner hereinafter mentioned." The $2,528.58 was to be paid according to five promissory notes of even date with the mortgage, as follows: $500 in 60 days, $500 in 90 days, $500 in 4 months, $528.58 in 6 months, and $500 on demand. This mortgage was filed the same day it was executed, at 8:30 o'clock P. M. Subsequently defendants, by Henry T. Thurber, their attorney and agent, took possession of said stock, being the same described in both mortgages. Plaintiff's testator, by James T. Keena, at the time of the sale, demanded said stock under his mortgage. Defendants refused to deliver the same, and sold the same under their mortgage, expressly denying the validity of testator's mortgage, and in disregard of said mortgage. There was upon the property so sold by defendants, at the time of such sale, a chattel mortgage held by Eugene Deimel for $600, which was a prior lien to the defendants, and they sold such property under their chattel mortgage subject to the payment of the Deimel mortgage. The defendants were, at and during the time the merchandise aforesaid was sold to Harris & Karpp, merchants in New York City, selling jewelry, etc., at wholesale, and Harris & Karpp were conducting business of selling jewelry, etc., in Detroit, Mich., during such time, at retail. Such merchandise was sold in the usual course of business, and upon usual terms of sale. Plaintiff's testator thereupon brought this action of trover against defendants for the conversion of said stock, which at the time of the seizure and sale by defendants was worth $3,200. The defendants composed the copartnership of Pforzheimer, Keller & Co. No part of the principal or interest secured by the mortgage of plaintiff's testator has been paid. The original plaintiff having died, the cause was revived in favor of his executor. Defendants' plea was the general issue. The case was tried before Hon. George Gartner, one of the Wayne circuit judges, without a jury, who made a finding of law upon the facts, which were stipulated, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover against the defendants the sum of $2,520. It is plain, under the rulings of this court, that the Borgess mortgage was void for want of filing, as against the original indebtedness of Harris & Karpp to defendants, incurred while the mortgage was in existence and not filed, and for goods sold by defendants in the usual course of business, in ignorance of the existence of such mortgage. Fearey v. Cummings, 41 Mich. 388; Root v. Hart, 62 Mich. 420; Waite v. Mathews, 50 Mich. 392, 394; Wallen v. Roseman, 45 Mich. 333; Johnson 13 L. R. A.

v. Stellwagen, 67 Mich. 10, 14, 16, 10 West. Rep. 848; Brown v. Brabb, 67 Mich. 17, 10 West. Rep. 892; Talcott v. Crippen, 52 Mich. 683; Crippen v. Jacobson, 56 Mich. 386; Outler v. Steele, 85 Mich. 627.

If the defendants before taking their mortgage, and after the filing of the Borgess mortgage, had proceeded against the property so mortgaged, and obtained by any process of law a lien upon it, or had they obtained judgment upon their claim, and issued execution and levied on it, there can be no doubt but such lien or levy would have been good as against the Borgess mortgage. But it is claimed on behalf of plaintiff that, because defendants took a mortgage to secure the indebtedness to them, after the Borgess mortgage was put on file, and therefore had notice of it, they cannot now claim the benefit of the rule adopted by this court as shown above, and that they have no standing under the Statute upon which the rule is founded. It is contended that, to avail themselves of the Statute, the defendants, at the time of seizing the goods in question, must have the standing either as "creditors of the mortgagors" or as "subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith;"* that they cannot claim as subsequent mortgagees in good faith, because they took their mortgage with full notice of the Borgess mortgage, which had then been on record for four days; and that the benefit of the Statute cannot be invoked in favor of creditors, except by those who have a lien by process of law upon the property in question; and it is argued that a mortgage lien will not avail, except, perhaps, in equity. We are cited to People's Sav. Bank v. Bates, 120 U. S. 560, 30 L. ed. 756, and other cases, in support of this contention; but we can see no difference between a lien obtained by process and one gotten by consent of the owner through a chattel mortgage. If the defendants were entitled, as they undoubtedly were, to obtain a lien upon this property by legal process, and to hold it to the amount of such lien against the mortgage of Borgess, because the debt they were seeking to collect was made while this mortgage was withheld from record, we can see no reason in principle why they cannot hold the property under a lien obtained by chattel mortgage to secure the same indebtedness. A review of the cases in our own court upon this subject may not be unprofitable. The contention of plaintiff that, in order to take advantage of the non-filing of the Borgess mortgage, the defendants must first have a lien upon the property by process, is based upon language used in Thompson v. Van Vechten, 27 N. Y. 568, and that case has often been referred to in our decisions on this subject, and is considered a leading case. It was said "that the mortgage cannot be legally questioned until the creditor clothes himself with a judgment and execution, or with some legal process against his property, for creditors cannot interfere with the property of their debtors without process." Thompson v. Van Vechten, supra.

The gist of the reason is that the creditor has no business with the debtor's property until he has obtained possession of it by some legal process that gives him a lien upon it. This is not because of any right that the mortgagor, who has kept his mortgage from record, has against the other creditors, but because such creditors have no right to touch the debtor's property without his consent, without legal process; and when the debtor has turned out his property to a creditor in payment of his debt, or in pledge for its payment, or, as in this case, a chattel mortgage which authorizes him to take possession of it, it seems to me that the reason of the rule is satisfied, and that he has a right to defend against a prior mortgage which is void as against him. And I think some of our decisions decidedly tend in this direction, and that none of them militate against it.

In Fearey v. Cummings, 41 Mich. 383, Mr. Justice Graves uses this language: "Still no one as a creditor at large can question the mortgage. He can only do that by means of some process or proceeding against the property." Is not the taking into possession of mortgaged property under the mortgage, for the purposes of foreclosing, a "proceeding" against the property?

In Putnam v. Reynolds, 44 Mich. 114, the court refused to foreclose such a mortgage, declaring it void as to the mortgagor's creditors because it was kept from the record. The assignee for the benefit of creditors, who had no knowledge of this mortgage at the time the mortgagor made the assignment, defended against the mortgage. The complainant insisted that the assignee had no standing because his rights were no greater than the assignor's, and the mortgage was valid as against the mortgagor. Mr. Justice Cooley, in speaking of this claim, said: "The assignee is not a purchaser for value, and not a creditor, and even creditors, it is said, cannot attack the mortgage indirectly, through a seizure of the property by attachment or other suitable process. This is doubtless true where the invalidity of the mortgage arises from some fraud of the mortgagor; but whether the same rule will apply when the mortgage was originally valid, but is made void by the neglect of the mortgagee, may well be questioned. It would be easy to suggest weighty considerations arising in such cases, but not existing in the case of a fraudulent mortgage, and which it might well be thought should control. But we do not think the question fairly arises in this case." Here we have a pretty good index to the opinion of this learned jurist. It would seem that he doubted the necessity of any lien upon the property by the attacking or defending creditor in a case like the present.

In Root v. Potter, 59 Mich. 504, Chief Justice Campbell says: "It has always been held in this State that general creditors, having no judgment or lien on the debtor's property, cannot attack conveyances or other dealings for fraud,"—citing Tyler v. Peatt, 30 Mich. 63; Maynard v. Hoskins, 9 Mich. 485; Grincol v. Fuller, 33 Mich. 268.

In the present case, the defendants cannot be said to be general creditors. They are creditors having a lien on the property, and lawfully in possession under such lien. An examination of the cases above cited by Chief Justice Campbell will show that they have no bearing upon the question at issue here.

In Troubridge v. Bullard, 81 Mich. 451, Mr. Justice Long says: "It has many times been held by this court that general creditors having no judgment or lien upon the debtor's property cannot attack conveyances or other dealings for fraud,"—citing a number of Michigan cases, in addition to those cited in Root v. Potter, supra, to wit: McKibben v. Barton, 1 Mich. 213; Stoddard v. McLane, 56 Mich. 11; Scott v. Chambers, 62 Mich. 532; Krolík v. Root, 63 Mich. 562, 6 West. Rep. 364.

The main case is relied upon by plaintiffs in this case, but it does not touch the question here involved. The first case cited is of no importance to the issue here.

In Stoddard v. McLane an execution had been levied on personalty, and the aid of equity was invoked to set aside fraudulent conveyances of the property levied upon. Held, that a lien obtained by the levy of execution on personalty did not in general require the aid of equity for its enforcement, and that there was a remedy at law.

In Scott v. Chambers, 62 Mich. 532, Chief Justice Campbell uses this language: "It is the settled law of this State that creditors cannot attack the interest of third parties, alleged to have been obtained by fraud, until they have obtained a standing by legal proceedings, and, so far as these bonds are concerned, they could only be reached by judgment creditors."

This is the strongest language anywhere used in our Reports in favor of plaintiff's contention, but the case was one where a creditor was proceeding in equity against a receiver of an assignor for the benefit of creditors (who stood in the place of an assignee who failed to qualify under the assignment), for neglect, and making him, with the assignor and others, parties defendant, for the purpose of reaching and bringing under the assignment certain lands and other property, including two United States bonds issued in 1832 and 1885, to the wife of the assignor. It was held that the creditor had no right to implead the receiver without leave of the court, and no right to file the bill against the other parties, as that right belonged to the receiver alone. The property sought to be reached was in the name and possession of other parties than the debtor, and the language of the court was applicable to that case; but there is no reason why it should control this, where the property is lawfully in the hands of the defendants under a mortgage lien, reduced to possession for the purposes of foreclosure, and where the party assailed has a right to a standing in court to defend his right to possession, and to attack the alleged prior lien of the plaintiff.

In Krolík v. Root, the language of Justice Sherwood is: "The complainants in this case never obtained a lien upon the property in question, or any part thereof, so far as appears upon this record. They are not in a situation to attack the validity of the defendant's last mortgage, without such lien obtained in some manner."

In Crippen v. Jacobson, 56 Mich. 336, it was held that garnishee proceedings would reach assets covered by an unrecorded mortgage made before the debt was incurred for which the mortgagee is garnished, and the following language is used by Justice Campbell: "The law does not require previous proceeds to exhaust other remedies. The Garnishee Law is unconditional upon this subject, and garnishee proceedings will reach the assets if they exist. When the debt is not incurred on the credit of an apparently clear title, which is in fact covered by a secret mortgage, the cases cited hold that there is no right to complain of a subsequent mortgage, without taking some step which puts the creditor on a different legal footing than that of a quiescent party. But when a chattel mortgage exists, and is concealed, it is, under the Statute, void, for the reason that it produces a false appearance of solvency, when, in fact, the person known to have mortgaged his stock would not be as likely to get credit as one who had given no such security, and those who deal with such a debtor are liable to be defrauded by appearances. One who gives credit under such circumstances is necessarily exposed to that mischief, and the law has removed all questions of suspicion or notice by making chattel mortgages void, at all events, against creditors who deal with a debtor so situated. Such creditors are directly within the policy of the Statute."

In view of this language, it seems absurd to hold that such a creditor, having possession of the debtor's property under a chattel mortgage, cannot defend against a chattel mortgage absolutely void as to him, unless he goes further, and attaches the property, or takes some legal process other than the enforcement of his mortgage lien, under the power of sale in the mortgage to get a lien upon it.

In Root v. Harl, 62 Mich. 420, Harl & Stevens, merchants doing business at Muir, Mich., as copartners, had made an assignment. Chauncey Rumsey held a mortgage upon their stock. Between the date of this mortgage and its recording, Root & Co. and others gave credit to Harl & Stevens in ignorance of this mortgage. The complainants filed a bill for the appointment of a receiver of the assigned property, and claiming a preference of their debt, contracted as aforesaid, in ignorance of the unrecorded mortgage, over the Rumsey mortgage, because it was void under the Statute as against them. They had no lien, by legal process or otherwise, upon the property. They might be called "general creditors" of the debtors, except that they stood in a different relation to this mortgage than the others. In delivering the opinion in that case, it was said by Chief Justice Campbell that the "general creditors" could not attack the mortgage, but that Root & Co. could. "We have no doubt that, under our Statutes, any creditors have a right to avoid an unrecorded mortgage who have, during its absence from the record, done anything material which they may be fairly considered to have done on the basis of its non-existence." This doctrine was also enunciated in Brown v. Brabb, 67 Mich. 17, 10 West. Rep. 892, and in Johnson v. Stellwagen, 67 Mich.—(opinion of Justice Champlin at p. 14), 10 West. Rep. 848.

supra, that, when an assignment is made by a debtor for the benefit of creditors, such creditors—as are the defendants in this case—can, upon the equity side of the court, attack the unrecorded mortgage and obtain a preference over it, although they have no lien whatever upon the debtor's property; and that they are not "general creditors," in such a sense that they cannot attack the mortgage without first obtaining a lien, by legal process or otherwise. If this is so, why cannot such a creditor who has obtained a mortgage lien upon the property, and possession under it, defend against a void mortgage without resorting to legal process against the property? And why should he be compelled to relinquish his possession under such mortgage lien, or pay the amount of a void mortgage? In my opinion, there is no equity or justice in the plaintiff's claim in this case, and no law under which he can enforce it.

I do not think that the fact that the defendants obtained their mortgage after the mortgage of plaintiff's testate was put on file cuts any figure in the case. The mortgage was a security for the payment of the debt, against which the Borgess mortgage had no standing and was void. The rights of defendants were not at all impaired by the taking of this security, but the security gave them a lien upon and possession of the property out of which to make their debt. If, instead of giving this mortgage, the debtors had turned out to them enough of the property to pay the debt, I think no one would seriously contend that the holder of this void mortgage could have demanded the goods of them, and, if the demand was refused, have sued them in trover and recovered, although at the time the goods were so turned out to defendants the mortgage had been placed of record. I can see no difference in principle in the two cases.

But it is further contended that in taking this mortgage the defendants canceled the old indebtedness under which they might have claimed the benefit of the Statute, and with full knowledge of the Borgess mortgage, and its invalidity, as against their debt, not only extended the time of payment of the old indebtedness, but made a new contract, looking towards further dealings with Harris & Karpp, thereby waiving their rights under the Statute, and deliberately entering into another contract, to which the Statute would not apply to give them preference to the Borgess mortgage; that by this dealing they elected their remedy, and must abide by such election, and cannot sell the property under their mortgage, and also claim as creditors without notice. It does not appear by the record that the taking of this mortgage was a cancellation or extinguishment of the first indebtedness, nor can there be any presumption that the mortgage and notes were taken in payment and extinguishment of the original indebtedness. The presumption would be that they were taken as security rather than in payment. The recital in the mortgage, also securing indebtedness that might be credited thereafter, cuts no figure in the case, as there were no subsequent dealings between Harris & Karpp and the defendants. The mortgage recites that it is given in security of an indebtedness of $2,528.58, which is the exact amount of the indebtedness incurred between the dates of the execution and filing of the Borgess mortgage. Nor does the extension of the time of payment of the indebtedness alter the rights of the defendants as against the Borgess mortgage because such extension did not in any way impair the security of Borgess, or hinder him from proceeding to enforce such security, the same as if no extension had been granted by defendants in the payment of their debt. Furthermore, part of the debt was made payable on demand, and the mortgage provided that, in default of the payment of any of the indebtedness at the day named for its payment, the entire amount should become due and payable at once; and it would seem that there was really no extension, and the only thing in view and accomplished was the securing of defendants' claim by a mortgage lien, which would also give them possession of the property. We think, under the facts as stipulated, the defendants were entitled to the possession of the property as against the plaintiff, and to make their claim out of it by a sale of the property under such mortgage.

The judgment in favor of the plaintiffs is reversed, and a judgment will be entered here in favor of the defendants for the costs of both courts.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

E. O'CONNELL, Plff. in Err.,
v.

EAST TENNESSEE, VIRGINIA & GEORGIA R. CO.

(.....Ga.....)

Where a railway company erects an embankment for its track along the margin of a river, the accumulated waters of which, in times of flood, had previously escaped on that side, it being lower than the other, but which thereafter, and because of the embankment, overflowed the opposite side more than it had done before, and thus injured land there situate, the owner has a right of action against the company; or if, by the erection of such embankment, the river was deflected from its natural course, or deposits were made therein so as to raise its bottom, and from either of these causes such land was injured by the river when swollen, a recovery may be had for the damages thereby occasioned.

*Head note by LUMPKIN, J.

NOTE.—Facts of each case determine rights.

Each case must of necessity depend largely upon its own facts. Even in those States where the common law prevails the courts hold that the landowner must improve his property in a reasonable manner. Hosher v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 60 Mo. 329; Abbott v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 83 Mo. 271; Pettigrew v. Evansville, 25 Wis. 229.

But persons exercising this right to improve and ameliorate the condition of their own land must exercise it in a careful and prudent way. Each proprietor, in such case, is left to protect his own lands against the common enemy of all, so as to cause no unnecessary inconvenience or damage to plaintiff. McCormick v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 57 Mo. 433. See also Benson v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 78 Mo. 504.

The law prevailing in different States.

In some of the States the doctrine of the civil law has been adopted as the rule of decision. By that law, the right of drainage of surface waters, as between owners of adjacent lands of different elevations, is governed by the law of nature. The lower proprietor is bound to receive the waters which naturally flow from the estate above, provided the industry of man has not created or in-

ERROR to the Superior Court for Bibb County to review a judgment overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligently building an embankment which caused the waters of a river to overflow plaintiff's land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gustin, Guerry & Hall for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, for defendant in error:

It is important to note the distinction recognized by all courts between the water within the banks of a natural stream, and the water which in times of freshets overflows the boundary of the natural and ordinary channel of the stream, and rests or flows outside such boundary and upon the lands adjacent thereto. Such overflowing water upon the lands outside of the natural banks of the stream is recognized and classed as surface water. This recognition and classification is uniform.

creased the servitude. Corp. Jur. Civ. 39, title 3, §§ 2-5; Domat (Cush. ed.) 616; Code Napoleon, art. 640; Code Louisiana, art. 656.

The courts of Pennsylvania, Illinois, California and Louisiana have adopted this rule, and it has been referred to with approval by the courts of Ohio and Missouri. Martin v. Riddle, 26 Pa. 415; Kauffman v. Griesemer, Id. 407; Gillham v. Madison County R. Co. 49 Ill. 484; Gormley v. Sanford, 52 Ill. 159; Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 346; Delahousaye v. Judice, 18 La. Ann. 587; Hays v. Hays, 19 La. 351; Butler v. Peck, 16 Ohio St. 334; Laumier v. Francis, 23 Mo. 181.

On the other hand, the courts of Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Hampshire and Wisconsin have rejected the doctrine of the civil law, and hold that the relation of dominant and servient tenements does not by the common law apply between adjoining lands of different owners, so as to give the upper proprietor the legal right, as an incident of his estate, to have the surface water falling on his land discharged over the land of the lower proprietor, although it naturally finds its way there; and that the lower proprietor may lawfully, for the improvement of his estate and in the course of good husbandry, or to make erections thereon, fill up the low places on his land, although by so doing he obstructs or prevents the surface water from

See Shane v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 71 Mo. 238; Taylor v. Fickas, 64 Ind. 167; Broadbent v. Ramabotham, 11 Exch. 602.

The distinguishing principle is this: Water running within the natural banks of a stream is known as a living stream, to the equal enjoyment of which all persons are entitled through whose land it runs; and to protection from the overflow of the waters of which all such land-holders are entitled, whether caused by the obstruction or diversion of the same. On the other hand, all other waters from rain, melted snows, etc., wherever found outside the natural banks of a stream, are surface water, to be absolutely appropriated, if he sees fit, by the one on whose land it is found, or, if he prefers, to be fenced out or embanked against to keep it off his land, regarding it in the language of Lord Tenterden in Rex v. Pagham Comrs., 8 Barn. & C. 355, as "the common enemy," against which all are authorized to protect themselves, as the necessity of the case may require.

On this distinguishing principle rest the varying rules of servitude in the two cases, and from which, in the two cases, different rights, obligations, and liabilities necessarily result.

In examining into the nature of these rights, obligations, and liabilities, the fact must not be lost sight of that the rule establishing the same under the civil law is very different from that recognized and enforced by the common law.

In Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Louisiana, North Carolina and Iowa the rule of the civil law has been followed.

The contention that the landowners on the one bank owe a duty or obligation to the landowners on the opposite bank as respects the fending off of the overflow water, is based on the legal maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas." This maxim is found of force both in civil law and in the common law; but the construction of the rule in the former system of law is very different from that which is enforced in the latter.

The construction by the civil law writers and courts is expressed in the statement of the rule by Pothier: "Each of the neighbors may do upon his heritage what seemeth good to him, in such manner, nevertheless, that he doth not injure the neighboring heritage."

Customs of Orleans, chap. 13.

Under this broad construction of the rule, it may be generally stated that under the civil law any act is unlawful on one man's land which is injurious to another's land. From this rule are deduced the principles as to surface water: first, that the upper landowner cannot divert the flow of surface water so as to deprive the lower land-holder of the right to receive it in its natural flow; second, that the lower land-holder cannot embank against it so as to prevent its flowing on to his land from the upper landowner; and third, that the upper landowner cannot by any change or use of his own land cause surface water to flow on the land of his neighbor when it would not otherwise do so.

The construction of the maxim by the common-law courts is very different, and the rules deduced therefrom as to surface water are in direct conflict with those of the civil law above stated.

See Taylor v. Fickas, 64 Ind. 167, 31 Am. Rep. 114; Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49.

The simple fact that injury results to one does not give a right of action. Such injury to be actionable must result from the violation of some right existing in and belonging to the party injured.

Limiting the inquiry to the case of the erection of any kind of structure by one on his own land, the only "legal right" which can so exist in another as to make that structure unlawful, is some easement in the land, to the enjoyment of which that other is entitled, and through the interference with which that other receives injury and damage. Upon this principle rests the common-law doctrine of ancient lights.

See Bradbee v. London, 5 Scott, N. R. 120; Partridge v. Scott, 3 Mees. & W. 220; Wyatt v. Harrison, 3 Barn. & Ad. 871, 876; Brown v. Windsor, 1 Crompt. & J. 20.

passing thereon from the premises above, to the injury of the upper proprietor. Luther v. Winnisimmet Co. 9 Cush. 171; Parks v. Newburyport, 10 Gray, 28; Dickinson v. Worcester, 7 Allen, 19; Gannon v. Hargadon, 10 Allen, 106; Bowlsby v. Spear, 31 N. J. L. 351; Pettigrew v. Evansville, 25 Wis. 223; Hoyt v. Hudson, 27 Wis. 656; Swett v. Cutts, 50 N. H. 439.

Embankment must not occasion injury to others.

"While it is true that a riparian owner may erect bulwarks to protect his property from injury by the stream, yet they can only do this when it can be done without injury to others, either to an owner upon the opposite side of or to those above or below him on the stream." Wood, Nuisances, § 360, citing Gerrish v. Clough, 48 N. H. 9, where the defendant had erected a break-water upon his bank of the river to protect it from injury by the water, but the effect of this was to throw the water against another's land, so that in high water his land was washed away, and such injury was held actionable.

It is held by the Ohio court that "a railway company, like an individual, may, on his own land, lawfully cut a new channel for a stream of water and turn the stream into such new channel, if thereby no danger is caused to another; but when it so controls and directs the course of the stream that the water is thrown across the old channel and against and upon the land of another, and thereby causes damage to such other, the company is liable for such damage." Valley R. Co. v. Franz, 2 West. Rep. 368, 49 Ohio St. 623.

The court said in Livingston v. McDonald, 21 Iowa, 172, that "the rules of the civil law, . . . so far as they deny to the upper owner the right to collect the water in a body, or precipitate it in greatly increased or unnatural quantities upon his neighbor, to the substantial injury of the latter, we deem to be just and equitable; . . . and to this extent it is supported by the weight of authority in the common-law courts."

The law recognizes the general rule that each may do with his own as he pleases, but it also recognizes the qualification to that rule that each should so use his own as not to injure his neighbor. Id. 173.

The same principle, as applied to the obstructing of a flow of surface water from the dominant to the servient estate, was recognized in Drake v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 308. See notes to Jordan v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (Minn.) 6 L. R. A. 573; Haines v. Hall (Or.) 3 L. R. A. 609.

Upon this same principle is based the right of one man to have his house sustained by land of an adjacent landowner.

See Stansell v. Jollard, cited in Solomon v. Vintners Co. 4 Hurlst. & N. 585; Hide v. Thornborough, 2 Car. & K. 250.

The cases of the obstruction of lights not ancient, and of the excavation of ground up to land line, thereby causing the fall of a house of less than twenty years' standing, furnish illustrations of the familiar principle damnum absque injuria.

Humphries v. Brogden, 12 Q. B. 743; Tapping v. Jones, 11 H. L. Cas. 311.

Where one man's land owes a legal servitude to another man's property, that servitude cannot be interfered with by the owner of the land, even by an act otherwise lawful in itself; and if such servitude is interfered with, or destroyed, liability arises for the damage occasioned thereby to the other. But, unless there is such servitude due to another, the owner of the land may erect thereon such structure, lawful in itself, which he may deem to his interest.

This proprietary interest of one man in the land of another is "the legal right," which the law requires the owner of land to so regard that it shall not be injured or destroyed in the use of property otherwise lawful.

An analysis of all the decisions relative to the obstruction of streams will show that they necessarily rest on this rule of servitude, creating, so far as the bed of the stream is concerned, "the legal rights" of one man in the land of another man.

The low grounds adjacent to a river, but outside of its well-defined banks, do not owe any servitude to the waters resulting from rain, etc., in time of freshet, which do not flow within such banks, but which are found on such adjacent lands.

If such servitude is imposed by the law, it is perpetual in its obligations. It condemns these lands to unending slavery as the receptacle of waste, irregular, useless and vagrant waters. It is a lasting prohibition to the improvement and utilization of such lands. It extends to all structures on such lands, and to any change in the lands themselves by which the capacity of such lands to hold the water will be decreased. It extends to lands in the city, and to those in the country. On the border of the river no factories or mills could be erected, or any other building. In the cities no wharves could be built, nor could the lands ever be raised by filling in earth so that the same could be useful for streets, stores, and dwellings. The inhabitants in the lower part of a city could not be protected by levees from the inundations which would destroy their dwellings. In the country not only could no embankments or levees be raised, but the lowlands and marshes could not be filled up and made valuable for cultivation.

All authorities agree that the principles applicable to running streams, or watercourses, are not applicable to questions affecting mere surface water—rain-water or melting snow.

Washb. Easem. p. 489; Angell, Watercourses, § 108 a; Flagg v. Worcester, 13 Gray. 601; Parks v. Newburyport, 10 Gray, 28; Luther v.

Winnisimmet Co. 9 Cush. 174; Mellen v. Western R. Corp. 4 Gray, 301; Perry v. Worcester, 6 Gray, 546; Gannon v. Hargadon, 10 Allen, 106; Goodale v. Tuttle, 20 N. Y. 459; Hoyt v. Hudson, 27 Wis. 656; Bowleby v. Speer, 31 N. J. L. 851; Dickinson v. Worcester, 7 Allen, 19; Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49; Sweett v. Cutts, 50 N. H. 489, 9 Am. Rep. 276; Delhi v. Youmans, 50 Barb. 316; Waffle v. New York Cent. R. Co. 58 Barb. 413.

The rule of the common law is that no legal right of any kind can be claimed, jure natura, in the flow of surface water, so that neither its retention, diversion, nor repulsion is an actionable injury, even though damage ensue.

Bowleby v. Speer, 31 N. J. L. 351; Taylor v. Fickas, 64 Ind. 167, 81 Am. Rep. 114; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hammer, 22 Kan. 763, 31 Am. Rep. 216; Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214, 37 Am. Rep. 241; Greatrex v. Hayward, 8 Exch. 291; Raustron v. Taylor, 11 Exch. 369; Broadbent v. Ramsbotham, 11 Exch. 602; Dickinson v. Worcester, 7 Allen, 19; Parks v. Newburyport, 10 Gray, 28; Luther v. Winnisimmet Co. 9 Cush. 171; Ashley v. Wolcott, 11 Cush. 192; Shields v. Arndt, 42 N. J. Eq. 284.

Both by the civil law and the common law it is unlawful for one to collect surface water into ditches, sewers, etc., and in this concentrated form discharge it on the lower landowner. Goldsmith v. Elsas, 53 Ga. 186.

But this rule does not in any manner conflict with the general rule governing surface water and the flow thereof. This general rule is recognized in Georgia.

Phinizy v. Augusta City Council, 47 Ga. 260.

There being no servitude due by the lowlands of a river to the overflow waters of a freshet from excessive rains, etc., there is no "legal right" in the owners on the opposite side of the river which is violated when such overflow waters are fended off from such lowlands, and in consequence no right of action for any supposed or real injury resulting therefrom. If there is any such actual injury it is damnum absque injuria.

That the rule of the civil law is otherwise is indisputable, but the common law is the law of Georgia.

One of the strongest cases maintaining the rule of the civil law, Shane v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 71 Mo. 237, 36 Am. Rep. 480, is overruled in Abbott v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 83 Mo. 271. See also Martin v. Jett, 12 La. 508; Somers v. Shift, 15 La. Ann. 300.

In the case before the court there is no ponding of water on the same side of the stream, and the effect of the embankment complained of is to turn the overflow water into the channel of the stream. This it is legitimate to do.

Slater v. Fox, 5 Hun, 544; Harding v. Whitney, 40 Ind. 379; Wheeler v. Worcester, 10 Allen, 591.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The precise question in this case is whether the owner of land on the bank of a river can without liability erect on his own land an embankment which increases the overflow in times of flood upon the lands of the opposite proprietor, to the injury thereof; or is there any duty for each owner to receive upon his land the share allotted it by nature of the flood-waters of the river? It is contended by defendant's counsel that the overflow from a river in time of flood or freshet is surface water, against which, by the common law, a man may protect himself without regard to the consequences to his neighbor. Many cases cited by him make a distinction between the common law and the civil law as to surface water; the former allowing the landowner to dispose of it in any way, the latter restraining him from so using it as to injure his neighbor's tenement. There is authority to show that there is no difference between the common and the civil law in this respect, but that the common follows the civil law. Gillham v. Madison County R. Co. 49 Ill. 484; Gormley v. Sanford, 52 Ill. 159; and the able opinion in Boyd v. Conklin, 54 Mich. 588.

There is much conflict in the American cases (Washb. Easem. p. 485, *353 et seq.), the majority of the States seeming to follow the so-called "civil-law rule." Thus it is material to consider whether the overflow, as above stated, is properly classed with surface water. This depends upon the configuration of the country, and the relative position of the water after it has gone beyond the usual channel. If the flood-water becomes severed from the main current or leaves the stream, never to return, and spreads out over the lower ground, it has become surface water; but if it forms a continuous body with the water flowing in the ordinary channel, or if it departs from such channel animo revertendi, presently to return, as by the recession of the waters, it is to be regarded as still a part of the river. The identity of a river does not depend upon the volume of water which may happen to flow down its course at any particular season. The authorities hold that a stream may be wholly dry at times without losing the character of a water-course. So, on the other hand, it may have a "flood channel," to retain the surplus waters until they can be discharged by the natural flow. The low places on a river act as natural safety-valves in times of freshet; and the defendant claims the right to stop up one of these without liability for ensuing damage.

The English cases on the question are not numerous, though from the decisions and dicta of the judges the law appears to be well understood and settled. In Rez v. Pagham Comrs., 8 Barn. & C. 855, it was held that an owner of land on the seashore could erect works to protect his land from encroachments by the sea, without liability for damage inflicted on his neighbor. The sea was called a "common enemy," against which each might fortify at will.

It appeared in Rez v. Trafford, 1 Barn. & Ad. 874, that a canal had been built by authority of Parliament, and carried across a river and the adjoining valley by means of an aqueduct and an embankment containing several arches. A brook fell into the river above its point of intersection with the canal. In times of flood the water, which was then penned back into the brook, overflowed its banks, and was carried, by the natural level of the country, through the arches into the river, doing much mischief to the lands over which it passed. The aqueduct was sufficiently wide for the passage of the river at all times but those of high flood. The occupiers of the injured lands adjoining the river and brook, for the protection thereof, erected banks (called "fenders"), so as to prevent the flood-water from escaping; consequently the water, in time of flood, came down in so large a body against the aqueduct and canal as to endanger them, and obstruct the navigation. The fenders were not unnecessarily high, and without them many hundred acres of land would be exposed to inundation. It was held that the defendants were not justified, under these circumstances, in altering for their own benefit the course in which the flood-water had been accustomed to run; that there was no difference in this respect between flood-water and an ordinary stream; that an action would have lain at the suit of an individual; and, consequently, that an indictment lay where the act affected the public. The conviction was accordingly sustained. The doctrine of Rez v. Pagham Comrs., supra, was sought to be extended to this case, but Tenterden, Ch. J., who had rendered the decision in that case, said: "It has long been established that the ordinary course of water cannot be lawfully changed or obstructed for the benefit of one class of persons, to the injury of another. Unless, therefore, a sound distinction can be made between the ordinary course of water flowing in a bounded channel at all usual seasons, and the extraordinary course which its superabundant quantity has been accustomed to take at particular seasons, the creation and continuance of these fenders cannot be justified. No case was cited or has been found that will support such a distinction. The Pagham Case . . . is of a very different kind. . . . In the one case the water is prevented from coming where, within time of memory at least, it never had come; in the other it is prevented from passing in the way in which, when the occasion happened, it had been always accustomed to pass." This seems to be an authoritative enunciation of the common law. Menzies v. Breadalbane, 3 Bligh, N. S. 414, is directly in point, but was determined by the law of Scotland. Yet the Lord Chancellor said: "It is clear beyond the possibility of a doubt that by the law of England such an operation could not be carried on. The old course of the flood stream being along certain lands, it is not competent for the proprietors of those lands to obstruct that old course by a sort of new water-way, to the prejudice of the proprietor on the other side." In Atty-Gen. v. Lonsdale, L. R. 7 Eq. 387, 20 L. T. N. S. 64, it was attempted to extend the sea doctrine to the case of a tidal river, but Vice-Chancellor Malins refused to so extend it on the authority of Menzies v. Breadalbane, supra, saying that Lord Eldon put that case upon the general law of England. In Mason v. Shrewsbury & H. R. Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 581, we find a dictum by Blackburn, J., as follows: "Before the canal was made, the person whose estate the plaintiff now has, had the ordinary rights and liabilities of a riparian owner on the banks of a natural stream. He was entitled to have the water flow to him in its natural state, so far as that was a benefit,—as, for instance, to turn his mill, or water his cattle; and he was bound to submit to receive the water, so far as it was a nuisance, as by its tendency to flood his lands."

Lawrence v. Great Western R. Co., 4 Eng. L. & Eq. 265, 16 Q. B. 643, is considerably in point. A railway was constructed across certain low lands adjoining a river, over which the flood-waters used to spread themselves. These low lands were separated from the plaintiff's lands by a bank, constructed under certain Drainage Acts, which protected the plaintiff's lands from floods. By the construction of the railway the flood-waters could not spread themselves as formerly, but were penned up and flowed over the bank upon the plaintiff's lands. It was held that an action would lie against the company for the injury. Patteson, J., said: "Prima facie this would give the plaintiff a cause of action, and the question is whether the company are protected by their act;" a question which cannot arise in our law. In connection with the cases of Rea v. Trafford and Lawrence v. Great Western R. Co., supra, it must be borne in mind that the first obstruction of the flood-waters there mentioned is, in England, justified by the statute authorizing it, and therefore stands on much the same footing as a natural obstruction; but the liability of the other party, who erected the second obstruction without statute authority, springs from the common law. No English authority has been found to controvert these principles, but the text-writers recognize them as settled law. Woolf, Waters, 218 (78 Law Lib. 212); Crabb, Real Prop. 420 (54 Law Lib. 263); Michael & W. Gas. & Water (London ed. 1884), pp. 213, 214, 666; Angell, Watercourses, §§ 333, 334; Gould, Waters, §§ 160, 209.

In grouping the American cases, those tending to sustain the contention of the defendant in error will first be stated. Taylor v. Fickas, 64 Ind. 167, was much relied upon. There the injury was caused by the obstruction of the passage of driftwood, both owners being on the same side of the river, and the lower owner having planted a row of trees along the dividing line. The opinion, it is true, treats overflow in flood times as surface water, but it will be noticed that nothing is said or decided about changing the course of the water. The facts are obviously different from those in the present case. In Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Stevens, 73 Ind. 278, the plaintiff's land was between the river and the railroad embankment. The overflow is treated as surface water, and the road held not liable; but it would seem that the water doing the damage had left the river, never to return. Shelbyville & V. Turnp. Co. v. Green, 99 Ind. 205, follows the last case. The turnpike was flooded because of an embankment erected by Green to protect his land from overflow, both parties being on the same side. It was held that the company could not recover. But note that the court adverts to the fact that the company did not own the soil over which the pike ran, but merely had an easement therein. McCormick v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 57 Mo. 433, can also be distinguished. Here the overflowing water left the stream permanently, and entered a pond formed thereby and by other surface water, the draining of which pond caused the injury sued for.

In Shane v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 71 Mo. 288, the overflow is apparently treated as surface water, although it had a way.

through a slough, back into the stream. But the court applied the civil law, and held the railroad liable. This case, together with that of McCormick v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 70 Mo. 359, is overruled, in so far as the civil law was followed, by Abbott v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 88 Mo. 371, 20 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 103, and the common law as to surface water returned to. In this last case it is said that the court in the Shane Case treated the overflow as part of the stream, and, therefore, that the decision was correct on common-law principles. In the Abbott Case, the court expressly assumes the waters to be surface waters. It seems they escaped from the bed of the creek, and flowed over the lands without any return. Lamb v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 73 Cal. 125, is not much in point. The defendant was a public corporation for the purpose of reclaiming the low lands protected by the embankment, which closed up a slough through which an inconsiderable part of the flood-waters escaped into a natural basin. The plaintiff's land lay two miles below, on the opposite side. The court applied the sea doctrine of the common law, and held the company not liable; but the decision is mainly rested on another ground, namely, that the corporation was not liable as for exercising the right of eminent domain; and in view also of the concurring opinions, the case is weak on the question involved in the case at bar. See below for an earlier decision by the same court looking another way, not noticed in the case above.

In Hoard v. Des Moines, 62 Iowa, 326, the plaintiff's land was between the river and the embankment, and it was held that the plaintiff had no right to have the flood-waters from the river pass over his land on to that of another, although they finally joined the river again at a point further down. At first view, Moyer v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 88 N. Y. 351, seems to support the defendant's position; but a close examination shows otherwise. The complaint averred that the damage was caused by the railroad building an embankment on the opposite side of the river. Evidence was offered and objected to, to show damage caused by raising the tracks. It was admitted, the railroad excepting. The referee included in his finding for the plaintiff the damages caused by raising the tracks, as to which the complaint alleged nothing, thus tainting the whole finding with illegality. The judgment was reversed for the error in admitting said evidence and in said finding. The court says the defendant, as a matter of law, would not be liable for consequential damages caused by the raising of the embankment on the company's own land in a proper and workman-like manner, citing Bellinger v. New York Cent. R. Co., 23 N. Y. 47. This case bases the freedom from liability upon the legislative authority, but concedes that a private individual would be liable under the same conditions. In our law the railroad occupies no better position in this respect than the private individual.

Now will be stated the American cases going to show that the defendant is liable if it has erected the obstruction to the flood-waters of the river, as complained of in this case. The surplus waters do not cease to be a part of the river when they spread over the adjacent low grounds, without well-defined banks or channel, so long as they form with it one body of water, eventually to be discharged through the channel proper. Thus it is held, where the waters of a stream disperse themselves over low ground, without any well-marked course, but gather up lower down into a defined channel, they are not surface water while in the dispersed state, and interference with them then gives the injured party a right of action. Macomber v. Godfrey, 108 Mass. 219; Gillatt v. Johnson, 30 Conn. 180; Briscoe v. Drought, 11 Ir. C. L. 250; West v. Taylor, 16 Or. 165. But if it were conceded that the overflow is surface water, it would certainly cease to be such when turned back into the stream by the defendant's obstruction. Sullens v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 659; Moore v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 268; Jones v. Hannoon, 55 Mo. 462; Mississippi & T. R. Co. v. Archibald, 67 Miss. 88. Under these authorities, this declaration might be sustained as complaining that the defendant prevented the flood-waters from becoming surface waters, and threw them back across the river upon plaintiff's land. See, further, as to surface water, 17 Cent. L. J. 42, 62; Angell, Water-courses, § 108a et seq.; Gould, Waters, § 268 et seq. But it is not necessary to take this view, as the following authorities show the defendant to be liable under the alleged facts: Where the effect of the defendant's dike was to retain on the land of the plaintiff flood-waters from the river longer than they would otherwise remain, the injury was held actionable, and the demurrer overruled. Montgomery v. Locke (Cal.) 11 Pac. Rep. 874. Where, in a freshet, the stream broke over one of its banks, carrying a part of it away, it was held that the owner might replace the bank with a dam, provided he did not build higher than the original bank, or otherwise cause the water to flow differently from the natural flow. Pierce v. Kinney, 59 Barb. 56.

"It is well settled that every person through whose land a stream of water flows may construct embankments and other guards on the bank to prevent the stream washing the bank away, and overflowing and injuring his land. But in doing this he must be careful so to construct them as not to throw the water upon his neighbor's lands, where it would not otherwise go in ordinary floods. If he does, he will be liable for the injury." Wallace v. Drew, 59 Barb. 418. There is no distinction in principle or authority between obstructing the flow of a stream at its ordinary level and in time of flood. Burnell v. Hobson, 12 Gratt. 322. This case is in point, and holds the defendant liable. Another case in point is Crawford v. Rambo, 44 Ohio St. 279, 4 West. Rep. 445, holding that flood-water is not surface water, and that interference therewith gives a right of action. So Byrne v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 88 Minn. 212, holds that overflow in times of high water is not surface water, and the railroad is liable for obstruction of such water by an embankment erected on its own land. See also Rau v. Minnesota Valley R. Co. 18 Minn. 442 (Gil. 407), where the railroad made an extensive excavation on its own land, into which overflow waters from the Mississippi River entered, to the damage of an adjoining owner. The railroad was liable. Gerrish v. Clough, 48 N. H. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 561, and notes, and Truthill v. Scott, 43 Vt. 525, seem not to involve the question as to the action of the water in times of flood, but are adverse to defendant as far as they go.

In Carriger v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 7 Lea, 388, the railroad embankment did not affect the usual flow of the streams, but obstructed the flood channel, and threw the excessive waters upon the plaintiff's lands. This same defendant contended that they were surface waters, which it had a right to obstruct. The trial court gave judgment for the defendant, holding "that the overflow in question resulted from accumulations of surface water caused by extraordinary rains, and that the law relating to surface water, and not that of running streams, governs the case." The supreme court said: "The question to be determined is, Is this such surface water as to relieve the defendant? . . . The springs and their branches are never-failing, and flow off in a northward direction towards the farm of plaintiff. In ordinary times they find outlets through the caverns or sinks in the earth. In extraordinary times their volumes are too great for the usual place of discharge. These springs and branches are sometimes large and sometimes small; still they are the same springs and branches, requiring, as all running streams do, sometimes less and at other times more surface for their escape. . . . If the embankment had been erected in a valley, near a low bank of the river, which overflowed at high tide, but escaped in one passage, so as not to materially injure adjoining lands, but, if obstructed by the embankment, would overflow and damage, as in this case, we think it would not be insisted that it was not obligatory on the defendant to build a culvert to prevent damage that must certainly come with the high tide. Is there a difference in reason as to the case put and the one at bar? We think not. While they may not be so frequent, the overflows from the branches are as certain as those from the river; one is as certainly a constant running stream as the other. . . . It is no defense for it to say that it was only in extraordinary times the injuries now complained of could result. The rises in the waters had for all time occurred at intervals before the building of the road, and it was to be conclusively presumed they would occur afterwards from similar causes." The court entered judgment for the plaintiff. This is a stronger case than the one now to be decided.

Counsel for defendant ably and strenuously insist that the common, and not the civil, law be applied to this case. The above authorities prove that the common law does not regard the waters here complained of as mere surface water, but as a part of the river. The civil law might be more favorable to the defendant's case, for it seems to regard the flood-waters of a river as a common enemy, against which each riparian owner may build defenses with impunity. Mailhot v. Pugh, 30 La. Ann. 1859, citing authorities. The defendant also claims that the question is settled by an Act of the Legislature, and cites section 2232 of the Code. That section says: "All persons owning, or who may hereafter own, lands on any watercourses in this State, are authorized and empowered to ditch and embank their lands, so as to protect the same from freshets and overflows in said watercourses; provided, always, that the said ditching and embanking does not divert said watercourse from its ordinary channel; but nothing shall be so construed as to prevent the owners of land from diverting unnavigable watercourses through their own lands." This contention may be answered in three ways: First. The declaration in this case distinctly alleges that the defendant did divert the river from its ordinary channel, for which act the Statute affords no shadow of protection. Secondly. The allegations of the declaration do not show that defendant embanked its land "so as to protect the same," but constructed an embankment on which to lay its track, without regard to any consequences of benefit or injury to the contiguous country. Thirdly. The construction long ago and repeatedly put by this court on the last part of the section, which says, "Nothing shall be so construed as to prevent the owners of land from diverting unnavigable watercourses through their own lands," necessitates the conclusion that this whole Statute is not alternative, but only declaratory, of the common law. In other words, the Legislature did not intend to give riparian owners the privilege of ditching or embanking their lands, or of diverting unnavigable watercourses, so as to injure neighboring proprietors, without liability therefor. Indeed, the power of the Legislature so to alter the common law is expressly denied in Persons v. Hill, 33 Ga. Supp. 143. And in Cheeves v. Dantelly, 80 Ga. 118, the same view is taken as to the intention of the Legislature in passing this Act. It is true, these cases deal with the diversion of an unnavigable stream, but it would be absurd to impute to the Legislature two conflicting intentions in the same Act; and the ground taken in Persons v. Hill will equally well support the same rule of construction as to the other branch of the Statute. The facts in Persons v. Hill require notice. The owners were on the same side of the Flint River, into which Beaver Creek emptied after passing through the defendant's land. By mutual agreement between the upper owner (plaintiff) and the lower owner (defendant), the expense being also shared, an embankment was erected along the river to keep back the flood-waters which, from the facts of the case, seemed to have this course,—that is to say, coming out on plaintiff's land, they flowed across the same over defendant's land into the creek, by which they would empty back into the river. The embankment not being kept up according to the agreement, defendant proposed to protect himself by diverting the creek through a canal on his own land to the river and building an embankment along his side of the canal. This canal would make an opening through the high bank of the river, and, with the embankment, would allow and cause the high waters to back up on the plaintiff's land. This court granted an injunction against the construction of the canal, but allowed the defendant to continue the embankment. One great difference from the present case might be found in the agreement for consideration to have the common protection of the first embankment. See Savannah, P. & W. R. Co. v. Lawton, 75 Ga. 192. But at any rate the decision does not contemplate that defendant's individual embankment would injure the plaintiff's land, such an inference being inconsistent with the plain language of the opinion on page 197.

There is another section of the Code, not cited or discussed in the argument, which deserves mention in this connection: "No person shall be permitted to make or keep up any dam to stop the natural course of any water, so as to overflow the lands of any other person, without his consent; nor shall any person stop or prevent any water from running off of any person's field, whereby such person may be prevented from planting in season, or receive any other injury thereby; nor so as to turn the natural course of any water from one channel or swamp to another, to the prejudice of any person." Code, § 1607. This Statute was passed September 29, 1778, and apparently revived by the Act of February 25, 1784 (Marbury & C. Dig. p. 404), being recognized by subsequent amendments and by the Codes (Acts 1855-56, p. 12; Acts 1865-66, p. 27). It is put in the Code under the head "Cultivation of Rice," but from reading the original Act (Marbury & C. p. 178) it is by no means clear that it was intended to apply only on rice farms. Neither the title nor the body of the Act contains the slightest intimation to that effect. Its terms are as broad and general as they well could be. The preamble, it is true, in stating the mischiefs to be remedied, describes such as probably were common in the localities where rice was cultivated, though even here there is no distinct allusion to rice culture. These mischiefs may, as a matter of history, have occasioned the enactment of the Statute. But might not the Legislature have deemed it wise to pass a general law, applicable in all portions of the State where similar mischiefs were likely to happen? It is not inconsistent with the purpose of an Act for curing a special class of mischiefs to provide therein a remedy at the same time for all mischiefs of that genus. On the contrary, that would be highly a proper mode of legislation. If the preamble is not to be given a controlling and restrictive effect, this Act alone would completely and effectually dispose of the present case, as the declaration alleges acts by the defendant which violate the law in question if it was intended to have a general application. But, since it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to measure the extent of this statute, the question is not decided, especially as it deserves more argument and consideration. It was urged in the argument that the law ought to encourage the reclaiming and improvement of lands which are subject to injury from the natural action of floods and surface water, and it is surprising to find this argument unquestioningly relied upon in many cases which are supposed to follow the common law of surface water. The error therein is easily exposed, for to the same extent as the land of an adjoining owner is damaged by the improvement on the defendant's land, so far exactly is the development of the damaged land set back and retarded. The defendant might bring his land to perfection for his uses, and then have all that good work ruined by the first measures of improvement adopted by his less progressive neighbor. The rule contended for by the defendant would be a poor encouragement to painstaking labor engaged in reclaiming unprofitable land. Everyone is charged with notice of nature's operations; but who can tell when a man will build his bulwarks against the flood? There is no public policy to allow one landowner to improve his condition at the cost of his neighbor; but the improver must, at his peril, see to it that the benefit to himself is large enough to pay both him and his neighbor's damage, if any. The law does not look to the interest of one individual, but recognizes and enforces the duties implied in his relation to others. Of course, for these principles to apply, there must be, as in this case, an invasion of some tangible right. Peel v. Atlanta, 85 Ga. 138, 8 L. R. A. 787.

And it must not be understood that this discussion rules anything beyond the questions contained in this particular case. Undoubtedly there is a class of rare cases not within the general rule, as indicated by the eloquent language of Agnew, J., in Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Gilleland, 56 Pa. 452, where he says: "There is therefore no liability for extraordinary floods—those unexpected visitations whose comings are not foreshadowed by the usual course of nature, and must be laid to the account of Providence, whose dealings, though they may afflict, wrong no one." But such is not the case made by this declaration. For the foregoing reasons it is evident that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the declaration.

Judgment reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Lena PAPPENHEIM, Reept.,

v.

METROPOLITAN ELEVATED R. CO.,

(....N. Y.....)

The transfer of property abutting on a street in which an elevated railroad has been constructed, before bringing suit for damages for injuries to the appurtenant easements of light, air, and access or the transfer of them to the company, carries with it all the grantor's rights and remedies to compel payment of such damages, regardless of the price paid for the land.

(October 13, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York, affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel payment of damages for injuries caused to plaintiff's property by the construction and operation of defendants' elevated railroad. Affirmed.

Statement by Peckham, J.:

This action is brought to perpetually enjoin the defendants from operating their railway in Second Avenue, between 120th and 121st Streets, in the City of New York, in front of the plaintiff's premises, and to procure the structure already built there to be removed, and to recover from defendants the loss and damage already sustained by reason of the past operating of the defendants' railway in front of the plaintiff's premises, and, if the defendants shall be permitted to so operate their road in the future, that it shall be only upon condition that they first pay to the plaintiff the amount of the permanent loss and damage to her premises sustained by her by reason of such operation, and also the amount of her loss and damage already sustained. This is, in substance, the relief asked for by the plaintiff. The defendants in their answer to the complaint, set up various defenses, the chief of which, and the one particularly argued and relied upon here, is that the railway was built in 1880, and has been in operation ever since, and, if any damage has been inflicted upon plaintiff's premises by the erection and operation of the railway, such damage was inflicted at the time it was so built and operated, and at that time the premises were owned and possessed by some other person, and the plaintiff was not then their owner, and is not the owner of the cause of action. The court found that the plaintiff, on the 23d of April, 1883, became the owner of the premises, and has ever since owned them, and since that time there has been a valuable building standing on them. Since that time the plaintiff has also owned, as attached or appurtenant to the premises, an easement of light, air, and access in and over Second Avenue, and the only property rights of the plaintiff interfered with by the defendants are easements of light, air, and access therein appurtenant to the plaintiff's premises, and she is not seised of any estate in the land forming the bed of such avenue in front of her premises. The railroad had in fact been built and had been in operation along Second Avenue for some years prior to the time when the plaintiff purchased, in 1883. She paid, according to some of the evidence, the fair market value of the lot with the railroad in the avenue. It was also proved that the plaintiff had sustained injuries by the construction and operation of the road from the time of her purchase to the trial of the action in the sum of $1,800, and that the value of the plaintiff's easement in fee taken, appropriated, or interfered with by reason of such construction and perpetual maintenance and operation of defendants' railway, over and above any benefits resulting therefrom and peculiar to the premises, was the sum of $2,000. It was also found that the defendants were authorized by certain Acts of the Legislature to exercise the right of eminent domain, and thus to acquire plaintiff's easement, if necessary, and defendants had like authority to build the railway in the streets in which it has been built; but there was nothing in the acts giving the defendants any authority to take plaintiff's property without compensation. The road has been built under the provisions of the so-called "Rapid Transit Act." Laws 1875, chap. 606.

Judgment was given for the plaintiff in accordance with the findings of the court, and it was provided that the injunction should not issue in case the defendants paid the amount of the damage to the fee upon the execution by plaintiff of a deed conveying to defendants plaintiff's interest in the easement taken by defendants. The judgment so entered was affirmed by the general term of the superior court of the City of New York upon appeal (13 N. Y. Supp. 955); and from the judgment of affirmance the defendants appeal here.

Plaintiff's right, in the ultimate analysis, is really and substantially a right to compensation and not a right to the enjoyment of specific real property.

A property owner who has the bare legal title to the easement, and must rely upon present market values alone for the measure of his compensation, can receive only a nominal award.

A jury might well find that the loss sustained by one who exercised his lawful right of selling his own property, and was compelled because of the proximity of an elevated railroad to accept a diminished price for it, was the natural and proximate result of the construction and maintenance of the railroad. And if they so found, there is no legal reason why the railway company should not be liable to make compensation for the loss actually sustained.

Squier v. Gould, 14 Wend. 159.

The wrong to be redressed in such a case is one which is personal to the owner and which results from discrediting the property in the market, and which accrues only when the property is brought into the market for sale. It bears more analogy to slander of title than to any other tort mentioned in the books.

Messrs. Sackett & Bennett, for respondent:

Lord Coke calls the Register Brevium the oldest book of the law; and Fitzherbert in his new Natura Brevium, p. 290, says that the Register contains a writ for a grantee of land against the grantee of other land for abatement of a nuisance erected prior to either grant.

Among the early examples of actions on the case for nuisance are two which involve the points under consideration and decide it in accordance with the doctrine of Fitzherbert, where the remedy was pursued by quod permittat.

Westbourne v. Mordant, 1 Cro. Eliz. 191; Beswick v. Comden, 1 Cro. Eliz. 402. See also Penruddock's Case, 5 Coke, 101.

These cases go on the ground that a continuance of the nuisance was a new wrong or nuisance. Upon the same ground from the Year Books down have the cases proceeded, which have held that an action could be maintained against the heir of a person who had levied a continuing nuisance.

In Lord Eldon's time, chancery began to grant injunctions against nuisances of a continuous nature, and also against continuing trespasses. In this State the chancellor, following the authority of Lord Eldon, began at an early day to exercise a similar jurisdiction.

The action at bar is not for a nuisance according to the technical language of the black-letter lawyers, but for a continuing trespass; but this makes the argument against the appellants all the stronger, if we consider the origin and nature of the action of the trespass. The writ of trespass is one of the oldest of the formed writs, breviter formata.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The structure erected by defendants in Second Avenue, in front of the plaintiff's premises, was an illegal structure, and inconsistent with the use of the avenue as a public street. At the time of building the railway a trespass was committed by the defendants upon the property now owned by the plaintiff, although she did not own it at that time. Such trespass has been continued from the time when the road was built up to the time when the judgment in this action was entered. By continuing the trespass the defendants laid themselves open to continuous actions, in which the recovery would be for the damage sustained up to the time of the commencement of each action. These propositions are clear, and are now undisputed. They have been settled by the Story and the Uline Cases, so familiar to the court and the bar. 90 N. Y. 122; 101 N. Y. 98, 2 Cent. Rep. 116.

As the structure is illegal, and as it constitutes while it exists a continuing trespass, the Railroad Company is under a legal obligation to remove it, and the law presumes that the Company will do so.

In an action at law the owner of the property interfered with or trespassed upon cannot recover damages to his premises, based upon the assumption that such trespass is to be permanent. He can recover only the damages which he has sustained up to the commencement of the action. The judgment entered for the damages sustained does not operate as a purchase of the right to continue the trespass. But the owner may resort to equity for the purpose of enjoining the continuance of the trespass, and to thus prevent a multiplicity of actions at law to recover damages; and in such an action the court may determine the amount of damages which the owner would sustain if the trespass were permanently continued, and it may provide that upon payment of that sum the plaintiff shall give a deed or convey the right to the defendant, and it will refuse an injunction when the defendant is willing to pay upon the receipt of a conveyance. The court does not adjudge that the defendant shall pay such sum, and that the plaintiff shall so convey. It provides, that, if the conveyance is made and the money paid, no injunction shall issue. If defendant refuse to pay, the injunction issues. It may be that, in the case of a railroad actually running its cars upon or through property of another, it would not be justified in refusing to pay upon the delivery of the conveyance, and, instead thereof, submitting to an injunction. Public interests might have a right to be heard in that respect. But it is enough to say that, in the 13 L. R. A.

cases where permanent damage is to be paid, there is a condition that a conveyance shall be made, and the defendant thus secures title to the property used. In cases where the owner wishes to actually stop the further trespass, and where the defendant has no legal right to acquire the property, such condition would not be inserted, and a strict injunction would issue upon the right of the owner being determined. Henderson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 423. The owner, if he receive the amount of the permanent damage, is by the court compelled to convey the interest to the defendant which the defendant pays for in that way. Condemnation proceedings are thus avoided. It is conclusively determined that the trespass is to be continuous, and defendant concedes it when it avails itself of the condition, and pays the permanent damage in order to receive the conveyance. It is only in this way that the owner recovers as for a permanent damage to his property.

In a case where the defendant has no power to condemn the property, if the owner in that event proceed in equity, he recovers only his damage up to the entry of the judgment, and at the same time secures an injunction which prevents the future trespass. If the owner sue at law, he recovers his damages as stated. If the owner, without having brought any suit in equity, sell his property at a loss caused by the erection of the railroad, the question at once arises as to what rights are acquired by the purchaser, and what claim, if any, has the vendor against defendant. The vendee has purchased and the vendor has sold to him, in fee simple absolute, the premises fronting the street, to which premises are attached, as property passing to him by the conveyance, the easements of light, air, and access which the defendant has already interfered with and trespassed upon by the erection and operation of the road. Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122; Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268, 6 Cent. Rep. 371; Kane v. New York Elev. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 164, 11 L. R. A. 640.

The vendee finds the Railroad making use of a portion of his property without right, and in the character of a mere wrong-doer. That use depreciates the value of the remaining part of the owner's property, and causes him daily damage. He institutes his action, either at law or in equity, to recover damages up to the time of the commencement of the action or permanently, and for an injunction, as the case may be, and, in answer to proof of ownership and daily or permanent damage, he is told by way of defense that the Railroad Company paid or is liable to pay to his vendor the difference between what the vendor sold the property for to him and what it could have been sold for if the railroad were not there, and therefore it has the right to continue the act which by such payment or liability has been changed from a trespass to a valid action. It is true that the railroad has not received any conveyance of any right to continue the trespass. On the contrary, the vendor conveyed to plaintiff the absolute fee simple in the property, and all the ordinary rights of ownership passed with such conveyance. It was after such conveyance, and when the vendor was no longer owner, that, according to defendants, the Company paid, or became liable to pay, his alleged loss caused by such sale, and which payment or liability defendants now claim has altered the situation so effectually. The vendee, who obtained the property at what may have been a low price, has nevertheless the rights of a general owner which are not dependent upon the price which he paid for his title. Every day that the Company operates its road over or through the property of the plaintiff, it commit an illegal act or trespass; and the character of that act with respect to the property of the plaintiff is not in any degree affected by the fact that the plaintiff's vendor sold his property at a loss, which that vendor says he sustained from the illegal action of the defendant. There is no doubt that the same easements which were appurtenant to the premises owned by the plaintiff's vendor passed to his vendee, the present plaintiff, by the conveyance to her. They passed because they were appurtenant, and the vendor never attempted to reserve them, assuming even that such reservation were a legal possibility. As these easements passed to the vendee and became her property, as much so as the land itself, how is it that the Railroad Company has become possessed of the right to appropriate such easements, or any portion of them, without payment to her? Her private property is taken without compensation to her under such circumstances, if defendant have the right to permanently enter upon and use these easements; and thus a constitutional guaranty is violated in her case, and she is without redress. The answer to this assertion is made by the counsel for defendants in a very ingenious argument, the foundation of which is, however, laid in what seems to me an erroneous application of a general rule relating to the measure of damages in condemnation proceedings, and from which it is argued that the real actionable loss falls upon the owner of the property when the road was built, provided he sells his property in a depreciated market. They claim that such an owner has a cause of action to recover the loss he has sustained by a sale of his property in a market depreciated by the wrongful act of defendants in entering upon or appropriating the easements appurtenant to such property. The argument, of course, assumes that, if such a cause of action be made out, it must follow that none arises in favor of a subsequent purchaser who obtains the land at a price reduced on account of the existence of the road. Unless the one cause of action exclude the other, the defendants would accomplish nothing by proving the existence of one in favor of the original owner.

The defendants' counsel assert that the permanent damage to the property was sustained by the vendor at the time he sold to the plaintiff, and that the Company is liable to pay the same to him. Hence they say that in taking from the present owner the easements spoken of,—which, when separated from the land to which they are appurtenant, are of themselves but of a nominal value,— the defendants would only be condemned to pay therefor a nominal sum, such as six cents; and as to the resulting loss in value to the adjoining land of the vendee, caused by the erection and operation of the railroad, the vendee has not sustained that loss, because she has only paid for the property the sum to which it had depreciated by reason of the existence of the road in front of it. Continuing the argument, the counsel for the defendants state that if the present owner (the vendee) should commence an action to restrain the further trespass the defendants could at once commence proceedings to condemn the easements, and that the rule of damages would be the difference between the present market value of the whole property and that portion which would be left after the taking, and that difference would be nominal only; so that when the present owner commences her action to restrain the further commission of the trespass the whole matter may be adjusted in such suit, and the same rule of damages would obtain. The result would be either that the defendants would be enjoined from further operating their road until they paid six cents, the nominal damage sustained by the present owner, or else the bill would be dismissed entirely, on the ground that the aid of equity could not be invoked for the purpose of compelling the payment of merely nominal damages. This course of argument does not, as it seems to me, answer the claim of the present owner to enjoin the further trespass upon her property unless she is paid the damage which such trespass will permanently cause her. That damage is not merely nominal. In 1880, the defendants erected their road, and by its erection and operation depreciated the value of the property now owned by the plaintiff. In erecting their road, they trespassed upon the easements appurtenant to that property, and such trespass has been continuous ever since. By these wrongful acts the market value of the plaintiff's property has been greatly depreciated. If they were compelled to resort to condemnation proceedings, the defendants say it is the present market value which they must pay. The vice in this argument lies in the erroneous statement of the measure of damages. In such case, and under these circumstances, where the value has been depreciated by the wrongful entry of defendants upon the property, it is not the present market value of such property thus damaged that the defendants must pay. Actual market value at the time of the institution of the condemnation proceedings is usually the inquiry. But when the defendant has already entered upon the property, and has depreciated its value thereby, it is plain that the simple question of value at the time of condemnation is not the proper rule. In such case the inquiry must be, What would be the fair market value of the whole property at the time of condemnation, without the railroad? and the difference between that sum and the present market value of the property left, with the railroad in existence, would constitute the measure of damages to which the owner would be entitled. This inaugurates no new rule of damages in condemnation proceedings in this State. As the entry was unlawful, it is, for the purpose of arriving at the value of the property, regarded as not made, and the inquiry is, What is the present value of such property without the presence of a structure which is there without right, and which cannot be continued without payment in full for all damage done? Its existence cannot be considered for the purpose of diminishing what would otherwise be the present market value of the property. I think the same rule would hold in the case put by the defendants, where the city or any other body having the power should seek to take the owner's property, even though such owner had himself purchased subsequent to the erection of the road. The city would have no right to take the property from its owner on a valuation based upon the permanent character of a trespass which the law regards as temporary. The inquiry in the case supposed would still be, What would be the fair market value of the property with the railroad away? That sum the city would have to pay; and when it acquired the title it would have the same right as any other owner to compel the defendants to desist from their trespass, or pay the amount of permanent damage they caused by its continuance. Under this rule the amount which the present owner may have paid for the property will be wholly immaterial. As the act of the defendants in trespassing upon or appropriating any portion of the property was unlawful, any depreciation in the value of the property caused by such illegal action cannot be regarded in fixing the value of the property to be taken, or the damage to that which will remain. The claim of the defendants that this depreciation in value was suffered by the original owner when he sold, and that it is a personal claim in his case against them for which they are responsible, cannot, as it seems to me, be maintained. Such a doctrine would do away with the right of an owner of property to prevent a continuous trespass upon it by another. The defendants would say that, because the original owner transferred the property to his vendee, the defendants by reason thereof were thereby invested with the right to continue forever the original trespass, and the consideration for such license rested in their liability to pay (not necessarily in the payment to) the vendor the difference between the sum which he actually received for the conveyance of his land and that which he would have been able to secure, had it not been for the acts of the defendants. Whether such sum had been paid or not would be immaterial so far as concerned the present owner. That would be a matter between the original owner and the defendants. But the present owner, on account of the transfer of the land to him, would really have no right to prevent the trespass, no matter how much in truth his property was damaged, and although the defendants had no more title to the property trespassed upon than they ever had. They could have no title, because the original owner transferred it to his vendee, and after such transfer, of course, that owner could not again transfer any portion of the property to anyone else. The vendee took the title, and he certainly has not conveyed it to the defendants, but, on the contrary, still retains it absolutely. Thus, with no title, the defendants have, by this course of reasoning, been in substance invested with a right to perpetually appropriate property belonging to the plaintiff, because of a liability on their part, as they allege, to pay a former owner certain damages which he alleges he sustained by selling his property to the plaintiff at a reduced value caused by defendants' illegal act. This mere liability of the defendants to reimburse the vendor operates, by defendants' argument, as a bar to the rights of the vendee. If not paid by the defendants, the liability still remains, and of course the bar still continues; and thus the general right which follows the possession of property to protect it from a trespass is denied an owner because the defendants are, they say, liable to a former owner on a personal claim by him for a loss occasioned by a sale. Heretofore absolute ownership or legal possession of property has been regarded as sufficient to enable the owner to protect it from a trespass. It has been sufficient to permit him to maintain an action to restrain its continuance, even though he was fortunate enough to secure the property at one half its value. The inquiry in such cases, where the owner sought to restrain the future trespass, has never been in regard to the price which the owner paid, or whether the former owner sold at a loss on account of the trespass. The inquiry has been whether the plaintiff was the owner or entitled to the possession, and whether the acts of the defendant were illegal. That is all that should now be required.

I have thus far referred to the case of the vendee for the purpose of inquiring what rights appertained to him as the present owner of the property. But the argument in favor of the vendor, who owned the property when the road was built, and who sold his land in a depreciated market caused by the wrongful acts of the defendants, is not to my mind very strong. In the first place, he had his right of action to recover for all damage caused by the trespass up to the time of the commencement of his action, and the subsequent conveyance of the land would not in any way affect that right. If he desired to restrain its further continuance, or to recover for the permanent damage caused, he could while owner commence and maintain his action in equity. In that action he would obtain full relief. If he chose to sell instead of using the remedies which the law gives him, that was a matter, legally speaking, of his own choice. The defendants did not compel or limit or restrain such sale. Nothing that they did could be said to amount to any compulsion by them. The law says their action cannot be regarded as a permanent trespass, for the very reason that it is unlawful, and the law will not presume that an unlawful act is to be forever continued. His choice to sell, rather than avail himself of the remedies given him by the law, does not furnish a cause of action against the defendants to reimburse him for a loss, arising because of the presumption he has indulged in that the trespass would be continuous and unpaid for. He has chosen to regard the trespass in a light opposite to that in which the law regards it, and the loss he has suffered thereby is not one which the law can regard as caused by the defendants. If the original owner thus chooses to sell his property without enforcing those rights which he has only by virtue of such ownership, the purchaser at any rate takes his fee, and with it the rights of such an owner. The right to enjoin the continuance of the trespass has not escaped by the conveyance. It cannot rest with the vendor, for he has no longer any interest in the land. Unless it passed to the vendee, it has vanished; and yet no conveyance by anyone having the right to convey has been made to the trespasser, and so far as the legal title to the property is concerned the trespasser has no lot or parcel in it. It seems to me the right passed to the vendee. I can see no similarity in the case of the owner of property who has thus sold at a loss, to that of one who has suffered from a slander of his title. To start with, there is in the case at bar no slander. And again, there is no malice. The erection of a structure on plaintiff's property by defendants cannot be twisted into a slander of plaintiff's title by them. No one asserts that the defendants built their road knowing they were wrong-doers or trespassers. The findings in this case substantially negative any such idea. The court finds that the road was built in conformity with plans prescribed by boards of commissioners appointed under legislative authority. It has been held that punitive damages ought not to be awarded against defendants for the taking of the property of abutting owners by the building of their road. Powers v. Manhattan R. Co. 120 N. Y. 178.

In brief, all the substantial facts which constitute a cause of action for slander of title are absent in this case, and the facts which exist here have no analogy to those which constitute such a cause of action. The wrong by the defendants in the erection of the railroad does not directly or proximately cause the sale of the vendor's property at a loss. The defendants' counsel lays down the rule broadly that "whoever, by a wrongful act, limits or restrains another in respect to his lawful right to dispose of his property in the market to the best advantage, is liable in an action at law for the damages thereby occasioned." Without stopping to question the accuracy of the rule which the defendants here lay down as an abstract proposition, I think no case can be found where it has been enforced under such circumstances as this case presents. All the facts must be here taken into account. It must be remembered that the law regards the act as a temporary wrong only, and as such it provides a full remedy for it. It provides a full equitable remedy if the owner choose to pursue it, and the act be of a permanent nature. If, instead of resorting to his legal or equitable remedy, he chooses to sell, it cannot be said that in a legal sense he has been limited or restrained in respect to his lawful right to sell his property by 18 L. R. A.

defendants' wrongful act. The connection between the sale and the alleged cause is too remote and indefinite. It is not proximate or direct. Further than this, however, the right of action with respect to the damage inheres in the owner and possessor of the land and it is by reason of such ownership and possession that the right of action accrues. Broiestedt's Case, 55 N. Y. 220; Corning v. Troy I. & N. Factory, 40 N. Y. 191.

A perpetual injunction was sustained in the first above-entitled case, which was obtained by a purchaser of land abutting on the street, restraining the further operation of the road, although it was operated prior to his purchase. Nothing that has been said in any other case in this court is opposed to these views. On the contrary, they are in the line of all its previous utterances. The point was not decided in the Henderson Case nor has it been decided in the Lawrence Case, against these same defendants. Reported in 126 N. Y. 483, 13 L. R. A. 102. The question in the last case was in relation to the validity of the defense alleging that the property was used for the purposes of a house of prostitution. The defense was disallowed for the reasons stated in the opinion of Andrews, J., and the rule of damages stated in the Utine Case was reiterated,—that of diminished rental value.

The case of King v. New York, 102 N. Y. 171, 3 Cent. Rep. 89, simply held that the right to compensation for the property taken belonged to him who was the owner of the fee at the time the city took possession, although before the award under the statute the original owner had conveyed the premises. This was upon the ground that the Statute authorizing the taking contained an adequate and certain method for raising the money on the part of the city to pay for the taking, and that when the possession was taken by the city under the Statute it was a legal possession, and the award which was subsequently made paid for the title at the time the possession was taken, and that was in the original owner, who conveyed before the award was made. The Tallman Case, 121 N. Y. 119, 8 L. R. A. 173, does not assert or assume that the plaintiff could recover for the diminished rental value for a term any portion of which was in the future. The recovery in that case had been allowed for a possible use of the premises which the plaintiff had not, in fact, attempted to make, and the possible profits for such possible use we held he was not entitled to. I have, as is seen, alluded to but a few of the many cases cited by counsel in the very elaborate briefs submitted to us. I have, however, read them, and I feel confident that nothing is laid down herein which is opposed to anything heretofore decided by this court.

What the ultimate rights of lessor and lessees, against defendants, may be, we, of course, do not decide in this case. Their rights are not before us. Whether there is or is not any distinction between the rights of a vendor in fee and those of a lessor, is not the question, and we do not, therefore, argue it.

The judgment here should be affirmed, with costs.
All concur.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

William J. LEMP

v.

Nixon FULLERTON, Sheriff, etc., Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. Replevin will not lie for goods in the hands of a sheriff by virtue of a search warrant in proceedings to declare a forfeiture, even if they are in the original packages in which they were brought into the State and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to have them restored to his possession.
2. Jurisdiction to grant a continuance in proceedings for the forfeiture of goods cannot be inquired into in replevin for the goods against the sheriff.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Des Moines County, in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain personal property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Newman & Blake, for appellant:

The replevin proceeding was disorderly without support of any statute whatever, glaringly illegal, and was in contempt of the decisions of this court (State v. Harris, 38 Iowa, 246; Funk v. Israel, 5 Iowa, 452), and of the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of Iowa.

Senior v. Pierce, 31 Fed. Rep. 632.

Where personal property has been seized under a legal writ from a court having jurisdiction, such property cannot be replevied by the owner.

Ibid.

NOTE.—Replevin will not lie for property in legal custody.

At common law, property in the custody of an officer, under a valid, legal process, could not be the subject of replevin. Smith v. Huntington, 3 N. H. 76; Perry v. Richardson, 9 Gray, 216; Gardner v. Campbell, 15 Johns. 401; Pott v. Oldwine, 7 Watts, 173; Gist v. Cole, 2 Nott & McC. L. 456; Griffith v. Smith, 22 Wis. 646; Ralford v. Hyde, 36 Ga. 93; Goodrich v. Fritz, 4 Ark. 525; Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 450, 16 L. ed. 749; Carroll v. Hussey, 31 N. C. 89; Lathrop v. Cook, 14 Me. 414.

But in order to exempt property from seizure under a writ of replevin, in such a case, it must be held by a valid process, and the rule does not apply if the law under which the first process issued is unconstitutional. Cooley v. Davis, 34 Iowa, 128.

And if it is apparent on the face of the process that it was issued without jurisdiction, it would not protect the goods taken thereon from a writ of replevin. Wood v. Orser, 25 N. Y. 343.

Goods in custody of the law, or held by an officer or by any legal process, are not ordinarily the subject of replevin. Any attempt to interfere with them was formerly regarded as a contempt, and punished severely. Cobbey, Replevin, 299, citing 1 Chitty, Pl. 164; Phillips v. Harries, 3 J. J. Marsh. 123; Funk v. Israel, 5 Iowa, 450; Cooley v. Davis, 34 Iowa, 128; Powell v. Bradlee, 9 Gill & J. 220; Hagan v. Deuell, 24 Ark. 216; Goodrich v. Fritz, 4 Ark. 525; Allen v. Smith, 22 Wis. 646.

Mr. S. L. Glasgow, for appellee:

The action of replevin can be maintained upon the facts involved in this case, and is the proper remedy. The petition of appellee contains all the requirements of the Code, prescribed for actions in replevin.

McClain's Code, 1888, § 4455; Fries v. Porch, 49 Iowa, 356.

The law under which the warrant was issued being unconstitutional, the search warrant therefore furnished no authority for the retention of the property.

Cooley v. Davis, 34 Iowa, 130.

Replevin will lie if the property is not rightfully held by the officer under the writ, and the question of the wrongful detention, therefore, is the gist of the action.

State v. Harris, 38 Iowa, 242; Armel v. Lendrum, 47 Iowa, 537.

In the case at bar, the law under which the pretended warrant was issued, and under which the seizure was made, is unconstitutional and has been so declared; therefore, the process or warrant under which the seizure in question was made is void and this action may be maintained for the property so seized.

Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U.

Johns, 384; Buckley v. Buckley, 9 Nev. 379; Watkins v. Page, 2 Wis. 97; Reese v. Fischer, 2 Harr. & G. 320; Spring v. Bourland, 11 Ark. 658; Watson v. Todd, 5 Mass. 271; Mulholm v. Cheney, Add. 301; Goodheart v. Bowen, 2 Ill. App. 578; Badlam v. Tucker, 1 Pick. 889; Brownell v. Manchester, Id. 234; Miliken v. Selye, 6 Hill, 623; Squires v. Smith, 10 B. Mon. 38; Cromwell v. Owings, 7 Harr. & J. 53; Mugraze v. Hall, 40 Me. 498; Armel v. Lendrum, 47 Iowa, 535.

It was undoubtedly well settled at common law, even with respect to courts sitting under the same general jurisdiction, that the custody of property by one court under legal process could not be disturbed by the authority of any other court of concurrent judicial power. See Payne v. Drew, 4 East, 523; Evelyn v. Lewis, 3 Hare, 472; Noe v. Gibson, 7 Paige, 513, 4 L. ed. 252.

This principle has been modified by the legislation of Iowa with respect to civil actions in its own courts. The Code of Iowa, § 3225, provides that the action of replevin may be under certain circumstances maintained for property in the possession of an officer holding it by legal process.

Money, credits and property are in the custody of the law when held by executors, administrators, guardians and like quasi officers, in their representative and administrative capacity. They are accountable to courts for what they administer, and there is ordinarily the same reason that the law's custody of the things and credits should not be disturbed in their hands, as there is for non-disturbance in the hands of a sheriff or other officer. Both v. Hotard, 32 La. Ann. 280; Brooks v. Cook, 8 Mass.

S. 465, 81 L. ed. 700; Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 84 L. ed. 128. See Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 788, 6 L. ed. 204.

The official acts of a justice of the peace, to be valid, must be in accordance with the provisions of the statute from which he derives his legal and official existence.

Cook v. United States, 1 G. Greene, 42.

Even had appellee consented to an adjournment, the justice would have lost jurisdiction over the subject matter of the suit. Jurisdiction over the "subject matter" cannot be conferred by consent.

Boyer v. Moore, 42 Iowa, 544; Hamilton v. Hillhouse, 46 Iowa, 74; McMeans v. Cameron, 51 Iowa, 691; Hynds v. Fay, 70 Iowa, 438.

This is not a collateral attack upon the pretended judgment of the justice, but is a question of jurisdiction which is never waived, and can be raised at any time.

Moore v. Reeves, 47 Iowa, 81; Brown v. Davis, 59 Iowa, 641.

A seizure, if valid originally, must be followed up by the forfeiture of the property seized. If the proceedings be abandoned, the seizure becomes a nullity.

Josefa Segunda, 28 U. S. 10 Wheat. 312, 6 L. ed. 329.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1889 plaintiff was a brewer, engaged in business in St. Louis. In May of that year he shipped from St. Louis to Burlington, consigned to himself, a car-load of beer. His agents at Burlington were Werthmueller & Ende. After the car containing the beer had been placed on a side track at Burlington, it was opened by the agents named, but on the 15th day of May, before the beer had been removed, and while it was in the original casks in which it had been shipped, a part of it, including that in controversy, was seized by the defendant, as sheriff, by virtue of a search-warrant issued under the provisions of section 1544 of the Code. The information on which the search-warrant was issued charged that the intoxicating liquors which it described were owned by Werthmueller & Ende. After defendant made his return on the search-warrant, the justice of the peace who had issued it caused notice to be given to Werthmueller & Ende, and to all others whom it might concern, to appear at his office on the 24th day of May, to show cause, if any they had, why the liquors seized should not be forfeited. On the day fixed for the hearing plaintiff appeared in the justice's court, and filed a pleading, in which he alleged that he was the owner of the property in controversy; that it was shipped from Missouri to Iowa, and seized by the sheriff while in the original packages, and before it had been delivered by the railway company; that it had not been sold, nor kept for sale, in violation of the Laws of Iowa. On the 16th day of May this action was commenced, and the property in controversy was surrendered to the coroner. After the plaintiff in this action had filed the pleading described in justice's court, the State moved for a continuance, and as ground for the motion showed that this action had been commenced, and that the property seized by the sheriff under the search-warrant had been taken from him and was not at that time under his control, nor subject to the order of the court. The court thereupon sustained the application, and continued the case until November

Ralston*, 7 Pa. 482; Parker v. Donnally, 4 W. Va. 648; Thorn v. Woodruff, 5 Ark. 56; Fowler v. McClelland, 5 Ark. 188; Post v. Love, 19 Fla. 684; Mock v. King, 15 Ala. 66; McCreary v. Topper, 10 Pa. 419.

It is laid down as a well-established principle, that, whenever property has been seized by an officer of the court, by virtue of its process, the property is to be considered as in the custody of the court and under its control for the time being; and no other court has a right to interfere with that possession, unless it be some court which may have a direct supervisory control over the court whose process has first taken possession, or some superior jurisdiction in the premises. Buck v. Colbath, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 341, 18 L. ed. 260. See also Hagan v. Lucas, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 400, 9 L. ed. 470; Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 450, 16 L. ed. 749; Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 686; Noe v. Gibson, 7 Paige, 513, 4 L. ed. 252.

It has been held that property in the hands of a garnishee is in the custody of the law, and that an officer has no right, after the garnishment, to take the property from the garnishee. Dennistoun v. New York Croton & S. Faucet Co. 6 La. Ann. 782.

In general, goods in the custody of the law cannot be replevied, even if the execution has been paid and satisfied. If the officer, upon an execution against A, seizes the goods of B, the latter may bring replevin. Or, if the judgment was void for want of jurisdiction, replevin lies. 2 Estes, Pl. § 2155.

18 J. R. A.

To constitute a valid levy, the officer must bring his property under dominion and control. This he cannot do while it is in the hands of another officer under levy, for he could not lawfully obtain any dominion over it while thus in custody of the law. Seymour v. Newton, 17 Hun. 32.

In accordance with the principle stated in the preceding cases, it is held that property once levied on under a valid execution remains in the custody of the law, and it is not liable to be taken by another execution in the hands of a different officer, and especially by an officer acting under another jurisdiction. Hagan v. Lucas, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 400, 9 L. ed. 470; Taylor v. Carryl, 61 U. S. 20 How. 583, 15 L. ed. 1028; Clymer v. Willis, 3 Cal. 363; Thompson v. Brown, 17 Pick. 462; Kidder v. Orcutt, 40 Me. 589.

Reason for the rule.

This principle is said to be essential to the dignity and just authority of every court, and to the comity which should regulate the relations between all courts of concurrent jurisdiction. A departure from it would lead to the utmost confusion, and to endless strife between concurrent jurisdiction deriving their powers from the same source; but the consequences of such a departure would be still more disastrous in the conflict of jurisdiction between courts whose powers are derived from entirely different sources, while their jurisdiction is concurrent as to the parties and the subject matter of the suit. Buck v. Colbath, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 334, 341, 18 L. ed. 257, 260.

5, 1889, "to enable the district court to make some adjudication in the replevin suit." It was further ordered that, if the suit should be still pending at the date to which the cause was continued, then it should be subject to a further continuance, on the request of the State. On the 5th day of November, 1889, the cause was continued to the next day by the justice, on account of the general election. On the 6th day of November, there being no appearance by the claimants, the property in controversy was adjudged to be forfeited. When the coroner attempted to serve the writ of replevin, the sheriff at first refused to surrender the property. Thereupon an application was made to the court from which the order issued, which recited the refusal of the sheriff and asked that he be required to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. The court upon that application ordered the sheriff forthwith to deliver to the coroner the property in controversy, and that order was obeyed. The defendant asked the court, by motion, to cancel that order, but the motion was overruled. In September, 1889, the defendant filed his answer. In January, 1890, the plaintiff filed a reply, and the trial of the cause was commenced to a jury. After all the evidence had been introduced, the defendant asked the court to direct the jury to return a verdict for him, but was refused. The court then, upon its own motion, instructed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff, which was done.

1. The plaintiff contends that the law under which the seizure was made by defendant is unconstitutional, and relies upon the case of Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, as sustaining his claim. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States held that a citizen of one State has a right to import intoxicating liquor into another State, and there sell it in original packages, notwithstanding a prohibition of the statutes of the State into which the liquor was imported; and in which it was sold. So far as such statutes prohibit transactions of that kind, they were held to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void. But it was not held that a State may not enforce its police regulations against traffic in liquor which is not in the nature of interstate commerce. The State has the right to enforce such regulations, and one of the means provided is a proceeding by search warrant, such as was adopted in regard to the liquor in controversy. It may be conceded that such liquor was prohibited from forfeiture by reason of the rule announced in the Leisy Case, and that upon the final hearing before the justice it should have been restored to plaintiff. But the object of the proceeding was to ascertain if a law of the State was being violated, not to declare forfeited property which was not subject to its provisions. In such a case, if the court errs, the party aggrieved has the right of appeal. The proceeding cannot, however, be ignored nor treated as a nullity. It is a duly constituted means of ascertaining and determining the rights of the respective parties in interest, including the right of the owner of the property to claim it as exempt from the operation of the state laws, and the decision of the court is binding, as in other cases. It follows from what we have said that the search warrant was properly issued, and the property in controversy was rightfully in the hands of the defendant when this action was commenced and the writ of replevin was issued.

It was said in Funk v. Israel, 5 Iowa, 450, that liquors seized by virtue of a search warrant issued under a statute substantially the same as section 1544 of the Code could not be replevied. That decision was approved in State v. Harris, 38 Iowa, 246. It was said in the case last cited that the writ of replevin was not a lawful process for taking property from the possession of an officer rightfully holding it, under a writ properly issued in a criminal proceeding. We conclude that the writ of replevin was wrongfully sued out in this case, and that the court had no power to cure the defect by ordering the sheriff to deliver the property in question to the coroner.

2. It is urged that the action of the justice in continuing the proceedings in connection with the search warrant from May 24 to November 5, 1889, was unauthorized, and that by so doing he lost jurisdiction of the case. When this action was commenced, the justice's court had jurisdiction of the property in controversy. It was in the custody of the law, subject to the further order of that court. The proceedings of that court were entirely regular, until after plaintiff had appeared and pleaded. When he entered his appearance, the court had complete jurisdiction of both the person and property of the plaintiff in this action. If it exceeded its jurisdiction in granting the continuance demanded, the plaintiff had an appropriate remedy for correcting the error by direct proceedings. We cannot in this action inquire into that question. In our opinion on the undisputed evidence, the motion of defendant for a verdict in his favor should have been sustained.

3. The petition alleges that the value of the property in controversy is $200. The answer alleges that it is worth more than that sum. On the trial defendant conceded that it was of the value alleged in the petition. Evidence was given on behalf of plaintiff to the same effect. The defendant, in his motion for a verdict, asked that the value of the property be fixed "at the sum testified to." Since there was practically no dispute as to the value, defendant was entitled to judgment for $200.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to that court to render judgment in favor of defendant for the amount stated, with interest thereon at 6 per cent per annum from the date of its former judgment, and costs.

Rehearing denied October 22, 1891.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Giles GILBERT, Appt.,

v.

Charles H. ELDRIDGE et al., Respts.

(....Minn.....)

- *1. The riparian right of the owner of lands on the shore of navigable water, as on our great lakes, to reclaim, improve, and occupy the land submerged by shallow water, beyond the shore, may be dissociated from the shore-land by the act of the owner, so that a conveyance by him of the shore-land would not include such riparian rights as incident thereto.
2. This principle applied in a case where the owner of shore-land platted it, together with the shallows beyond the shore, into town blocks and streets.
3. The owner, after such platting, having conveyed an inland block with reference to the platting, and the water having gradually encroached upon the land, until the shore-line reached that block,—Held, that the riparian right to reclaim and use the platted blocks and streets in the water did not attach to the block thus conveyed as incident thereto.

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the District Court for St. Louis County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the filling in of certain land covered by water lying between complainant's land and the deep waters of Lake Superior or the Bay of Duluth. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William W. Billson, for appellant:

Lands gradually and imperceptibly denuded and submerged by the action of navigable waters cease to be private property as a part of the bank, and become public property as a part of the bed.

The theory that, as the respondents were formerly the owners of block 110, by title which extended indefinitely downward toward the center of the earth, they must still be the owners of it, notwithstanding that its surface has been washed away, was decently buried more than two hundred years ago, and the doctrine of alluvion or accretion is the grass which grew upon its grave.

It was precisely upon this ground that the possibility of acquiring title by accretion or reliction was originally denied.

De Jure Maris, p 14.

There could be no right, either of alluvion or reliction, until the inaccuracy of this reasoning was confessed. The rights of alluvion, reliction and erosion are strictly correlative.

There is no possible process of reasoning which justifies or establishes any one of them which does not justify and establish all of them.

In Smith v. St Louis Public Schools, 80 Mo. 290, it is said: "The law of alluvion is understood to be a part of the jus gentium, that code which natural reason has established among all men. The principle upon which the right is placed is, that the proprietor of land bounded by a river, being exposed to danger from its floods, is entitled to increment, which, from the same cause, may be gradually annexed to it."

Another accepted basis of the right of accretion and reliction is that suggested by Blackstone: De Minimis non curat lex.

Richardson v. Prentiss, 48 Mich. 88.

Messrs. William B. Phelps and White, Reynolds & Schmidt for respondents.

Dickinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the head of Lake Superior a peninsula of land called "Rice's Point" extends from the main land eastward into the water. On the northerly or northeasterly side of this peninsula is the Bay of Duluth, constituting the present harbor of the City of Duluth. On the south of the peninsula is St. Louis Bay. In 1858 one Orrin Rice, who then owned this land, platted the same as a town-site, and filed the plat thereof in the proper public office. The name of Rice's Point was given to the platted lands. Embraced in this platting were two blocks designated, respectively, by numbers as blocks "108" and "110." At that time the land comprising block 110 was situate on the northeasterly shore of the peninsula. The line of low water crossed the block, so that the northeasterly part of it was within the shallow water of the Bay of Duluth, while the southwesterly part of it was dry land. Block 108 was southwest of block 110, separated from it by a street, and was wholly above and beyond the shore-line. The platting of Rice extended into the shallow water of the Bay of Duluth, beyond the shore-line; other lots, blocks, and streets being platted in the shallow water beyond block 110. December 31, 1858, Rice, by warranty deed in the usual form, conveyed block 110 to one Wilson, to whose rights the defendants have succeeded, and block 108 to one Meeker, to whose rights the plaintiff has succeeded. In 1873 the common council of the City of Duluth, under authority of the Legislature, by ordinance established a dock-line in the waters of the Bay of Duluth, several hundred feet distant from this block 110, and nearly parallel with its water-front, thereby definitely limiting the right to construct wharves and other structures to that part of the bay within such dock-line. In 1872, for the improvement of the harbor of Duluth, the city caused a ship canal to be dug through another point of land lying between the Bay of Duluth and Lake Superior, which resulted in so changing the currents of water in the bay that from this, with perhaps other causes, the water gradually encroached upon and washed away the shore at the easterly end and on the northeasterly side of Rice's Point. The process of erosion and encroachment was so gradual as not to be perceptible, except by comparison of the conditions in different seasons. In 1885 this encroachment of the water had extended so far inland, on the northeasterly side of this point, that the shore-line at low water then ran across block 108, block 110, and the intervening street having become submerged. At the time of the commencement of this action a process of filling was being carried on under the authority of the defendants, so as to again raise the surface of block 110 and of the intervening street above the surface of the water. Thereupon the plaintiff instituted this action to prevent by injunction such attempted and proposed reclamation. The plaintiff rests his claim of right to the relief sought upon the ground that, by the gradual and imperceptible encroachment of the water, and the retrogression of the shore-line, his land (block 108) has come to be the riparian estate, and that whatever riparian rights were originally incident to the shore-land are now vested in him as the riparian owner; and that the title of the defendants to block 110, and the riparian rights which may have been incident thereto, have been extinguished. The decision and judgment of the district court being in favor of the defendants, the plaintiff appealed.

We shall assume, in accordance with the claim of the plaintiff, but without so deciding, that it is a general principle of the common law that when the sea or navigable water, although not forming a boundary between adjacent estates, gradually encroaches upon and submerges the shore-land, the owner of the land thus won by the water becomes divested of his estate, and of such riparian rights as had been incident thereto; and that, in general, whoever may own the land constituting the shore has also, as incident thereto, the ordinary rights of riparian owners over the submerged lands beyond the shore, and out to the point of actual navigability. But, while this may be the general rule of law, it is not necessarily applicable alike in all cases. It may be controlled in its operation by the conditions under which titles have been acquired and held; and we are of the opinion that, by reason of the facts to which we have referred, of the platting of the submerged lands as well as of the upland, and of the conveyances of the platted blocks, under which these parties acquired titles, it is not open to the plaintiff to interpose objection to the refilling of the submerged block 110, or to assert that the defendants' title thereto or rights therein have become extinguished. Of course, the plaintiff cannot consistently claim that by the retrogression of the shore-line, and the submerging of block 110, he has acquired a title to that block. The shore-line did not constitute a boundary between the property of the plaintiff and that of the defendants; and, if we accept the theory of the plaintiff, that by the gradual submergence of block 110 the defendants' title became divested, it did not pass to the plaintiff. Not until and only as the defendants' title became extinguished by the retirement of the shore-line to and across the line of boundary between the two blocks, did the plaintiff acquire any proprietary right or interest in the premises beyond that boundary. If the defendants lost their title, it was by the slow process of erosion, and little by little, as the water advanced upon the land. If the title was thus gradually divested, as fast as the shore-line was worn away, the title either was extinguished, or, if it was transferred or passed to any other holder, it was to the State: and when, at length, the last thread of shore-land on block 110 was submerged, the title had either become extinct, or had passed to the State. As the line forming the boundary between the two blocks was crossed by the advancing water the title to the submerged block, if extinguished by the encroachment of the water, did not suddenly revive, to vest in the plaintiff; and, if already vested in the State, it did not pass from it to the plaintiff. If, then, it be conceded that the defendants lost their title, it is certain that the plaintiff never acquired it. The utmost that he can reasonably claim is that by reason of the gradual encroachment of the water, submerging the defendants' land and hence divesting them of their title, the plaintiff's land (block 108) has come to be the shore-land, and that, as incident thereto, he has acquired the ordinary rights of riparian owners, including the exclusive and riparian right to refill the submerged block 110, or to otherwise improve it, and to occupy it for his private purposes. Our inquiry, then, is narrowed to the question whether the plaintiff has become thus possessed of such rights, so that he may be heard to complain of the defendants when they proceed to fill in and reclaim the submerged block. The State not only does not complain, but, impliedly, from the establishing of the dock-line, it concedes and ever since 1873 has conceded, the right to reclaim, improve, and use the submerged lands. Miller v. Mendenhall, 43 Minn. 95, 8 L. R. A. 89. The defendants undoubtedly formerly enjoyed that right as respects this block of land, and might certainly have exercised it, at least at any time before the last thread of their land became submerged. The only question is whether that right has now come to be in the plaintiff. The defendants have never transferred it, and, if the plaintiff has become possessed of it, it is only because it must be deemed to attach as an incident to the shore land, and to have passed to him as the owner of block 108, as the shore-line receded until it reached that land. We have heretofore decided that riparian rights of this nature, although originally incident or appurtenant to the shore-land, do not necessarily remain so; that they are property rights subject to the control of the owner; that they may be transferred by him, and remain in existence and be enjoyed by his grantees, although having no interests in the estate to which such rights were originally incident. Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 722, 43 Minn. 104, and see Miller v. Mendenhall, supra. See also, to the same effect, Ladies S. F. Soc. v. Halstead, 53 Conn. 144.

It follows that when, by the act of the owner of the principal estate, such rights have been legally dissociated therefrom, 13 L. R. A.

the ordinary principles of law relating to the existence, transfer, and enjoyment of merely incidental rights would to a great extent cease to be applicable. Subsequent changes in the condition and right of enjoyment of the principal estate would not, of necessity, correspondingly and incidentally affect such rights. To illustrate, we will suppose that after Rice, the owner of this peninsula, and hence entitled to the right to reclaim, improve, and use the submerged lands, had platted it, and recorded his plat, as he did do, he had by deed conveyed the blocks lying in the shallow water outside of this block 110, across which the shore-line then ran; that such deed had been recorded, so as to be notice to all subsequent purchasers; and that thereafter he had conveyed to another person block 110. Except for the prior platting and conveyance of the submerged lands, the deed conveying the shore-land would have been effectual to transfer to the grantee the riparian rights of Rice, naturally incident thereto. But in view of those facts, and under the late decisions to which we have referred, the result would not be so. The platting and conveyance of the lands in the water beyond the shore-line would be legally effectual to transfer to the grantee all the right which Rice might have to reclaim and occupy such lands. To that extent the riparian rights belonging to him as the owner of the shore-land would be divested and transferred to his grantee. He would thereafter be precluded from enjoying such rights by virtue of his continued ownership of the shore, not merely by reason of an estoppel springing from any covenants which may have been embraced in his deed, but because he had effectually conveyed those property rights which had been appurtenant to his shore-land. His grantee would have acquired, at least as against him and those who might succeed to his estate, the legal right to occupy, improve, and enjoy the submerged lands, subject only to the paramount rights of the State. This right thus coming to exist in another than the owner of the shore estate, and enjoyable independent of it, could no longer be deemed incident to that particular estate or a part thereof. By the subsequent conveyance by Rice of the shore-land, these rights would remain unaffected. They would not pass by the deed as incident or appurtenant to the land conveyed.

As Rice might have conveyed the rights which he, as the owner of the shore-land, had in the submerged land, so, and for the same reasons, he might have conveyed the land above low-water mark, and have reserved the rights naturally incident thereto in respect to the shallows lying beyond the shore; and the grantee, in a deed clearly importing an intention to limit the grant to the land above the shore-line, would acquire only such land. The proposition thus stated and illustrated, that the owner of the shore-land may legally dissociate therefrom and transfer to another, or reserve to himself, to be enjoyed independent of the shore-land, his riparian right to reclaim and use the shallows lying beyond, so that neither he nor his grantee of the shore-land may thereafter claim such rights as incident to their estate, is applicable to the facts of this case. When Rice conveyed block 108 (through which conveyance the plaintiff's title was derived), he had already made and recorded the plat embracing not only the dry land, but the shallows beyond. Block 110, the land here in controversy, was located partly within the shoal water beyond the shore, and still beyond that other blocks, with intervening streets, were platted. Rice, and no one else,—subject to certain public rights which have not been, and probably never will be, asserted, and which do not affect the question before us,—then had the exclusive right to appropriate the submerged lands to occupancy, improvement, and use in the manner indicated by the platting; that is, in separate or distinct parcels, as town blocks and streets, wholly independent of the future ownership or use of his shore-land. No principle of policy or of law forbade him, as the owner of all this property and of these property rights, from thus doing, however it might result in adding to or impairing the natural advantages of the shore-land, or that lying inland from the shore, all of which he owned. Subsequent purchasers from him of the shore-land, or of the inland, purchasing with reference to the plat, might well be deemed to take their estates subject to the disadvantages as well as to the advantages resulting therefrom. He might thus restrict or limit the rights incident to his shore-land or inland, so as to bind, not only himself, but his grantees. Yates v. Judd, 18 Wis. 126.

It was said in Wilder v. St. Paul, 12 Minn. 192, 204 (Gil. 116): "The purchaser of a lot according to such plan acquires a right to every advantage, privilege, and easement which the plan represents. His lot is made valuable by other streets, as well as the one on which it fronts. By the sale of a lot according to such plan there is an implied warranty that the purchaser shall enjoy all the privileges and benefits which it is calculated to secure, and by no private arrangement can he be deprived of this." And so it may be said that such a purchaser takes subject to whatever disadvantages may be involved in the platting. For instance, as against the purchaser of block 108, Rice, although he had remained the owner of the riparian block 110, would have been precluded by his platting and conveyance from afterwards appropriating the street, platted in the shallow water beyond it, to his private use, so as to prevent the improvement and use of it as a street. But the grantee of block 108, conveyed with reference to the plat, would also be precluded from denying to the grantor or to his assigns the right to occupy, improve, reclaim, and use the blocks platted in the shallow water, even though in the course of time the shore-line should gradually move inland so as to reach this block 108, as has actually occurred. It was perfectly apparent from such a platting that Rice intended thereby to devote the platted blocks within the shallow water to disposal and use in separate parcels, and wholly independent of the ownership or use of the shore-land; and when the plaintiff's grantor purchased and accepted a conveyance of block 108, although the deed was in the ordinary form and included the "appurtenances thereunto belonging," it must have been understood that no right or interest in the blocks located in the water passed thereby. Even if the block conveyed had been in fact situate on the shore, it could hardly have been supposed that it was intended that the deed should, in legal effect, include all the platted blocks lying beyond the shore; or that, notwithstanding the platting of the submerged lands, it was intended that, by the conveyance of the shore block alone, with its boundary lines on all sides precisely defined by means of the plat, the ordinary and unlimited rights of riparian ownership should pass with the deed, so that the grantee should acquire thereby the exclusive right to occupy, improve, and use for his own benefit all the platted blocks and streets lying beyond. If, under such circumstances, a conveyance of the block situate on the shore would have been deemed not to have been intended to transfer to the grantee the existing property rights in respect to the platted lands beyond the shore, then, for the same reason, the gradual retirement of the shore-line, until the plaintiff's block has come to be on the water-front, has been of no effect to vest in him any property rights in respect to such submerged blocks. The conveyance of a platted inland block was as much subject to the effect of the platting as a conveyance of a riparian block would be; and if in the latter case the ordinary riparian rights,—that is, the exclusive right to occupy improve, reclaim, and use the blocks lying in the water,—would not pass, then, for the same reason, the gradual retirement of the shore-line would not be incidentally attended with the consequence of vesting such rights in the plaintiff. He took his title subject to the existence of rights which, at least as between parties claiming under the common grantor and in accordance with the platting, had ceased to depend upon the location of the shore-line, or to be affected or devested by the shifting of that line. We have treated the conveyance to the grantor of the plaintiff as having been made with reference to the plat. It is true that the finding of the court does not show that the conveyance was in terms so made, and that probably would not be necessary to affect the grantee in the manner above considered. We suppose, however, that we are justified in assuming that the conveyance was really, if not in express terms, made with reference to the plat, not only from the finding that the conveyance was of the platted block numbered 108 of Rice's Point, but because the plaintiff in his complaint alleges his ownership of the block so described, "according to the recorded plat thereof," etc.

The conclusions which we have expressed, as to the power of a riparian owner upon a body of water, which does not form a boundary between his own and a neighboring estate, by his own act to dissociate his riparian rights in the submerged lands from his principal estate and with the consequences here indicated, naturally and logically follow from our former decisions above cited, and we know no good reason why those decisions should not be followed to the results here stated. The undoubted and exclusive owners of riparian rights, of rights in real property susceptible of enjoyment independent of the riparian lands, are thus held to be competent, not only to themselves use valuable property, the right to use which belongs exclusively to them, but, if more desirable, to dispose of their rights so that their grantees may make the property useful. Purchasers of the principal estate, after the riparian rights have been by any means dissociated therefrom, acquire all that they purchase. It is no hardship if, as in this case, the purchaser of a part of the platted inland is denied the advantage of claiming, to the exclusion of former owners, interests in property which he never purchased, and probably never expected to acquire, and which, if it vests in him at all, does so only by means which may be fitly called accidental. And on the other hand, if we have rightly declared and applied legal principles, those who have purchased and acquired the unquestioned and exclusive right of the riparian owner to occupy and enjoy the use of platted lands beyond the line of the shore, whether or not they may have reclaimed the same from the water or otherwise improved it, retain what they purchased; and neither their grantors, nor those who may succeed to the estate of the latter in any of the platted lands, can, by virtue of holding or succeeding to such estates, successfully claim that the rights of the purchasers have been divested, upon the ground that they were incident to the gradually shifting line of the shore.

Mr. W. H. Norris, for appellant:

The power of a corporation to issue stock and to receive money therefor is a corporate franchise, the exercise of which is vested in the discretion of its board. But this discretion is not unlimited. It is subject to the duty of the board to give pro rata preference to the existing stockholders as first and best entitled to fruitage of their previous investment and labor; and no majority of the stockholders can in this respect enlarge the powers of the board. If the corporation, either through its officers, directors or a majority of its stockholders, may dispose of the new stock to whomsoever it will, at whatever price it may fix, then it has the power to diminish the value of each share of old stock by letting in other parties to an equal interest in the surplus, and in the good will or value of the established business.

Ellett*, 132 Ill. 654.

Dickinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a domestic corporation, the general object of the organization of which may be said to have been to secure and afford necessary depot and terminal facilities for railroads running into the City of St. Paul, by means of a combination of all such railroads for that purpose. Its stockholders are various railroad corporations, at present five in number, operating lines of railroad running into that city. The defendant, a domestic corporation with a line of railroad running into the city, desires to avail itself of the benefits afforded by the plaintiff's incorporation, and claims the right so to do. In this action it was decided in the district court that, in order that the defendant be entitled to such benefits, it must become the owner of a proper proportion (one-sixth) of the stock of the plaintiff corporation. Of the whole amount of stock authorized, there was still unissued more than the amount required for this purpose, and the plaintiff was willing to sell such stock to the defendant at what the plaintiff deemed to be the actual value of it (a price much above the par value), and thereupon to admit the defendant to the enjoyment of the benefits desired by the latter; but the defendant contends that it should be allowed to purchase its proper proportion of the stock at its par value, without regard to the fact that the property held by and devoted to the use of the Depot Company may have greatly increased in value. The principal controversy on this appeal is whether the defendant should be required to pay more than the par value for the stock. In deciding this question, attention is directed to the peculiar nature and objects of the plaintiff's incorporation.

We had occasion to consider this subject for another purpose in State v. St. Paul Union Depot Co., 42 Minn. 142, 6 L. R. A. 234, and the opinion in that case so fully sets forth the character and objects of the corporation that we will avoid repetition by here referring to that statement. We are of the opinion that it was rightly decided that the defendant should only be required to pay the par value of the stock, which is all that any of the companies composing the corporation have heretofore paid for their stock therein. This conclusion is most consistent with the purposes and intention entering into the plan of incorporation, as shown in the articles adopted, and in the Special Law of 1879 (chap. 318), which was accepted by the corporation, and became a part of the law of its existence. It seems apparent that the object sought to be accomplished was to bring all the railroads, whose lines of road should enter the city, into a legal acting, efficient combination, as a convenient and advantageous means of providing and maintaining suitable depot and terminal facilities, for the common use of all the roads, facilitating transfers from one line of road to another, and contributing to the convenience and advantage both of the railroad companies and of the public. The scheme contemplated the combination, not only of the railroads entering the city at the time the organization was effected, but of such as should come thereafter. It was doubtless considered that it would not only be advantageous for the new companies to enter the combination, but desirable on the part of the previous members that they should do so. For the most complete accomplishment of some, at least, of the obvious purposes contemplated, such a general combination was to be desired. Not only did the original articles of incorporation indicate that it was intended that the contemplated facilities should be "open alike to the use [under proper regulations] of all railroads now constructed, or which may be hereafter constructed, to or into the said city;" but, by the special law above referred to, any such corporation was empowered to "subscribe to the capital stock of the said St. Paul Union Depot Company, or become a stockholder thereof;" and upon becoming the owner of such a number of shares of the stock "as shall be deemed equitable by the board of directors of the said St. Paul Depot Company, and upon executing an agreement to conform to its by-laws and regulations, and to pay such charges as are required to be paid by the other railroad companies, any such company is declared to be entitled to elect or appoint one member of the board of directors. By section 4 it is declared: "There shall be no unjust discrimination against or in favor of any railroad corporation or railroad company using, or desiring to use, the said road, tracks, and union depot of the said the Saint Paul Union Depot Company, but the terms, conditions, and regulations adopted for the same shall be, as far as practicable, uniform, and apply alike to all railroads using, or desiring to use, the said road, tracks, and union depot of the said the St. Paul Union Depot Company." As being significant of the intention that only the par value should be required to be paid by a railroad company entitled to acquire a membership in this corporation, it is to be noticed that, while it was obviously intended that, from time to time, subsequent to the corporate organization, other railroad companies were to become the owners of stock, and become members of this corporation, provision is made, as above indicated, for determining or apportioning the number of shares which any such railroad company should take, while no provision is made respecting the price to be paid therefor. Both the original articles of incorporation and the amended articles, adopted in 1884, however, provide that the stock shall be divided into a specified number of shares, of $100 each. All this is naturally consistent with the theory that all the companies whose roads enter the city should be permitted to take their proper proportion of the stock, as subscribers, at the value named in the articles of incorporation. Thus would the "conditions" under which different companies might be entitled to the benefits to result from the combination be, "as far as practicable, uniform, and apply alike to all," as the special law requires. On the other hand, if effect be given to the claim of the plaintiff, and if its theory as to the increased value of the depot property, and hence of its stock, be correct, it might directly result in an inequality of burden between the corporations sharing alike in the benefits of the organization, which would be quite contrary to the provisions of the special law, and to the obvious purposes of the corporate organization. The five companies constituting the present membership paid for their stock at the par value of $100 per share; but it is demanded of this defendant that it pay for its proper proportion of the stock at the rate of $342.86 per share, amounting to $200,000 for one sixth of the stock. It may be readily seen that the admission of new members upon such terms might provide funds sufficient to pay off the whole indebtedness of the corporation ($250,000), and, if the stock is to be reapportioned as new members come in, so as to preserve equality in the amount of stock held, it would reimburse to the companies now composing the corporation all that their stock had cost them, thus giving to them the advantages and benefits of the combination at the expense of the junior members of the corporation.

In view of the peculiar purposes for the accomplishment of which this corporation exists, of the means contemplated and adopted for securing such purposes, and of the conditions relating to the holding of its stock, there would seem to be not much propriety in assigning to it a commercial or market value greater than that fixed in the corporate articles. It is difficult to understand how it could commercially bear a value greater than that, if, indeed, it can be said to have a commercial value. The title of the property which the corporation acquired, improved, and occupies, and upon which the alleged increase in the value of the stock may be supposed to rest, is not an unqualified title in fee simple. It is conditioned upon the continued use of the premises for the specified corporate purposes. Its value to the corporation, or to its members, consists in its practical usefulness; its adaptation to the actual uses of the organization. That usefulness is not affected by any enhancement in the commercial value of the land. The plan of incorporation was not to secure a profit to the corporation or to its members, in the ordinary sense of the term, but to unite the several railroad companies in the undertaking of providing and maintaining necessary railroad facilities for their common benefit, as well as for that of the public. The income was chiefly derived from the members themselves, by tolls or rates for the use of the depot and other railroad facilities, and was graduated to meet the necessary current expenses, and to pay interest on its bonded indebtedness, and 6 per cent interest, and no more, on the stock. To a large extent, at least, the amounts of interest received by stockholders may be said to come from tolls or rates paid by themselves. There could be no profit, such as could enhance the value of stock, derived from an income paid by the stockholders themselves. The right to hold this stock, and to enjoy the benefits of the organization, is restricted to railroad corporations whose lines of road enter the City of St. Paul; and by the action of the corporation its stock is made subject to be forfeited if the Railroad Company holding it fails to avail itself of the use of the facilities afforded, and to pay the tolls and rentals charged. By resolution of the corporation, it is provided that the stock shall not be transferable. These considerations, from which it would seem to be improbable that this stock can bear a value above par, also go to support the view, already expressed, that it was not originally contemplated that any other than the fixed par value should be paid by the corporations who should be entitled to become stockholders, and to share in and contribute to the benefits of the organization. As it could have hardly been anticipated that the stock would come to have a value greater than the price fixed in the articles of incorporation, it may readily be supposed that no other price was intended to be paid for it. This view of the matter is most consistent, not only with what is expressed in the articles and in the special law, but with the significant omission, already referred to, to make provision with reference to the price to be paid for stock subscribed for. It is consistent, too, with the construction which the corporation itself seems to have hitherto adopted and applied.

After the rendition of the judgment in this action, the plaintiff moved for leave to file a supplemental reply, alleging that, since the completion of the trial, the plaintiff had offered to issue and sell to its present stockholders, at its par value, all the stock which it is authorized to issue (the limit being $500,000), and that three of the five stockholders had elected to take their proper proportion of it. This is alleged to have been necessary as a means for providing funds for making needed improvements in the depot facilities, and which have been made at an expense of more than $180,000. The motion was denied, and the plaintiff has appealed both from the order denying the motion and from the judgment. We think that, for at least two reasons, the court was justified in refusing the plaintiff's application. One is that it does not appear that all of the unissued stock has been or will be taken by the present members of the corporation, or that enough will not remain to be issued to this defendant in accordance with the judgment. The other reason is that, even if all the stock had been issued to the existing members of the corporation, the defendant would still be entitled to an apportionment and transfer to it of its proper share of the stock; and for that purpose the present stockholders should surrender so much of the stock held by them as may be necessary. They received and hold the stock subject to this condition. The obvious and expressed purposes of the corporation are not to be frustrated by allowing the existing stockholders to take and to hold all the stock so as to exclude other corporations from participation. That would be opposed to the purposes for which the corporation has its existence.

Order and judgment affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Charles KIESSIG, Resp't.,

v.

A. M. ALLSPAUGH et al., and N. P. Lundeen, App't.

(.....Cal.)

A surety upon a contractor's bond conditioned to save harmless the owner from any claims for materials or labor used in the construction of the building, is discharged from liability if the owner without his consent pays over to the contractor money which the building contract provides he shall retain in his possession until final settlement for the discharge of claims; at least such will be the result if such money would have canceled all claims.

(September 16, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant N. P. Lundeen from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Diego County in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a contractor's bond brought to recover the amount which plaintiff alleged that he was compelled to pay because of defendant's failure to satisfy certain mechanics' liens in accordance with the provisions of the bond. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Meers. Parrish, Mossholder & Lewis, for appellant:

There is no principle of law or equity that will permit a beneficiary of a bond to bring about a loss by his own gross misconduct and then compel the surety to make good such loss.

Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 386.

The obligee can do nothing that would change or increase the liability of the surety without at once releasing the surety from liability on his contract.

See Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, §§ 79, 108, 378, 386, 457; Law v. East India Co. 4 Ves. Jr. 824.

Mr. Carl Schutze for respondent.

De Haven, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, Lundeen, was a surety for his co-defendants, Allspaugh and Hall, upon a bond executed to plaintiff to indemnify and save him harmless against any claims or liens for material or labor used or employed by his principals in the construction of a building, which they had theretofore contracted to erect for plaintiff. The contract price for the construction of the building was $8,000, and by the terms of the building contract the plaintiff was authorized to retain one fourth of that sum in his hands until final settlement between the parties thereto. The complaint alleges "that after the time said house had been finished, and when final settlement was made as per contract aforesaid, there were good and valid claims and demands and liens for mate-

NOTE.—Sureties' Liability not to be extended by implication.

The liability of a surety is not to be extended by implication. To the extent, and in the manner, and under the circumstances, pointed out in his obligation, he is bound, and no farther. It is not sufficient that he may sustain no injury by a change in the contract, or that it may even be for his benefit. He has a right to stand upon the very terms of his contract; and if he does not assent to any variation of it, and a variation is made, it is fatal. Miller v. Stewart, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 703, 6 L. ed. 195; Anderson, Law Dict. title, Surety. See also M'Kay v. M'Donald, 5 Ala. 388; Granite Bank v. Ellis, 43 Me. 367; Reed v. Garvin, 12 Serg. & R. 100; Ludlow v. Simond, 2 Cal. Cas. 38.

The liability of a surety is always strictissimi juris, and may not be extended by construction beyond his specific engagement. National Mechanics Bkg. Asso. v. Conkling, 90 N. Y. 116.

The courts are not concerned with the inquiry whether the alteration is prejudicial or beneficial to the surety. This is immaterial. He is sponsor for one contract and but one, and no one has a right to make another contract for him. Fellows v. Prentiss, 3 Denio, 521. See also Ludlow v. Simond, supra; Ward v. Stahl, 81 N. Y. 406; Barnes v. Barrow, 61 N. Y. 39.

It is an elementary rule regulating the liability of sureties that they can only be charged when the case is brought within the strict terms of their contract (Brookhead v. Brown, 5 Hill, 685); and that their liability is not to be so extended by implication as to embrace purposes and objects not originally contemplated by the parties. McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. 596.

This principle applies with equal force to sureties upon a bond. United States v. Kirkpatrick, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 720, 6 L. ed. 199; Brookhead v. Brown and McCluskey v. Cromwell, supra; McMicken v. Webb, 47 U. S. 6 How. 232, 12 L. ed. 443.

The alteration of the obligation of a surety without his knowledge or consent extinguishes his obligation and discharges the surety. People v. Vilas, 36 N. Y. 460; Martin v. Thomas, 65 U. S. 24 How. 317, 16 L. ed. 690; Miller v. Stewart, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 702, 6 L. ed. 195.

A surety is not liable beyond the express terms of his contract, even where liquidated damages are provided for its breach; and the liability of the surety cannot exceed the penalty agreed upon. Tunison v. Cramer, 5 N. J. L. 498; Dickerson v. Cook, 8 Duer, 324; Clark v. Bush, 3 Cow. 151; Ludlow v. Simons, 2 Cal. Cas. 1; Walsh v. Ballie, 10 Johns. 180; Penoyer v. Watson, 16 Johns. 100; Manhattan Gaslight Co. v. Ely, 39 Barb. 174.

What acts will release the surety.

The surety may be released by substitution. Reid v. Nunnally, 24 Ark. 356; McIntyre v. Borst, 26 How. Pr. 411.

Or the creditor may discharge him by a parole declaration that he will look to others for relief. Harris v. Brooks, 21 Pick. 195; Foster v. Walker, 34 Miss. 385; Hope v. Eddington, Hill & D. Supp. 48.

Any fraudulent conduct of the creditor will relieve the surety from liability. Franklin Bank v. Cooper, 36 Me. 179; Ham v. Greve, 34 Ind. 19; Shively v. United States, 5 Watts, 332; Peacock v. Chapman, 8 La. Ann. 87.

And if the creditor prevents performance, the surety will be discharged. Trustees of Section 16 v. Miller, 3 Ohio, 261; Blest v. Brown, 4 DeG. F. & J. 567.

So where the surety abandons an appeal from a judgment rendered against the principal and himself on the faith of the creditor's promise that he will seek indemnity from the principal alone, the surety is released. Wimberly v. Adams, 51 Ga. 423. See note to Best v. Johnson (Cal.) 3 L. R. A. 168.

rial and labor expended and used in the building, construction, and finishing said house, in excess of the contract price of said building, to the amount of one thousand eight hundred seventeen 25-100 dollars;" and that by reason of the failure of the contractors to discharge them the plaintiff was compelled to pay the same after having paid the full contract price for the house. This action is brought against the principals and sureties on the bond referred to, to recover the amount so paid by plaintiff. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court, and from that judgment the defendant Lundeen prosecutes this appeal. The judgment cannot be sustained upon the facts. The appellant Lundeen was a surety, and as money sufficient to satisfy all of the liens mentioned in the complaint was, or ought to have been, in the hands of the plaintiff at the time of his settlement with the contractors, he should have so applied it, instead of paying it to the contractors. This balance was to be retained in his hands as an additional security against liens upon the building, and in equity he held the same also for the benefit of the sureties. It was a special fund to which they had a right to look for their indemnity, and in view of which it must be supposed that they assumed the obligation of sureties, as the original contract is referred to in the bond as the inducement or consideration for its execution, and the plaintiff was not authorized to surrender it without their knowledge or consent, and, having done so, the appellant was discharged. Bragg v. Shain, 49 Cal. 131; Taylor v. Jeter, 23 Mo. 244. In this latter case the court used this language: "The contract duty of this builder was to furnish the materials and do the labor, and he failed in both respects when he allowed the building to be incumbered with these liens. The owner, having notice of them, and paying what, by the substantial terms of the contract he was entitled to retain until they were removed, voluntarily abandoned an ample fund, which, according to the conditions of the contract, was to accumulate in his own hands as the primary security for its due performance, and in which the surety had an equal interest with himself. He must, therefore, bear the loss occasioned by his own negligence or folly."

This is an elementary rule of law governing the relation of principal and surety, and is thus stated by the Master of the Rolls in Law v. East India Co., 4 Ves. Jr. 829. "It cannot be contended, upon any principle that prevails with regard to principal and surety, that when the principal has left a sufficient fund in the hands of the obligee, and he thinks fit, instead of retaining it in his hands, to pay it back to the principal, the surety can be called upon."

The failure of the plaintiff to retain this balance, or to apply it for the satisfaction of the obligation for which the appellant was surety, does not present the case of a mere neglect upon the part of a creditor to insist upon a set-off in his favor, arising out of some other transaction, before paying what might be due on a particular contract, but was the neglect to resort to a fund already in his hands for his own protection, in the very matter for which the defendant was a surety, and which fund was therefore charged with a trust in favor of appellant, and its surrender without his consent constitutes a defense to this action.

Judgment reversed as to appellant Lundeen.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction which convicted him of criminal libel. Affirmed.

What necessary to sustain charge.

To sustain a charge of publishing a libel, it is not needful that the words or things complained of should have been read or seen by another. It is enough that the accused knowingly parted with the immediate custody of the libel, under circumstances which exposed it to be read or seen by any other person than himself. Desty, Cal. Penal Code, § 252, and note.

Publication defined.

The offense is committed by sending the libel to the one libeled, though it reaches the ear of no third person. Watrous v. Chalker, 7 Conn. 226; Swindle v. State, 2 Yerg. 581.

Statement by Gantt, P. J.:

This is a charge of criminal libel. The defendant lived in Mexico, Mo., and the Sprague Collecting Agency did business in Chicago, Ill., and the defendant's firm, consisting of Kabrick, Armstrong, Atkins and Snyder, employed this agency to do some collecting for them; and among the claims placed in its hands was one of $5 against the prosecuting witness, Mary Vincil. The agency used an envelope which bore the device "Bad Debt" in large letters. The charge consists in accusing the defendant of procuring the said agency to send envelopes to the address of the said Mrs. Mary Vincil, in St. Louis, from Chicago, Ill., and that the said words so used on the envelope are libelous. "Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 6th day of April, 1888. [Signed] Michael J. Keneflick."

The case, as made by the evidence, showed that defendant was a member of the firm of Kabrich & Co., merchants of Mexico, Mo. Mrs. Vincil, the prosecuting witness, had in her girlhood, and prior to her marriage, lived in Mexico. After her marriage she and her husband continued to live in Mexico, until he was killed in a railroad accident in 1880. After that, in the year 1881, she removed to St. Louis, and at the time of this prosecution she was clerking for Scruggs, Vandervoort & Barney, of St. Louis. According to the testimony of defendant, his firm claimed that she owed them an account of $8.70, due in 1881, and interest to the date of this prosecution, amounting in all to $5. This claim they placed in the hands of the Sprague Collecting Agency of Chicago. This agency used in its business an envelope, with these words printed on it in the left-hand upper corner: "Bad Debt Collecting Agency. 218 La Salle St., Chicago." Upon the receipt of this account, they opened a correspondence with Mrs. Vincil. It appears that she received four communications in envelopes like this in regard to this debt. The envelope described in the information was the fourth of the series that she received. She testified that at the time she received the first she was working at Scruggs, Vandervoort & Barney's; that a large number of employes were in the house; that their mail was put in a common repository, and distributed out of a common box; that different ones saw this letter, and the superscription on it. She was so mortified at this that she went to the postoffice, and directed her mail sent to her residence. Her relations saw the other three letters she received. When she received the first letter, she wrote on 30th January, 1888, to Armstrong, the defendant:

"Dear Sir: I received the inclosed from some association in Chicago. How dare you do such a thing? I have never refused to pay a just debt, but I do most emphatically refuse to pay them twice. My word is as good as Mr. K's, and I say again I have paid this bill, —a part at one time, and the balance on leaving Mexico. I have a statement of $5.85 from Mr. K. If he remembers a part of it being settled, how is it I am still charged with the full amount? I do not propose, with all my present grief and troubles, to be persecuted and annoyed further by you. There is a limit to all things. It is as much as I can possibly do to support myself and child; and, now that my father is dead, I will also have to contribute to my mother's support. This double method on your part to collect this bill twice is outrageous, more especially as it is against a woman who has no other resources but her own exertions to maintain herself and child. It is unworthy of a man. I will not submit to further insult. You will drop this at once, and withdraw my name, as you have no right to use it in such a manner. If you continue this it will be at your cost. [Signed] Mrs. M. B. Vincil, No. 2 N. Beaumont Street."

On the bottom of that is the answer to that. "2-1, 1888."

The Court. Did the letter that you wrote to the defendant come back to you with this lead-pencil memorandum at the bottom of it?

A. It did.

Mr. Goode (continuing to read). "We differ in opinion on this account. When paid, I will stop the agency, and would advise you to pay it at once, and avoid further trouble. Respectfully, A. G. Armstrong."

She received this letter from defendant, written, as the other one was, on the letter-head of Kabrich & Co., dated 14th February, and is as follows:

"Mrs. Mary Vincil, St. Louis, Mo.: Miss Mary, I have your letter 2-11, and contents noted. Herewith inclosed find your account. On receipt of five dollars I will stop Sprague's Collecting Agency. Hoping this to meet with your approval, etc., most respectfully, A. G. Armstrong."

To this is attached a bill dated "February 15, 1888, Mexico, Missouri," showing indebtedness, $6.70; credit by cash, $3.00; leaving due $3.70; interest on above, $1.30; making a total of $5.00. "The above is correct, according to your own buying and paying when in Mexico. Missouri. Yours respectfully. [Signed] G. Kabrich and J. B. Snyder."

There seems to be no question but that this account was barred by the five years' limitation. 18 L. R. A.

Mrs. Vincil had been a resident of the State all the time. Kabrich, one of the firm, testified there were two small errors in the account; that the balance due in 1881 was $3.45; that, with interest, it amounted to $5. He denied that she had ever paid this balance. She testified that she paid it when she left Mexico, to live in St. Louis. Among other witnesses, Mr. Bassford, editor of the Ledger, a newspaper published in Mexico, testified that when he heard Armstrong was to be prosecuted for libel he "interviewed" him concerning the matter. He went into his store, and asked him to tell him something about it, and read him an article that had been printed in the St. Louis Evening Chronicle the day before. Defendant said it was "pretty rough, proceeded to explain the matter to me, how he had dunned Mrs. Vincil. Mr. Armstrong stated that this lady, Mrs. Vincil, had owed the firm a bill for a long time, of which she had repeatedly been sent a statement, and that didn't avail very much, and so he sent one registered—sent a registered letter—in care of Scruggs, Vandervoort & Barney, for whom the lady was working. That letter was received, but there was no money forthcoming. He said he was a member of Sprague's Collecting Agency of Chicago, and he sat down and filled out a blank supplied by this concern, and sent it to Mrs. Vincil. About that time—I don't know whether it was at that stage of the talk or not—he showed me one of those blanks I have spoken of. After he sent the blank, no money came, he said, and he resolved to place the matter in the hands of this agency of Chicago, which he said he did. A short time after having placed it in the hands of the agency in Chicago, he received a letter from Mrs. Vincil. He described it as being a stinging one, of several pages, in which she denied the debt. He said the debt was just, and the book showed it to be unpaid. He said he wanted the money. This was the substance of the interview." Defendant also stated to the witness that he thought from the tone of Mrs. Vincil's letter she had received "a chromo;" that is, he described it as being a large envelope, covered with heavy, black letters containing the sentence "Bad Debt" or "Dead Beat" "Collecting Agency," and so forth. On the part of the defendant, it was shown that Mrs. Vincil had not paid $3.45 of the account; also evidence tending to impeach or deny Mr. Bassford's account of his conversation with defendant; also offers to prove she owed several other small bills in Mexico, which were refused by the court. Defendant testified in his own behalf that Mrs. Vincil owed his firm a book-account of $5 and he desired to collect it. He mailed her a card as follows:

"Mexico, Missouri [giving the month], 1888. Mrs. Vincil: Your bill, amounting to five dollars, is past due. Please call and make a settlement inside of ten days. The principal merchants and leading professions of the west have organized a protective union. I have become a member of the union. Every member is required to report all persons who owe bills that are past due. Please do not compel us to report your name. Respectfully, A. G. Armstrong."

The heading to this card read as follows: "P. H. Sprague, President. A. H. Wilson, Manager. T. W. Sprague, Secretary & Treasurer. Sprague's Collecting Agency, formerly Western Merchants' Retail Protective Union."

Defendant denied that he ever mailed a letter to Mrs. Vincil in one of the "Bad Debt" envelopes; denied knowing that the agency was using this form of envelope in writing to her until this prosecution commenced; and that he did not instruct or cause the agency to use this envelope. Whereupon the court gave the jury the following instructions:

"The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, on or about the 27th day of March, 1888, caused the envelope given in evidence to be sent to Mary Vincil, in the City of St. Louis, through the mails, willfully and maliciously intending and meaning to indicate to the public and to all persons seeing said envelope that she, the said Mary Vincil, was dishonest, or did not pay her just debts, or that she had been guilty of unfair dealing, or was a 'dead beat,' and that said envelope was so understood by those persons who saw it; and if the jury further believe that the reception through the mails of such envelope containing the inclosure set out in said information tended to provoke the said Mary Vincil to wrath, and to expose her to public hatred, contempt and ridicule, and to deprive her of the benefit of public confidence and social intercourse; and if the jury further believes that said defendant willfully and maliciously intended by said acts to advertise said Mary Vincil as a dead beat, or as dishonest,—then the jury will find the defendant guilty, unless they further find that said Mary Vincil is a dead beat, and is dishonest, and unfit to be trusted, and unfit for public confidence. (2) The jury are instructed that malice is the willful doing of a wrongful act without just cause or excuse; and they may infer malice from the facts, if they believe it to be the natural inference to be drawn from them. (3) The previous good character of the defendant, if established, is a fact in this case which the jury ought to consider in passing upon his guilt or innocence of this charge. (4) But if all the evidence in the case, including that given touching the previous good character of the defendant, shows him to be guilty, then his previous good character cannot justify or excuse the offense. (5) The defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf; but the fact that he is a witness testifying in his own behalf, and the interest he has at stake in this case, may be considered by the jury in determining the credibility of his testimony. (6) The jury are the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses. With that the court has nothing to do. And if you believe and find from the evidence that any witness has willfully testified falsely to any material fact in the case, you are at liberty to disregard the whole or any portion of such witness' testimony. (7) The law presumes the defendant to be innocent, and this presumption continues until it has been overcome by proof which establishes his guilt to your satisfaction and beyond a reasonable doubt; and the burden of proving his guilt rests with the State. If, however, this presumption has been overcome by the evidence, and the guilt of the defendant established to a moral certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, your duty is to convict. If of his guilt you are not convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, your duty is to acquit. But to justify an acquittal on the ground of doubt alone, it should be reasonable and substantial, and not a mere guess or conjecture of the possibility of innocence. (8) The jury are further instructed that if defendant caused said envelope to be sent through the mails directed to the said Mary Vincil at the City of St. Louis, then such acts constitute a publication of the libel in said city. (9) If the jury find the defendant guilty, they may assess his punishment at imprisonment in the city jail for a term not exceeding one year, or by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment. (10) The jury are instructed that the only meaning that they can put upon the words 'bad debt' upon said envelope are the usual and ordinary meaning attached to them as used in the English language; and they are not to place the meaning and meanings alleged by way of innuendo in the information, unless they find that the words 'bad debt' and the said meaning and meanings so alleged by way of innuendo are the true meanings and sense of the said words 'bad debt.' (11) The court instructs the jury that the mere fact that the defendant, Armstrong, may have been a subscriber to or employer of the Sprague Collecting Agency of Chicago, will not render him liable for their criminal acts; and that said defendant is not responsible for the sending or publishing of the alleged libelous matter, unless such was done by him or upon his direction and instruction. (12) The court instructs the jury that an indebtedness by open account is a valid and legal debt, although of more than five years' existence. (13) The court instructs the jury that before the jury can convict they must find and believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the prints alleged and set forth in the information herein were of a libelous nature, and had the effect of charging the aforesaid Mary Vincil with being dishonest, and guilty of unfair dealing; and that, further, said prints were sent to the said Mary Vincil by the defendant, or by someone at his instance and request; and, further, that the inference to be drawn from the prints of 'bad debt,' etc., on the alleged envelope, were, as a matter of fact, untrue. (14) The jury are instructed that they are the sole judges of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, and it is for them to find from the evidence in this case whether there was any intention on the part of the defendant, in the use of the means employed to collect a debt, to libel the prosecuting witness, Mary Vincil; and, if they find there was no such intention, then they will return a verdict of not guilty. (15) The court instructs the jury that under the Constitution of Missouri and the statutes thereof the jury are themselves the judges of the law of libel, as well as of the facts, and that they are not required to accept the instructions given by the court as being conclusive of what the law of criminal libel is."

To the giving of which said instructions the defendant excepted, and saved his exceptions at the time.

Refused instructions. And the defendant asked the following instructions: "(1) The court instructs the jury at the close of all the testimony that, under the evidence in this case, they must acquit the defendant. The court instructs the jury that they cannot construe the words 'bad debt' as meaning that one is a 'dead beat,' or that one 'has been guilty of unfair dealings,' or 'is dishonest;' and that the jury should disregard so much of the innuendo of the information in this case as charges such to be the meaning of said words 'bad debt.' (2) The court instructs the jury that there is no evidence in regard to the receipt by Mary Vincil of the letter set forth in the information, and purporting to come from the Sprague Collecting Agency of Chicago, nor publication of said letter in the City of St. Louis, and the jury should disregard said letter, and that portion of the information in reference to the same, and all charges of libel based on the same. The court instructs the jury that the law presumes the defendant to be innocent of the crime alleged in the information; and that, before the jury can find the defendant guilty in this case, the State must prove to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, at the City of St. Louis, on or about the 27th day of March, 1888, did unlawfully and maliciously mail to the said Mary Vincil, or that the defendant, at the City of St. Louis, on or about the 27th day of March, 1888, did unlawfully, willfully, and maliciously cause to be mailed to the said Mary Vincil, the said envelope shown in evidence, and that by so doing he, the defendant, intended thereby to commit the offense of criminal libel; and before the jury can find that the defendant did cause the mailing of said envelope to be done, the State must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant directed the said Sprague Collecting Agency to direct and mail the said envelope with the words 'bad debt' thereon; and the State must further prove to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the said Mary Vincil does not owe the debt claimed by defendant; and, unless the State has proven all of these things to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, then the jury will return a verdict of not guilty. (3) The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence in this case that the said Mary Vincil owes the debt referred to in the correspondence put in evidence in this cause between her and the defendant, then it is their sworn duty to return into court a verdict of not guilty, although the jury may find that said debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations of five years. (4) The jury are instructed that, although they may find that the words 'bad debt,' as used upon said envelope, are libelous, still, before they can find the defendant guilty, they must further find that the defendant directed the composing of and publishing of said libelous matter, and this fact must be proven to the jury by the State beyond a reasonable doubt. (5) The court instructs the jury that evidence of good character is competent in favor of a person accused and on trial, as tending to show that he would not commit the offense alleged against him; and if in this case the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant has always borne a good character for truth and honesty and quietude among his acquaintances and in the neighborhood where he lived, then this is a fact proper to be considered by the jury in arriving at a verdict; and if, after a careful consideration of all the evidence in the case, including that bearing on his character, the jury entertain any reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, then it is their sworn duty to acquit him. (6) The jury are instructed that they will reject and not consider any meaning placed upon the words 'bad debt' upon said envelope, except the usual and ordinary meaning attached to them in the English language. (7) The court instructs the jury that, although they may believe and find from the evidence that the defendant, Armstrong, placed an account against Mrs. Vincil in the hands of the Sprague Collecting Agency of Chicago for collecting, and that he may, at the time of doing so, have been aware of the methods used by said agency in attempting to make collections, yet the defendant cannot be held responsible for any acts of said agency in sending the alleged prints and writings, unless they were sent at the instance and request of defendant."

Which the court refused, to which refusal of the court the defendant excepted, and saved his exceptions at the time. After argument of counsel the jury returned into court the following verdict: "State of Missouri v. A. G. Armstrong. Charged with criminal libel. We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant guilty as charged in the information, and assess his punishment at a fine of $500. Thos. D. Ford, Foreman.

Mr. George Robertson, for appellant:

The court should have sustained the defendant's demurrer to the State's evidence, as it did not appear from the evidence that the defendant knowingly or willfully caused the matter to be published. He simply employed this agency to do some collecting, and the agency used its own methods. Sending the libelous matter, if it be such, was not within the scope of its employment.

Gantt, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant contends that various errors were committed in this trial, and they will be noticed in the order in which he complains. His first assignment is the insufficiency of the information. The verification is claimed to be bad because the prosecutrix only swore that the facts stated were "true to her best knowledge and belief." This was ruled otherwise in the recent decision of this court in State v. Bennett, 102 Mo. 352, 10 L. R. A. 717. It is next said that the information is bad for duplicity. This objection is raised for the first time in the motion in arrest. There are various methods for taking advantage of duplicity in an indictment or information. A motion to quash, a demurrer, or motion to compel the State to elect, will, either of them, correct this fault; but it is almost universally held that it is too late after verdict to make this objection in a motion in arrest in a misdemeanor. 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. §§ 442, 443; Com. v. Tuck, 20 Pick. 356; Wharton, Crim. Pl. §§ 255, 760. The cause was heard on the charge of libel, the evidence confined to that offense, and the instructions all had reference to that misdemeanor. We cannot see that any substantial right of the defendant was violated in this respect in overruling the motion in arrest. The matter complained of was at most mere surplusage, and this defect, if any, was cured by our Statute of Jeofails. Section 4115 or section 1821, Rev. Stat. 1879.

Equally groundless is the objection that the information did not charge the matter complained of was "willfully" or "maliciously" published. It distinctly alleges that defendant "did willfully and maliciously libel and defame the prosecuting witness by sending the said envelope with its indorsements through the mails," etc., and is sufficient according to the most approved precedents. The defendant was fully informed by it of the nature and character of the offense with which he was charged, and, after all, this is the great object of an information or indictment.

It is next urged against this information that it does not contain the written allegations of the libelous matter complained of. Anyone reading the information in this cause would be at a loss to understand this objection. As a matter of fact, the point made in argument was not that it was not in writing, but it was not written by the prosecuting attorney at the time the remainder of the information was drawn, but the original envelope, or at least that portion containing the alleged libel, was pasted in the information, and made a part thereof. Learned counsel for defendant seem to think that it was very material who did the writing. This point is entirely too technical to be seriously entertained in a court of justice. Besides these specific objections, there is a general assignment of error that the information does not charge an offense under the Statute. This information is drawn under section 3869, Rev. Stat. 1889 (Rev. Stat. 1879, § 1591), which defines a libel as follows: "A libel is the malicious defamation of a person, made public by any printing, writing, sign, picture, representation, or effigy tending to provoke him to wrath, or expose him to public hatred, contempt or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse; or any malicious defamation, made public as aforesaid, designed to blacken and vilify the memory of one who is dead, and tending to scandalize or provoke his surviving relatives and friends." Was the sending of this envelope with these indorsements on it the publishing of a libel, tending to expose the prosecutrix to contempt or ridicule, and bring her in disrepute with her employers and the public? We are clearly of the opinion that it was. The words "Bad Debt Collecting Agency" were printed in large, bold type on the envelopes, and were obviously intended to attract the attention of the public? These words must be construed in the light of the times in which they are used. Similar associations had sprung up all over the country, and these devices were resorted to to force debtors to pay their debts. To such extent did they go that the Congress of the United States forbade the use of the mails for their distribution. They had become so common that they were thoroughly understood in the mercantile world. Under this state of affairs, the defendant resorts to this Chicago agency to collect this debt of the prosecutrix. He sets in motion this machine for extorting this money from her. It was known that the prosecutrix was earning her living by her work in the large and responsible dry goods house of Scruggs, Vandervoort & Barney. Accordingly, these letters, four in number, are directed to her in the care of her employers. All the mail for the employes of this large house was put together and taken by the carriers to the store. There the various clerks went to a common repository for their mail. So that the scheme was well devised to attract the attention of those with whom she was most intimately connected, and without whose respect and good opinion the life of a sensitive woman would soon become a burden and unendurable. This envelope on its face was designed to attract the attention of the public, and when the prosecutrix received these letters in these envelopes the fact was thereby published that this association was in correspondence with her for the purpose of collecting a bad debt; and we cannot shut our eyes to the necessary implication that she was a bad debtor; that she was not in the habit of paying her honest debts; and was unworthy of credit. Nor are we left in doubt that this was the purpose of the association. In the letter which came under cover of this envelope the agency asks her: "Can you afford to have the public know that you refuse to pay this bill? You may need credit again some time, but as long as this account remains in this unsatisfactory manner it will be hard for you to obtain it." In other words: "By means of this style of publishing you to the world we will advertise you as unworthy of credit." Nor was this all. She is warned: "Should you positively refuse to make any arrangements for a liquidation of this claim, we feel justified in advertising the same for sale in the newspapers, as well as to send you a statement regularly until the matter is settled." These regular communications, if sent without these libelous words in large type, would not attract any attention; but, received regularly in this form, would give a painful publicity. The evident purpose and design of the defendant and the association he employed, and for whose acts he is responsible in this matter, was to publish the prosecutrix as a bad debtor, a dishonest person, who would not pay her honest debts, and to degrade her in the eyes of the public and her employers, and as such was clearly libelous, and within the meaning of the Statute. Muetze v. Tuteur, 77 Wis. 236, 9 L. R. A. 86; Dennis v. Johnson, 43 Minn. 301; Johnson v. Com. (Pa.) 14 Atl. Rep. 425.

The law will not countenance or tolerate this method of collecting a debt. The facts that the debt was originally only $3.45; that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations; that defendant persisted in his endeavor to extort the money from the prosecutrix after her protest; and the avowed intention of his agents to publish her to the world, and advertise this account for sale in the newspapers,—amply sustain the charge that this was maliciously done. To permit a defenseless woman in this day of enlightenment to be thus persecuted would be a reproach to our laws. Beals v. Thompson, 149 Mass. 405.

It is insisted by defendant that the court ought to have sustained a demurrer to the evidence. The defendant's own letters of February 1 and 14, 1888, both show that he was aware that this agency was sending to Mrs. Vincil letters that she regarded as insulting. She had appealed to him to call off this agency, and he complacently informs her he will when she sends the $5. "Qui facit per alium, facit per se," and this maxim applies in all its strictness in libel. Besides, Bassford, the editor of the Ledger, testified that the defendant told him he was a member of the Sprague Agency, and in referring to Mrs. Vincil's letter he said he thought she had received a "chromo," to which he alluded. After believing or thinking that she had received this style of a letter from his agents or associates in Chicago, he declined to stop them unless she pays the $5. There was ample evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury as to his knowledge and complicity in originating and publishing the libelous envelope. The pasting of the portion of the envelope containing the libelous matter in the information so as to make it a component part thereof was unusual, and, we think, wholly unnecessary, but it certainly did not and could not destroy its character as original evidence 13 L. R. A.

There was no error in admitting the letter of January 30, 1888, in evidence. It was admissible to show defendant's knowledge of the means his agency was pursuing in his behalf, and of the claim that the debt was paid; and his reply, written on the letter itself, shows his determination to persist, notwithstanding the protest of Mrs. Vincil. Nor did the court err in excluding the evidence of Reed, Emmons, Bedell, and Mrs. Harding, tending to prove that Mrs. Vincil owed them altogether some $18.50. No offer was made to prove her general reputation in regard to paying her just debts. She was not expected, nor was the State required, to come prepared to meet and try every individual claim that might be made against her. Evidence of specific indebtedness was not admissible. Wilson v. Noonan, 27 Wis. 508; Campbell v. Campbell, 54 Wis. 90; Muetze v. Tuteur, 77 Wis. 236, 9 L. R. A. 86. Indeed, the fact that, after the zealous efforts of defendant to destroy her character as an honest woman, he could only find an indebtedness of $18.50 against her in a community where she had lived for many years, is rather a vindication. It is questionable, if admitted, if it would have had any appreciable effect upon any sensible juror.

The point made, that the court permitted the State's counsel to cross-examine the defendant on matter not elicited by his counsel in chief, has been carefully examined, and we have concluded that it really amounts to nothing more than an inquiry if he understood what Mrs. Vincil referred to as insulting in her letter of the 30th of January. No possible injury could come from this. The court expressly ruled the counsel for the State to a cross-examination of the matter brought out by defendant, and none other was elicited. The instructions correctly told the jury what was necessary to constitute the libel under the information. The only one requiring special examination is the fifteenth, which informs the jury that they are the judges of the law of libel as well as of the facts, and they were not required to accept the instructions given by the court as being conclusive of what the law of criminal libel is. Section 14 of article 2 of the Constitution of Missouri declares "that no law shall be passed impairing the freedom of speech; that every person shall be free to say, write or publish whatever he will on any subject, being responsible for all abuse of that liberty; and that in all suits and prosecutions for libel the truth thereof may be given in evidence, and the jury, under the direction of the court, shall determine the law and the fact." It was to this constitutional provision in our Bill of Rights this instruction referred. In State v. Hoerner, 85 Mo. 558, Judge Henry, in discussing an instruction similar to the one complained of here, says: "The defendant asks the court to declare the law to be 'that under the law the jury are to determine the law and the facts in this case.' Section 1594, Rev. Stat. 1879, is as follows: 'In all prosecutions for libel or verbal slander the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and shall constitute a complete defense; and the jury, under the direction of the court, shall determine the law and the fact.' I confess that I do not fully comprehend the meaning of the remarkable concluding clause of that section;" and he condemns that instruction. No allusion is made by the learned judge to the Bill of Rights, nor to the history of this provision in our Constitution and law. Section 14, art. 2, of our Constitution is but a rescript of section 1, Fox's Libel Act, enacted by the British Parliament (32 Geo. III.) in 1792. Before that Act it had become to be the rule that the judge, not the jury, should decide whether or not the publication was a libel. The judge would direct the jury to find the defendant guilty on proof of the publication, of the innuendoes, and of the other necessary averments. But that Act declared and enacted that on the trial of an indictment or information for libel the jury may give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter put in issue before them. This Act in full will be found in Odgers on Libel and Slander, p. 665. In the case of Reg. v. Sullivan, for seditious libel, in 1868, this law was interpreted by Fitzgerald, J., who presided in the trial. It is reported in 11 Cox, C. C. 51. Among other things, in his charge to the jury, he said: "The next question is of paramount importance, and it is the one of which the jury are the sole judges,—whether these publications are seditious libels. That question of law and fact is intrusted to the jury alone. I know that some of you have considerable experience as jurors, and I have often had the duty cast upon me of addressing you as such. You must have observed that in ordinary cases, especially in the crown courts, the questions were divided into those of law and fact. The questions of law are usually for the judge, and on them the jury are bound to take his direction. The questions of fact are solely for their determination. In this peculiar case of libel the law of the land says the jury shall determine the whole question whether the publication is a libel or a seditious libel. That power has been given to the jury for the purpose of protecting the inviolable blessing of a free and independent press. You should bear in mind that, while you will receive assistance from me, you are not bound to follow anything I tell you. You are the sole judges of the law and fact."

In Reg. v. Burdett, 4 Barn. & Ald. 181, Mr. Justice Best said: "Libel is a question of law, and the judge is the judge of the law, in libel, as in all other cases. The jury have the power of acting agreeably to his statement or not." When we remember the origin of this provision in our Constitution, that it was the result of the speech made by Lord Erskine, in his defense of the Dean of St. Asaph in 1784, a speech declared by Fox to be the finest argument in the English language, and that this speech prepared the way for the adoption of Fox's Libel Bill in 1792, it is impossible for us to view it as having no other or different meaning than the other provisions guaranteeing a jury trial. Does not the usual construction apply here, as in other cases,—that, when foreign laws are adopted, and made a part of our Code, the presumption is that we adopt also the construction already given by the foreign courts where they had their origin? As we have seen, the English courts make a broad distinction in prosecutions for criminal libel and all other cases as to the province of court and jury. The scope of this opinion forbids any further elaboration of the great principles upon which this provision is founded. The argument of Lord Erskine on the right of juries in criminal libel is in itself a complete history, and will be found reported in full in 21 How. St. Tr. 847-1046.

Viewed in the light of the history of the constitutional provision, and the great contest for the freedom of the press out of which it grew, and of the construction given Fox's Libel Bill by the English judges, did the criminal court err, after it had fully instructed the jury in this cause, in further instructing them that they were themselves the judges of the law of libel, as well as of the facts, and that they were not required to accept the instructions given by the court as conclusive of the law of criminal libel? Is not this instruction, in substance and effect, just what the Constitution commands, and is it not simply another way of stating the same principles that were announced by Judge Fitzgerald in the Sullivan Case, supra, and Justice Best in Reg. v. Burdett, supra, viz., that while the judge may assist and inform him what the law is, and it is his duty to do so, still they are, by virtue of organic law, the final judges in a prosecution for criminal libel? We think so; and in so doing we conclude that the decision in State v. Hosmer was decided without this constitutional provision; and its history having been brought to the attention of this court, and inasmuch as it is of the very gravest importance that the Constitution itself should govern, we think State against Hosmer should not longer be followed.

This brings us to the conclusion that there are no reversible errors in the record in this cause, and the judgment of the Criminal Court is accordingly affirmed.

GENESEE FORK IMPROVEMENT CO.
v.

James IVES, Appt.

(.....Pa.....)

1. A second bond is not required from a corporation organized under the Act of 1883 for the improvement of the navigation of a stream, which has failed to agree with abutting property owners as to payment of damages, before it can exercise its franchises, if it has given the one prescribed by section 5 of that Act, although section 4 provides that in case of failure to agree as to damages they shall be assessed under Act 1874, § 41, which requires the tender of a bond to the person claiming damages.

franchise and collect tolls under a charter acquired under the Act of 1883 for improving the navigation of a stream cannot be defeated by denying the necessity of the franchise or questioning the degree of perfection in the improvements made by the company.

3. The reasonableness of the tolls charged by a company organized under the Act of 1883 for improving the navigation of a stream cannot be questioned so long as they are within the limit fixed by the statute.

4. A judgment will not be reversed for the error of the court in directing a verdict for plaintiff when the case should have been submitted to the jury because the right of recovery depended on oral testimony, where no interest of defendant would be subverted by reversal, if the assignments of error do not contain the language of the court in totidem verba, and the question is not argued for appellant.

(October 5, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Potter County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover tolls for logs floated on the Genesee Fork of Pine Creek. Affirmed.

At the trial defendant objected to evidence that he had floated logs on the stream by the aid of plaintiff's improvements on the ground that plaintiff had no rights in the stream because it had not filed the bonds required by statute. The objection was overruled, and the evidence admitted. [1st assignment of error.]

Defendant attempted to show that there was sufficient water in the stream to run out his logs without the assistance of any of defendant's improvements; that the stream was in no better condition for running logs after, than it was before, plaintiff's alleged improvements; that there had been no material improvement in the navigability of the stream; and that the improvements did not obviate the necessity of assistance from the banks in running the logs; all of which was objected to and excluded. [2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, assignments of error.]

He attempted further to show that ten cents per thousand feet was not a reasonable toll, and that no improvements had been made which would authorize the collection of any toll; all of which was objected to and excluded. [6th and 7th assignments of error.]

The court charged the jury that what was a reasonable charge per thousand feet was not for the court or jury to fix, but for the Company itself, the law simply fixing a maximum beyond which they cannot go. [8th assignment of error.]

The court instructed the jury to find for plaintiff the full amount charged. [9th assignment of error.]

The tenth assignment of error questioned the constitutionality of the Act of 1883.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Mann & Ormerod, for appellant: The plaintiff was a trespasser upon the defendant. It was attempting to exercise a right it had never obtained, not having made compensation to the defendant, who was a riparian owner, nor tendered security.

Lord v. Meadville Water Co. 8 L. R. A. 202, 185 Pa. 181.

It cannot be said that there was an implied 13 L. R. A. contract on the part of Ives to pay when he rolled his logs into the stream. It was a natural highway which he had used for that purpose for more than twenty-one years. It was the only way of getting his logs to market, and the same reasoning would not apply to his use of the stream, that might apply to the use of an artificial highway such as a railroad or a turnpike road.

Irvine v. Lumbermen's Bank, 2 Watts & S. 190, and Dyer v. Walker, 40 Pa. 157, do not rule this case.

The franchise to collect tolls did not vest with the granting of the charter. The law contemplates the making of improvements before the imposition of tolls, and the franchise to collect tolls did not take effect until the improvements were made. Tolls were permitted by the Legislature in consideration of making improvements, not of making an application for a charter.

Carman v. Clarion River Nav. Co. 81* Pa. 412.

An interpretation of this law which will permit a corporation to blanket a stream by purchasing a charter and passing a resolution to charge tolls, is in conflict with the rule which requires a construction of a charter against the corporation and in favor of the public.

The Legislature certainly never intended to allow a corporation to appropriate a public highway, unless for the public benefit. It could not be for the public benefit unless they improved its use, and an attempt to collect tolls before they had done something to benefit the public would be an imposition and fraud upon the public which the law will not permit.

Scranton E. L. & H. Co's App. 1 L. R. A. 285, 122 Pa. 174, 175.

The rights and powers of a corporation can be inquired into by the courts under the Act of 1871, p. 1360.

McCandless's App. 70 Pa. 216; Western Pennsylvania R. Co's App. 104 Pa. 406.

There is nothing in the Act which gives the plaintiff exclusive control of the stream. The Legislature evidently intended to limit the rights of the corporation to the control of its improvements. All persons shall have the right to have their logs floated with the aid of these improvements, subject to the payment of tolls. Exclusive rights of corporations are not favored.

Scranton, E. L. & H. Co's App. supra; Freeport Water Works Co. v. Prager, 129 Pa. 605; Emerson v. Com. 108 Pa. 111; Act of 1887, Pa. Laws 812, § 3.

Ten cents is the maximum figure for twenty miles. Ten cents is the amount charged Ives for floating his logs one and a half miles from the mouth of the stream. While the discretion of a corporation, if exercised reasonably, cannot be inquired into in a suit at law, still when that discretion is misused or abused it may be redressed or restrained in a suit at law.

Messrs. M. F. Elliott and Dornan & Peck, for appellee:

Our right to collect tolls was a franchise, contained without any limitation in our charter, and the defendant cannot, in this collateral proceeding, inquire into this franchise to take tolls, and take away or forfeit this franchise of the corporation.

Fenner*, 18 Phila. 107; 36 Legal Int. 124.

The Act of June 19, 1871, does not apply to this case, for that Act only authorizes a private citizen by bill in equity or other proceedings in accordance with said Act, to investigate into causes of forfeiture, which may appear from the limitations of the charter of the corporation.

Evidence that the improvements we had made were not beneficial to the navigation of the stream for floating logs, either generally, or so far as the defendant was concerned, was rightly excluded.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After the trial of this case the bond given by the appellees in the course of their organization proceeding under the 5th section of the Act of 1888 was found. The condition of the bond is in exact conformity with the requirement of the 5th section. It was duly approved by the court on March 22, 1888, and was therefore a full compliance with the statutory requirement in that regard. It is still contended, however, that the plaintiff was obliged to file another bond under the 4th section of the Act, before it could exercise its corporate franchise. While we do not consider that the defendant is entitled to raise this question in the present collateral proceeding, an examination of the 4th section satisfies us that there was no necessity for the giving of any other bond than the one required by the 5th section. The 4th section merely provides a method of proceeding for the assessment of damages sustained by the owners of dams and land along the streams, and simply directs that when the Company and the owner cannot agree as to the damages the assessment shall be made under the forty-first section of the Act of 1874 to which the Act of 1888 is a supplement. Upon recurring to that section we find that it contains an elaborate provision for the assessment of damages by the appointment of viewers whose proceedings are prescribed in about the usual manner in which views for such purposes are conducted. The section contains a further provision that when the parties cannot agree upon the amount of the damages to be paid, the corporation shall tender a bond to the party claiming damages, with condition that the corporation will pay such amount of damages as the party shall be entitled to receive after the same shall have been agreed upon by the parties, or assessed in the manner provided for in the Act. It is plain that the duty to tender this bond arises as a part of the proceedings for the assessment of damages in the cases covered by the Act of 1874. Had the Act of 1888 contained no other provision for the giving of a bond than is contained in the Act of 1874 it would have been necessary for the plaintiff to have given the bond required by that Act. But the Act of 1888 does contain a specific provision for the giving of a bond in its 5th section. The condition of the bond there required to be given is for the indemnification of all and every person whose property may be injured by reason of the construction and operation of the improvements of the corporation. As this language is broad enough to include all owners of dams and lands on the streams in question it is manifest that it is ample to confer every remedy afforded by the bond required by the forty-first section of the Act of 1874. The giving of such a bond therefore is entirely unnecessary when the bond required by the fifth section of the Act of 1888 has been given. The first assignment of error is not sustained.

The questions raised by the second, third, fourth and fifth assignments relate to matters which must be considered as having been settled when the corporate franchise was acquired. The right to appropriate the stream for the purpose of floating logs upon it was conferred by the Act of 1888, under which the plaintiff was organized. It could not be tolerated that the right to exercise the franchise and collect the tolls allowed by the Act, should be defeated by objections which deny the necessity of the franchise, or call in question the degree of perfection in the improvements made by the Company. Although it might be possible for an owner to float his logs upon the natural state of the water and without assistance from the dams, at times, that is no reason why the Company may not claim the fruits of its franchise. And so also as to its right to collect tolls, which is called in question under the sixth and seventh assignments. So long as the Company keeps within the discretionary limit fixed by the Statute, its right to collect the tolls cannot be defeated, nor its discretion to fix the amount questioned. All of this was decided in the cases of Boyle v. Philadelphia & Reading R. Co. 54 Pa. 810, and Cumberland Valley R. Co's App. 62 Pa. 218. In the latter case Thompson, Ch. J., said:

"The company has therefore the clear warrant of the charter for demanding the aggregate of the sums, viz.: seven cents per mile per ton for private freight in their own cars on their own road. Within this limit no court can interfere with them. This is settled by the charter and by the decision in the case of Boyle v. Philadelphia & Reading R. Co., supra. The master finds that the company has not transcended this limit and the court, very properly concurring with the master, dismissed this portion of the bill."

In the case of Parke's App., 64 Pa. 187, we held that the court has no right to interfere with a company's location of its road, on the score of preference, within the limits of its charter. In the case of Struthers v. Dunkirk, W. & P. R. Co., 87 Pa. 282, the present chief justice said: "There is only one question remaining in the case and that is, whether the court below should have received evidence to show that the company might have located its road upon another route and thus have avoided laying the track upon High Street. We are clearly of opinion that the learned judge was right in excluding evidence of this character, and also in his answers to the points, in which the same question was presented. The discretion of the company in locating its road cannot be reviewed in this manner. The location was made in the exercise of an undoubted power. It was said in Parke's App., 64 Pa. 187: "Neither the court below nor this court has any right to interfere with the location made by the company on the score of preference, if any be felt. The only question is whether it has or has not exceeded a discretion on the subject, apparent on the face of the Act of incorporation."

In the case of Bennett's Branch Imp. Co's App., 65 Pa. 242, in which the company was authorized to clear out, improve and use Bennett's Branch, to use dams erected and erect new dams, and to use all of said dams and the waters of the said stream, in the floating of sawlogs down the same, Thompson, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion, said: "The company, having authority by law to improve the stream in the manner prescribed for the consideration of taking toll on the lumber and logs floated thereon, would not lose its franchises, because the improvement was in fact not beneficial, there being no such condition prescribed. The Legislature determined that question in granting the charter and all the franchises granted will remain, in the absence of any limitation, until taken away by some direct action for that purpose, legislative or judicial. . . . The right to impose tolls as a consideration for the completion of an enterprise intended to benefit the public is a right of government. It is conceded to the promoters, as a compensation for the benefit, in contemplation of law, which every individual receives for an improved mode of transit of person or property. Individual complaints avail nothing against the right. These individual inconveniences must yield to the wants of the whole public. In most of these cases of improved navigation, by companies, or the State, if not all, individuals have always been found who would claim to be as well off without such improvements as with them, and yet they are obliged to pass over them with their property, and pay tolls. There is no reason in this for impeaching the validity of the law. This results from the accident of location and of this nobody is to blame but the owner, and he must submit to all legal consequences incident thereto." The consideration so well expressed in the foregoing opinion practically disposes of all the questions arising upon the rejected offers of testimony covered by the several assignments of error now under discussion, including the question of the reasonableness of the tolls charged for the logs floated in 1889. The only question discussed by counsel for the appellant under the eighth assignment of error is the correctness of the instruction that neither the court nor the jury had the right to determine what was a reasonable charge per thousand feet so long as the Company kept within the maximum price fixed by the Statute. As we have already held that this is a subject within the discretion of the Company, we think there was no error in this portion of the charge. We are bound to consider that so long as the charge did not exceed ten cents per thousand it was reasonable within the contemplation of the law. The ninth assignment of error, as it is pressed upon our attention, raises no other question than the one covered by the eighth assignment. The full amount charged was ten cents per thousand upon the number of feet of logs floated as stated in the testimony, and it is not claimed that there was any error in the court's statement of the quantity. It is true that the court did direct a verdict absolutely in favor of the plaintiff although the right of recovery depended upon oral testimony. This ordinarily would be error, as it includes substantially an instruction that the jury must believe the plaintiff's witnesses and that is a subject over which the jury has exclusive control. The ninth assignment is in violation of our rule of court as it does not contain the language of the court in totidem verbis. Expressed as it is, and discussed as it is, it complains only of the amount charged and not of the direction to find for the plaintiff. Were we at liberty to reverse for the technical error of the charge in this respect, we do not think any interest of the defendant would be subserved by our doing so. We prefer to say, therefore, that we disregard this feature of the assignment because it is not properly expressed, nor is the question itself anywhere discussed in the argument for the appellant. There is no force in the tenth assignment as the Act of 1888 is not an amendment to the Act of 1879, but to the Act of 1874, and the amended section of that Act is correctly re-enacted in the Act of 1888. Moreover, this point was not made in the court below and no exception on the record raises the question.

Judgment affirmed.

President, Managers & COMPANY FOR ERECTING a BRIDGE over the Juniata
River AT or near the Village of MIF-FLIN, in the County of Mifflin (now Juniata).

v.

COUNTY OF JUNIATA, Appt.

1. In a proceeding to determine the compensation to be made to the owners of a toll-bridge which has been taken by the county, witnesses should be questioned as to the value and not the cost of the bridge.
2. The cost of repairs upon a toll bridge which has been taken by a county cannot be considered in determining the compensation which must be paid to the owners because of such taking.
3. Returns of the value of its capital stock, made by a toll-bridge company to the state auditor as required by law, is competent evidence upon the question of such value in a proceeding to determine the compensation to be made to the company for the taking of the bridge by the county.
4. For what sum the county could have erected a new bridge is immaterial in a proceeding to determine what compensation it must make to the owners of a toll bridge which it has taken for the use of the public.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Mifflin County, fixing the compensation to be made to plaintiff because of the taking of its toll-bridge by the county. Reversed.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.
Messrs. Alfred J. Patterson and D.W. Woods, for appellant:

The certified copies of the returns made by the Bridge Company of the value of their capital stock, to the auditor general were competent evidence.

These returns were made under oath, and their object was to ascertain the value and worth of the stock for the purposes of taxation.

Compensation must be made to the owner.

The qualification of the right of eminent domain, existing by the general law of European nations and the common law of England, that compensation should be made for private property taken or sacrificed for public use, has in this country been established beyond legislative control by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the Constitutions of the several States. *Pumpelly v. Messrs. B. F. Junkin and A. Reed for appellees.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was held in Montgomery County v. Schuylkill Bridge Co., 110 Pa. 54, that where a bridge is taken by a county for public use under the Act of May 8, 1876 (Pub. Laws, 181), the measure of damages is the value of the property to the owners, not to the county taking it, and that such value is to be ascertained not only by the cost of the structure, but also by the value of its franchises. The value of its franchises depends largely upon its earning capacity. A bridge, as was observed in the case cited, is a peculiar kind of property, and seldom has a market value. The value of its capital stock may, and generally does, indicate with some accuracy, the value of its franchises. Hence in an action against a county for taking a bridge, the cost or value of the structure, the amount of net tolls, and the market value of its capital stock, are all elements to be considered in ascertaining the value of the bridge and its corporate franchises. No one of these elements, standing alone, would in all cases furnish a test; considered together, they will seldom fail to lead to a satisfactory result.

Property which may be taken.

The right of eminent domain clearly implies the right in the sovereign power to determine the time and occasion, and as to what particular property it may be exercised. Heyward v. New York, 7 N. Y. 325.

All private rights vested under the government, including those held by charter or other contracts, are subordinate to the power of eminent domain. West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. 6 How. 507, 12 L. ed. 535.

A franchise granted by a Legislature is subject to the right of eminent domain. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Louisa R. Co. 54 U. S. 13 How. 71, 14 L. ed. 55.

Like all other property, corporation property is subject to the necessities of the public; and not only its property, but its franchise, when inseparable, may be taken for public use on compensation being made therefor. Re First Street, 9 West. Rep. 573, 66 Mich. 42.

Any of its property not actually in use, or absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of the franchise, is subject to condemnation for other purposes, the same as the property of an individual. Ibid.; West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. 6 How. 543, 12 L. ed. 550; Petree v. Somersworth, 10 N. H. 370; Piscataqua Bridge v. New Hampshire Bridge, 7 N. H. 35, 63; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. Yet property taken by one corporation for a public use cannot be taken by another corporation, without an express grant or by necessary implication. Right by implication can arise only from ab-

The first three assignments may be considered together. The witness, L. G. Brown, was asked as to the value of the bridge, by which I understand to be meant the superstructure only. This was objected to on the ground that Brown, having contracted for the erection of the bridge, should have been asked as to the contract price. We do not think this objection well taken. The true question was the value of the bridge, not what it cost. The contractor may have taken it at too low a figure, or the owner may have paid too much; the county is entitled to pay for it at its actual value at the time of taking.

The fourth and fifth assignments allege that the court below erred in rejecting evidence in reference to the cost of certain repairs to the bridge. The evidence was clearly irrelevant and properly rejected.

The sixth assignment is more serious. The defendant offered a certified copy of the return made by the Bridge Company of the value of its capital stock, to the auditor general under oath, from the year 1881 up to the present time. This was offered for the purpose of showing the value of the capital stock as made for the Company under oath by its officers.

The capital stock represents the property and franchises of the corporation, and as before observed is an element to ascertain the damages. The plaintiff had given in evidence, to show the value of the capital stock or franchises, the receipts from tolls for 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889. It was clearly solite necessity, such as that without it the grant would be defeated. 'Pittsburg' Junction R. Co's App. (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 267; Groff's App. 5 L. R. A. 661, 128 Pa. 621.

A bridge held by an incorporated company under a charter from a State may be condemned and taken as part of a public road, under the laws of that State. West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. 6 How. 507, 12 L. ed. 535.

Measure of damages for toll-bridge taken.

The principle that the true measure of damages for property taken for public use is the market value of the property at the time of the taking does not apply to a toll-bridge company whose property is taken for a county bridge, such property being of a peculiar character and having no market value. Montgomery County v. Schuylkill Bridge Co. 110 Pa. 54.

The damages are not limited to the cost of the construction of a new and similar bridge at the time of the taking, but include the value of the franchises arising from the income from the tolls. Ibid.

In arriving at the value of the franchises it is proper to prove the receipts of the company for a matter of five years before the taking, but not to extend the inquiry back forty or fifty years to the organization of the company. Ibid.

A toll-house and canal bridge built by the company for the convenience and proper use of the bridge, are properly considered. Ibid.

In estimating the sum to be paid, the franchise of the corporation to collect tolls shall not be considered, but the court in Re Condemnation of Lock & Dam No. 7, 46 Phila. Leg. Int. 69, held that, as the question was not free from doubt, it would arrest the proceeding, but would overrule the objections, without prejudice to respondent's right to renew them thereafter.

competent, therefore, for the defendant to show the value placed by the company upon its own stock; a valuation made upon the oath of its officers. It is no answer to this to say that the return was made by the officers and not by the stockholders. The officers were the duly constituted agents or representatives of the latter, and their act was the act of the corporation itself. The return was made in pursuance of the Act of Assembly, and was the official act of the corporation. Hence we need not discuss the cases cited as to the power of an agent to bind his principal by his declarations. They are not relevant. While this return does not conclude the Bridge Company upon the question of value, it is nevertheless competent evidence for the consideration of the jury, and is moreover important. The difference between the verdict and the valuation placed upon its property by the Company under the oath of its officers is so great as to justify the suggestion that the verdict was too large, or the company has undervalued its property to escape taxation.

What has been said covers the seventh assignment. The eighth assignment is not sustained. It was not relevant to show what the county could have erected a new bridge for, at this or some other point. The county might have erected a new bridge, but it preferred to take the bridge of the plaintiffs, and must pay for it at its value to the latter. The remaining assignments refer to the charge of the court and are not sustained. The learned judge said in answer to the defendant's first point: "If the jury finds that the property was liable to destruction from flood or ice, this may be considered to the extent that this liability decreased the value of the property." This was an affirmation of the point, but the defendant complains that it was not strong enough, and that the learned judge should have instructed the jury that they must consider the matters referred to instead of that they may do so. This is somewhat of a refinement. The jury could not fail to have understood that if the liability to destruction from flood and ice lessened the value of the property, their verdict should be reduced to that extent.

The judgment is reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

Adolphus REINOEHL et al.

(..... Pa.)

1. Whether or not a policy of insurance taken out by a creditor on the life of his debtor, NOTE.—Life insurance; insurable interest essential to validity of policy.

An insurable interest must be actual, and such as will reasonably justify a well grounded expectation of advantage dependent upon the life of the insured. Corson v. Garnier (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 308; Baker v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 43 N. Y. 238.

A creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor. American L. & H. Ins. Co. v. Robert 13 L. R. A.

to secure his debt, is so excessive as to be a wager policy, is a question for the court where the facts are not in dispute.

2. A creditor may lawfully take out a policy on the life of his debtor in an amount sufficient to cover the debt, with interest thereon, and the cost of the insurance with interest thereon during the period of the expectancy of life of the insured, according to the Carlisle Tables, and may retain the full proceeds of the policy, regardless of the time of the debtor's death.

(October, 5, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lebanon County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the excess of proceeds of an insurance policy taken out on the life of plaintiff's testator, over and above the amount of defendant's claim, with interest and the cost of insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Grant, Weidman and A. Stanley Ulrich, for appellant:

There was in this case every element of speculation in life insurance, viz.:

1. Want of relationship.

Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74.

2. Disproportion between the policy for $3,000 and the debt of $110.

Cooper v. Shaeffer (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 601.

3. The taking and holding of the policy and payment of all premiums and dues by the defendants, from the start to the finish.

Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 16; Downey v. Hoffer, 110 Pa. 115.

4. The purchase of this policy by the defendants for the consideration of the satisfaction of their judgment of $99.51, with interest for one year and four months, and costs, and the satisfaction of their judgment in exchange for the assignment of this policy for $3,000.

Downey v. Hoffer, supra.

5. The receipt of the insurance provided for in the policy from the aid society.

With proof of these facts before the court, it erred in admitting the offer to prove that the speculative venture of the defendants would have proved disastrous to them if Bleistine had lived his expectancy of twenty-six more years. A disproportion so gross as 30 to 1 was not capable of excuse or justification.

The taking out of the policy and its assignment to defendants was the consideration with them for the satisfaction of the judgment. By this their debt was canceled, their lien was surrendered and priority was given to the subsequent lien-holders; and they by this substi-

An insurable interest, such as will take the contract out of the wager class, arises from the relation of the party taking the insurance to the insured, so that from such relation there may be some expectation of benefit or advantage in the continuance of the assured life. *Keystone Mut. It is a question of public policy and not of good intentions; and motives, however good, avail nothing.

Seigrist v. Schmaltz, 5 Cent. Rep. 280, 118 Pa. 326.

If I undertake to risk the payment of assessments which may run over a period of twenty-six years, and may with interest aggregate over $4,300 for the bare chance of getting $8,000—on the death of a man, perhaps on tomorrow and perhaps only twenty-six years from now, I am playing for the stake resulting from the happening of the event upon which it depends. The entire game is one of chance and on the early or late happening of the man's death, as in the case of the bet on the life of Napoleon Bonaparte in Phillips v. Ives, 1 Rawle, 86, depends the extent of my loss or gain.

See Gilbert v. Moore, 104 Pa. 78.

Disproportionate insurance of this nature is against public policy and a gambling transaction.

The sum insured must not be grossly disproportionate to the interest the holder of the policy has in the life insured, without leaving the transaction open to the imputation of being a speculation or wager upon the hazard of a life. *Wainwright v. The law seems to be well settled that it is wholly unnecessary to prove an insurable interest in the life of the assured, at the maturity of the policy, if it was valid at its inception; and in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, the sum expressed on the face of the policy is the measure of recovery. Rawls v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 27 N. Y. 222; Mowry v. Home L. Ins. Co. 9 R. I. 346; Hoyt v. New York L. Ins. Co. 3 Bosw. 440; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 80 U. Creditor's policy on life of his debtor.

A creditor holding a policy on the life of his debtor as security for his debt is a trustee to the extent of the proceeds above the debt and expenses, and may be called on to account therefor by the personal representatives of the debtor. Tateum v. Ross, 150 Mass. 440.

In the absence of evidence that the policy was held in trust for the debtor, where the rights of the parties appear upon the face of the policy the presumption is against such trust. Corson v. Garnier (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 308.

It has been said, however, on the authority of Godsall v. Boldero, 9 East, 72, that an insurance upon the life of a debtor, in behalf of a creditor, is in legal effect but a guaranty of the debt, and if the debt is paid the insurance is at an end. But it is now settled that this case is not the law. It was directly drawn in question and was expressly overruled in Dalby v. India & L. L. Assur. Co., decided in the exchequer chamber, 15 C. B. 365.

A policy in favor of a creditor is to be regarded as collateral security only where the debtor is under obligation to pay the premiums; but where the creditor pays the premiums, the right of the creditor is absolute. Amick v. Butler, 9 West. Rep. 845, 111 Ind. 578.

A creditor who insures the life of his debtor, which he is obliged to keep alive by paying premiums, may hold all he can recover on the policy, unless there is gross disproportion between the debt and the amount of the policy. Rittler v. Smith, 2 L. R. A. 844, 70 Md. 261.

A creditor who takes an assignment of a life policy as security for a loan can hold the proceeds of that policy only to the extent of the sums actually advanced by him. Roller v. Beam (Va.) 6 L. R. A. 136.

Wager policies void.

A policy of insurance taken out on the life of a third party by a beneficiary in the continuance of whose life the beneficiary has no pecuniary interest, is a wagering policy and as such is void. Bloomington Mut. L. Ben. Assn. v. Blue, 8 West. Rep. 642, 120 Ill. 121; Cammack v. Lewis, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 643, 21 L. ed. 244; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251; New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997; Gilbert v. Moore, 104 Pa. 74; Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6.

A policy on the life of another for $3,000, to cover a debt of $70, is a mere wagering policy. Cammack v. Lewis, supra.

A policy taken out by a creditor on the life of his debtor in the sum of $3,000, $2,000 for his own benefit and $1,000 for the benefit of his debtor, while the debtor in fact owed him only $70, is a wagering policy. Ibid. See Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Luchs, 108 U. S. 498, 27 L. ed. 800.

So where he took out policies, on which he became liable to be assessed as a member of the association, and paid thereon, within about nine months thereafter, the sum of $351.75, and the amount collected on which, on the debtor's death, was $2,124.82, being an excess of $474.53 over the amount of the debt, there was no such disproportion as would warrant a condemnation of the transaction as a speculation or wager. Rittler v. Smith, 2 L. R. A. 844, 70 Md. 261.

Where a creditor had insured his debtor's life on two several occasions, and had to abandon the policies on account of insolvency of the companies, then took out a third policy for $3,000, paying $302 therefor, the debtor being sixty-five years old, it was held that there was no disproportion of which the debtor's administrators could take advantage. Grant v. Kline, 7 Cent. Rep. 623, 115 Pa. 618.

An insurance on the life of the debtor for $2,000, where the indebtedness was uncertain, but was afterwards ascertained to be between $500 and $750, was held under the circumstances not a wager. Corson v. Garnier (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 308.

No tabulations can purify or validate a speculative venture.

Grant v. Kline, 7 Cent. Rep. 626, 115 Pa. 625; Downey v. Hoffer, 110 Pa. 115.

Messrs. F. E. Meily and W. M. Derr, for appellees:

A wagering insurance contract is one where the person for whose benefit an insurance on the life of another is taken has no insurable interest in the continuance of that life at the time the contract is made. The disproportion between the debt of a creditor who insures the life of his debtor and the amount of insurance taken by itself determines nothing, unless the amount is so disproportionately great that one's eyes cannot be shut to the gross disparity.

Grant v. Kline, 7 Cent. Rep. 626, 115 Pa. 625; Cooper v. Shaeffer (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 601.

The good faith of the parties distinguishes this case from Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 78, and that line of cases. See Grant v. Kline, 7 Cent. Rep. 626, 115 Pa. 624.

Sir G. Jessel, M. R., in Printing & N. Reg. Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. Cas. 462, 465, says: "You are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void as being against public policy, because if there is one thing which more than another public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore you have this paramount public policy to consider—that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract."

Under all the circumstances of this case, the judgment is well founded on the verdict; the facts justified the jury in its finding and the jury had the legal right to determine the question whether or not this was a wagering contract.

Ferreira v. Gabell, 89 Pa. 89; Kirkpatrick v. Bonsall, 72 Pa. 159; Shaak v. Meily, 136 Pa. 161.

Paxon, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is not free from difficulty. It has been twice argued and has received a most careful consideration. It presents the question, to what extent a creditor may lawfully insure the life of his debtor. We have avoided ruling this point before, because it was one of grave importance, and the cases in which it was raised did not necessarily require it, nor did they present all the facts necessary to enable us to dispose of it satisfactorily. This record raises the whole question squarely. The facts are substantially as follows:

The defendants are doing a firm business at Lebanon, Pa., and hold a judgment against one Andrew Bleistine, in the Court of Common Pleas of Lebanon County, which, with interest and costs amounted to $110.02. The judgment was sufficiently secured on real estate, and the defendants were not pressing their debtor for the money. He was being pressed by other creditors who held subsequent liens on his property. It was necessary to quiet them for Bleistine to pay off the judgment held by the defendants, or get rid of it in some manner. Not having the money he applied to the defendants to satisfy it, and take a policy on his life instead. The evidence is uncontradicted that the defendants were averse to this, and for a time declined, but finally yielded to Bleistine's entreaties, and his wife's tears, to save their home. The evidence shows that Bleistine offered them an insurance of $3,000, or $5,000, or $10,000, or any amount they wanted. The negotiation resulted in the defendants taking a policy of $8,000 on the life of Bleistine in the U. B. Mutual Aid Society. The policy was issued in the name of Bleistine as beneficiary and afterwards assigned by him to the defendants, who paid the entrance fee and all subsequent assessments. The assignment was absolute and not as collateral security, and the judgment referred to was satisfied of record. After Bleistine's death the insurance money was paid by the company to the defendants. Subsequently this suit was brought by the executor of Bleistine to recover from them the amount received over the debt and interest, and premiums paid; the plaintiff alleging that the amount of insurance was so disproportioned to the debt as to make it a gambling transaction within the doctrine of Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74, and the cases following it.

We may safely assume that the debt due by Bleistine to the defendants was bona fide; that so far from the latter having procured the former to insure his life for their benefit for speculative purposes, they entered into it with reluctance at the earnest request of Bleistine and his wife, to relieve them from financial embarrassment and to save their home. This takes out of the case the controlling element which existed in Gilbert v. Moose, and that line of cases. Yet if the defendants, even for an honest purpose, have transgressed the law, and made this a gambling transaction, they must suffer the penalty for such violation.

The first and second assignments present the main question in the case. Upon the trial below the defendants proved, under exception, the life expectancy of Bleistine, and the amount of assessments on this policy had he lived out his full life expectancy. It appears from this evidence that the insured was forty-two years of age, and that his expectation of life, according to the Carlisle Tables, was twenty-six years; that had he lived that length of time the interest on the judgment, with the annual dues and assessments and interest thereon, would have amounted to $4,886.81, being $1,886.81 in excess of the amount of the policy. This evidence was not contradicted. Its admission forms the subject of the first assignment.

In the second assignment, complaint is made that the learned judge erred in his answer to the plaintiff's sixth point. The point is as follows: "The amount allowed and paid as the consideration of the transfer of the insurance, to wit the sum of $99.51, with interest thereon from December 7, 1875, to April 2, 1877, and the costs were grossly inadequate; and the disproportion between that amount and the amount of the insurance—$3,000—is so great as to require the court to say, as matter of law, that the transaction was a wager, and that in this action Reinohl & Menily have no right to retain more of the insurance money received by them than the amount of their satisfied judgment with interest and costs, and the premiums and assessments paid by them, with interest thereon, and therefore the verdict of the jury must be in favor of the plaintiff for the amount received by the defendants, with interest from the date of its receipt, less the amount of the judgment, interest and costs, and assessments and premiums paid with interest." This point was refused.

Whether the question of excess of insurance is to be disposed of by the court as a matter of law, or by the jury as a question of fact, it is essential that we should have a fixed rule.

We have none now. I felt the importance of this in delivering the opinion of the court in Grant v. Kline, 115 Pa. 618, 7 Cent. Rep. 626, where I said: "Speaking for myself, it may be that a policy taken out by a creditor on the life of his debtor ought to be limited to the amount of the debt with interest, and the amount of premiums with interest thereon, during the expectancy of life, as shown by the Carlisle Tables. This view, however, has never been adopted by this court in any adjudicated case, nor do we feel compelled to define the disproportion now in view of the particular facts of the case in hand." In the subsequent case of Cooper v. Shaeffer (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 601, our brother Sterrett, after quoting the above, remarked: "This appears to be a just and practicable rule." No such rule was established, however, in Cooper v. Shaeffer. In that case there was an insurance of $3,000 to cover a debt of $100, and this court said, through Mr. Justice Sterrett: "In view of the undisputed facts, the learned judge of the common pleas held that the disproportion between the insurance of $3,000 and the debt of $100 was so great as to require him to say, as matter of law, that the transaction was a wager, and that the assignors of the policy had no right to retain more of the insurance money recovered by them than the amount of the debt, plus the premiums paid and interest thereon. In this he was clearly right. The disproportion is so great as to make the insurance a palpable wager, and no court should hesitate to declare it so as matter of law."

We have no doubt that in a proper case where the facts are not disputed, it is the duty of the court to pronounce upon the character of the policy. Thus in Grant v. Kline, supra, it was said: "To take out a policy of $5,000 to secure a debt of $5 would be such a palpable wager that no court would hesitate to declare it so as matter of law." It is true this remark was made by way of illustration, and we only refer to it for that purpose now. Cooper v. Shaeffer decided nothing but that particular litigation. It laid down no rule for the future beyond its own particular facts, viz.: That an insurance of $3,000 for a debt of $100, unexplained, was a gambling policy. It may be asked why it does not rule this case where the amount of insurance was the same and a difference of a few dollars only in the amount of the debt? The answer is not difficult. Cooper v. Shaeffer was decided upon the single ground of the disproportion between the insurance and the debt. There were no facts in evidence by which this disproportion could be explained, or shown to be justifiable. This appears by the report of the case as well as from the opinion of Judge Simonton, who tried that, as well as this case below. In refusing a new trial in the case in hand, that learned and able judge said in reference to Cooper v. Shaeffer: "Even the age of the insured was not dwelt upon as an element of the problem, and there was not a word of evidence as to the expectancy of life or the probable amount of annual payments to be made. Here, however, these important matters were urged as a principal ground of defense and required consideration. In our opinion they necessarily carried the case to the jury, and abundantly justified the verdict. The defendants insured a healthy man of forty-two years in the sum of $3,000 to protect a debt of $100. If he had merely lived out his expectancy and no longer, they would have been obliged to pay for assessments and annual dues $2,436.32, to which, if interest be added, the amount of their investment would have been $4,336.31. In return they would have received $3,000, thus suffering a considerable loss. Surely to call such a transaction speculation is to misuse the word. That it happened to be profitable, because the insured died within a few years, is manifestly not to the point." I have quoted this extract at length because I could in no better way emphasize the distinction between Cooper v. Shaeffer and the case in hand.

The law very properly lays a mailed hand upon speculative life insurance. Of all the forms of gambling, it is one of the most objectionable. The records of our own court show that it sometimes leads to murder. The holder of a policy upon a life in which he has no interest either of a social or pecuniary nature has a strong interest in the death of the assured. This interest grows and strengthens with each payment of premium. He has made a bid upon the life of another person. A man who will engage in such a transaction cannot safely be regarded as a saint. He sees with growing impatience that life prolonged from year to year, and his money slipping away in premiums. A man thus situated soon becomes familiar with the thought of the death of the person who stands between him and what, in his morbid fancy, he may regard as his rights. That crime follows in some instances is a fact of which we have judicial knowledge.

All life insurance is in one sense speculative, yet within proper restrictions it has been found to be highly beneficial and not in conflict with public policy. It enables a man in the days of his early struggles to provide for his family in case of his death. It renders it possible for a business man to borrow the capital needed for success. It furnishes the means and the only means by which a creditor may sometimes secure a doubtful claim. Yet in all these cases there is the element of speculation, for if the assured dies shortly after the policy is issued, the beneficiary, whether he be a blood relation or a creditor, gets a sum of money greatly disproportioned to the amount paid. But in these cases the law does not regard the speculative element as one of danger. It is true that a son who takes out a policy on the life of his father, or a creditor upon the life of his debtor, may have an interest in the death of the assured, and resort to crime to procure it, but experience shows that such instances are extremely rare, and the temptation no greater than in thousands of other instances in which one person may be benefited pecuniarily by the death of another. But a policy taken out by one who has no interest either as a creditor or a relative in the life of the assured, is always a danger signal.

It is settled law that a creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor, but up to this time there is no decision as to the limit of this right. Our own cases furnish us no settled rule, and for this reason I do not think it necessary to review them. Each case has been decided upon its own facts. In Cooper v. Shaeffer, as before observed, it was said the insurance was too large; in Grant v. Kline, on the other hand, we held that the amount of insurance was not disproportioned to the debt. We have now reached a point where it is necessary to lay down some fixed rule by which such cases can be disposed of in the future, otherwise the rulings of the courts and the verdicts of juries upon such questions will be arbitrary, and where there is nothing in a case but the amount of the insurance and the amount of the debt it is impossible for either a court or a jury to arrive at a correct result.

Starting out with the conceded proposition that a creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor, and may lawfully take out a policy thereon, it follows logically that he may take out the policy in such a sum as may reasonably secure the debt. It needs no argument to show that if my debtor owes me $1,000 a policy for $1,000 would be inadequate, for if my debtor dies within twenty-four hours after the policy is taken out, I am a loser by the amount of the premium paid, and it would be but a few years before the interest on the debt and the premiums would exceed the debt. Every future payment then would be a loss, with the only alternative of adding to this loss year by year, or abandoning the policy altogether, and sinking the whole amount paid. It seems clear upon reason that the creditor may take out a policy in excess of his debt. But to what excess? The answer to this question obviously depends upon circumstances. An important element in the consideration of this question is the age of the assured. The difference between a policy on the life of a man of twenty-five years of age and one of seventy-five is clear to the dullest understanding. The assured was only forty-two years of age; and his expectancy of life was twenty-six years. The chances were greatly in favor of his living out his expectancy. The Carlisle Tables were prepared with care by competent experts, and are the result of actual experience. I am therefore justified in saying that the chances were in favor of the assured living out his expectancy, in which case there would be the loss of interest on the debt for twenty-six years added to the dues and assessments, with interest thereon, for the same period. The evidence shows that in such event the defendants would have been losers by a considerable sum. In fact I infer from the tables furnished that after about seventeen years the defendants would have carried this policy at a loss. The defendants assumed this risk when they took out the policy. They also had the chance of the assured not living out his expectancy. This is a risk which an insurance company assumes upon every policy which it issues. In a particular instance the assured may live many years beyond his expectancy, which is a large gain to the company. But this gain is equalized by the loss in instances where the assured dies before the expiration of his expectancy, so that in the vast volume of business of such corporations the average result is reasonably uniform. But the holder of a single policy can have no average result. He takes the risk with the chances fairly balanced. Had these defendants taken out one hundred policies on the lives of as many debtors, it is more than probable that some of them would have largely exceeded their expectation, while others would not have reached it. In such case there would not have been material gain or loss.

Had the assured lived out his expectancy of life no question would probably have arisen as to the right of the defendants to retain the whole of the money. It could not then have been successfully assailed as a gambling transaction. I submit that the character of the contract cannot depend upon results, or the accident of death. If not lawful in its inception it could never become so.

In order to ascertain whether an insurance is disproportioned to the debt, regard must be had to the age of the assured, his expectation of life, and the cost of carrying the insurance with interest thereon, as well as upon the amount of the debt. The evidence which forms the subject of the first assignment was not only proper, but essential, to an intelligent understanding of the case. It is just what was lacking in Grant v. Kline, and was one of the reasons why we avoided deciding the broad question in that case. But anyone who reads that opinion between the lines can see that the judicial mind must have been influenced to some extent by the suggestion in reference to the Carlisle Tables.

The rule we now announce may not be the best, but we have not been able to find a better, after a most careful and anxious consideration of the question. That it will not produce exact justice in all cases is possible. There will always be cases of individual hardship in the application of all general rules. No general rule can be made to fit each particular case, otherwise it would cease to be a rule. My attention was especially called to this difficulty by the following extract from the opinion of the learned judge below in refusing a new trial:

"With much respect it is suggested that the principle indicated in Grant v. Kline, 115 Pa. 625, 7 Cent. Rep. 626, and Cooper v. Shaeffer, supra, as the proper rule to determine for what sum a creditor's policy should be taken out, ought to be somewhat expanded before it is positively adopted. As now stated, it would not provide for a case like this, where the policy is taken out in a company which levies annual (monthly?) assessments, and where therefore allowance must be made in the creditor's forecast for possible fluctuations; neither would it now provide for the not infrequent contingency of the insured outliving his expectancy. Under the present form of the indictated rule, the creditor must always lose if the debtor lives beyond his expectancy; and it cannot be accurately applied to assessment insurance, because in this variety of the business the annual payments are not a previously known and certain sum."

We have no difficulty in disposing of the objection that the rule does not provide for the case of the assured living beyond his expectancy and thus entailing a loss upon the creditor. If we go beyond the expectancy where are we to stop? A man may live to the age of a hundred, and such length of days is of frequent occurrence. To sanction a policy covering such a period, and yet to allow the holder to recover the full amount in case of death within a year would be a retrograde step in our decisions. Under such a system the creditor would be absolutely secure, with the possibility of an enormous gain in case of an early death. Whereas at present, as I have endeavored to show, the risk of a debtor's exceeding his expectancy is equalized by the possibility of his death within it, and in a given number of cases the result produces uniformity. The want of uniformity is not the fault of the rule, but of its application to a single case.

There is more difficulty in the other objection. The policy in question, however, was taken out in a mutual company, where assessments are made from time to time, and there appears to have been no difficulty upon the trial below in ascertaining with sufficient accuracy the amount of assessments which the defendants would have been called upon to pay had the assured lived out his expectancy. The precise amount of such assessments cannot of course be estimated with the same accuracy as in the case of a company in which the annual premium is a fixed sum. But the assessments even in a mutual company can be approximated by the experience of other similar companies with sufficient accuracy to base an insurance upon it. And where a policy has been taken out in good faith by a creditor, the law does not exact impossibilities. A slight mistake, one way or the other, owing to the condition of the company's business, by which assessments are increased or diminished, would not necessarily vitiate a policy. The cost of life insurance by whatever system adopted, it is believed, does not vary so greatly as to prevent a reasonable approximation thereof.

It may be that few men would take out a life policy to secure a debt of $100, where there is an expectancy of life for twenty-six years, and pay an annual assessment or premium in excess of the whole amount of the debt. But we do not pass upon the wisdom of contracts; we only consider their legality, and care must be taken in the enforcement of an admittedly sound rule of public policy not to impinge upon the right of the citizen to contract. In this instance the contract was lawful, and the defendants appear to have entered into it not so much for their own benefit as for the accommodation of the assured. We are not to measure its legality by its results but by its surroundings at the time it was made.

We are of opinion that a creditor may lawfully take out a policy on the life of his debtor in an amount to cover the debt with interest, 18 L. R. A.

and the cost of such insurance with interest thereon during the period of the expectancy of life of the assured according to the Carlisle Tables.

We find no error in the ruling of the court below.

Judgment affirmed.

CONESTOGA CIGAR CO.

v.

Charles FINKE et al., Appts.,

1. In an action to enforce the alleged liability of a tobacco sampler to make good the loss resulting to a buyer because the tobacco in the cases was not as represented by the tags attached to the samples, evidence is admissible to show what meaning apparently ambiguous words and figures on the tags conveyed to the trade, and that by usage the sampler undertook to make good losses resulting from untrue statements on the tags.

2. A verdict against a tobacco sampler for the amount of loss resulting to a buyer because the tobacco in the cases was not as represented by the sample tags is supported by evidence that by usage of trade he undertook to make good such loss, and that he had promised to make it good after having been notified of it and had paid other losses resulting from the same cause, although there was no privity of contract between him and the person injured.

NOTE.—Custom and usage, as law.

Usage or custom is a source of law in all governments. United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 691, 8 L. ed. 547.

A custom is an unwritten law established by long usage and the consent of our ancestors. Usage is the legal evidence of the custom. Minis v. Nelson, 48 Fed. Rep. 777.

Usages long established and followed have, to a great extent, the efficacy of law in all countries. They control the construction and qualify and limit the force of positive enactments. Slidell v. Grandjean, 111 U. S. 412, 28 L. ed. 321; Mitchel v. United States, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 711, 9 L. ed. 233.

A custom, to have the force of law, must be universal, and its origin in point of time so far back "that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Ulmer v. Farnsworth, 6 New Eng. Rep. 335, 80 Me. 500.

A long and inveterate usage for half a century, under express sanction of law, should be able to continue without further re-enactment, unless the legislative will is expressed to the contrary. There can be no presumption against it from mere silence, with no substituted rule on the subject. Warren v. Board of Registration, 2 L. R. A. 203, 72 Mich. 398.

Cannot be in conflict with rules of law.

A custom should not be in conflict with the rules and principles of law. Turnbull v. Osborne, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 203; East Birmingham Land Co. v. Dennis, 2 L. R. A. 836, 85 Ala. 565.

A mere custom or usage is without force, in opposition to a positive law. Coleman v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. (Va.) 51; Randall v. Smith, 63 Me. 105; Cranwell v. The Fanny Fosdick, 15 La. Ann. 436; Winder v. Blake, 49 N. C. 332; Thompson v. Ashton, 14 Johns. 316; Greene v. Tyler, 30 Pa. 361; Delaplane v. Cren-

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lancaster County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the loss alleged to have resulted to plaintiff because tobacco purchased by it in reliance upon defendants' sample tags was not as represented by such tags. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Brown & Hensel, for appellants: A party cannot recover unless on a duty assumed to himself.

1 Wharton, Cont. § 506.

To support a contract a consideration must move from the promisee. "The plaintiff must unite in his person both the promise and the consideration of it, and if the action in such a case cannot be sustained on the foundation of the consideration by drawing the promise to it, it cannot be sustained at all."

Edmundson v. Penny, 1 Pa. 385.

To maintain an action against an alleged contracting party his privity of contract must be shown.

bell, 74 Pa. 475. See DeBolle v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. 4 Whart. 68.

In all cases, where a consideration is required, a party suing on a contract must show that the consideration flowed from him.

1 Wharton, Cont. § 506.

Messrs. E. K. Martin and T. B. Holahan, for appellee:

Custom makes law in the absence of more definite enactments, and appellee has proven what the custom has been for twenty years in this line of business, so exactly and unerringly that it cannot be mistaken. By this custom there was a subsisting valid contract running with the warranty into whosoever hands that warranty came, within six months from the time it was made. The universal custom of the trade is the purchase of leaf tobacco stripped, assorted and packed in boxes. By reason of not being able to inspect it in that shape, it is sold upon the guarantee of the inspector's sample.

Custom must be certain, uniform and notorious, so as to be known to the parties to the trade.

A custom making 2,240 pounds a ton of coal is not good when opposed to a statute (Act of April 15, 1834) making 2,000 pounds a legal ton. Godcharles v. Wigeman, 4 Cent. Rep. 887, 113 Pa. 431.

A custom of railroads not to receive for transportation any live-stock unless under certain conditions modifying their common-law liability would be contrary to law and public policy. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Fagan, 2 L. R. A. 75, 72 Tex. 127.

Usage will not control the legal interpretation of a statute. Dwight v. Boston, 12 Allen, 516.

A custom contrary to morality, religion, or the law of the land is void. Holmes v. Johnson, 42 Pa. 159.

Nor can custom deprive a person of a legal right. See Atty-Gen. v. Tarr, 2 L. R. A. 87, 148 Mass. 309; East Birmingham Land Co. v. Dennis, 2 L. R. A. 836, 85 Ala. 565.

Where the statute imposes an absolute liability to make highways safe for travel, a general custom and usage as to placing barriers is of no importance where barriers at a dangerous place were not provided. Molloy v. Walker Twp. 6 L. R. A. 695, 77 Mich. 448.

Must be reasonable.

A custom must be reasonable and not productive of injustice in its practical operation. Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. White, 6 Cent. Rep. 434, 66 Md. 444.

operating it in a way that constitutes a nuisance. Shepard v. Hill, 151 Mass. 540.

A custom which would prevent a shipowner from vacating the agency of his agent is unreasonable and has no legal force. Minis v. Nelson, 48 Fed. Rep. 777.

Must be applicable to matter in controversy.

A usage is ineffectual unless established, known and applicable to the matter in controversy. Janney v. Boyd, 30 Minn. 319; Taylor v. Mueller, Id. 343; Dunham v. Haggerty, 1 Cent. Proof of custom cannot avail, unless shown to be applicable to the case. Ruth v. Katterman, supra.

The general usage of a foreign port in settling general average is binding. If, however, it is not a case for general average, it is not binding. Cheraw & S. R. Co. v. Broadnax, supra.

Must be actually known to the party sought to be bound.

A custom or usage, to be available against a party to a contract, must be so notorious as to affect him with knowledge of it, and raise the presumption that he dealt with reference to it, or he must be shown to have had actual knowledge of it. Blake v. Stump, 10 L. R. A. 103, 73 Md. 160.

A custom among brokers to deliver equal quantities of grain or its market value in fulfillment of contracts of purchase made by them for others, does not bind the seller, without evidence that he had knowledge of it. Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 490, 23 L. ed. 225.

So the fact that a person dealt through brokers is not sufficient of itself to affect him with knowledge of a peculiar custom among them. Blake v. Stump, supra.

Usage and custom as part of contract.

In all contracts as to the subject matter of which known usages prevail, the parties proceed on the tacit assumption of such usages but commonly reduce into writing the particulars of their agreement, omitting to specify those known usages which are included as of course by mutual understanding. MacCulsky v. Klosterman, 10 L. R. A. 785, 20 Oreg. 106.

374; Carter v. Philadelphia Coal Co. 77 Pa. 286. Reed v. Garvin, 12 Serg. & R. 103, holds "that the guaranty ran with the bond, and into whosoever hands it came the beneficial interest in the bond carried with it the guaranty of payment."

Paxon, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents a novel question. It is whether a tag placed upon a bale of tobacco by the inspector or sampler is a warranty of the quality of the tobacco, and whether it inures to the benefit of subsequent purchasers thereof. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: The Conestoga Cigar Company, plaintiff, is a corporation engaged in the manufacture of cigars in Lancaster, Pa. Charles Finke & Co., defendants, are engaged in what is known as "sampling" of leaf tobacco, with their main office in the City of New York, and an agency, or branch office in the City of Lancaster. In the regular course of business the plaintiffs purchased two cases of tobacco from the firm of B. S. Kendig & Co. These cases were purchased by sample, each sample having on it one of defendants' tags containing such an inscription as the following—the number, weight and tare, varying with the different cases:

"Stripped and sample warranted, No. 408, Feb. 5th, 1887; 484 lbs. & 84 off. Not responsible for any change or damage occurring after inspection. Charles Finke & Co., Inspectors, 149 Water Street, New York; Frank Ruscher, John T. Mellon, Jr."

Shortly after the purchase of the tobacco a portion of it—1973 lbs.—was found to be injured. The plaintiffs immediately notified Kendig & Co., from whom they purchased it, and the latter notified the defendants, whose tag was on the samples. Shortly thereafter the agents of Finke & Co. called upon the plaintiff, examined the defective tobacco, and promised to make it all right, and pay for it.

A general custom is a general law, and forms the law of a contract on the subject matter; though at variance with its terms, it enters into and controls its stipulations, as an Act of Parliament or of a State Legislature. United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pot. 691, 8 L. ed. 547.

Not admissible to vary written contract.

Oral testimony of a custom in trade, or of any other matter, is inadmissible to vary the terms of a written contract which is clear, precise and unambiguous, and which embraces the entire agreement of the parties. Miller v. Dunlap, 5 West. Rep. 91, 22 Mo. App. 97.

There must be ambiguity or uncertainty upon the face of a written instrument to justify extraneous evidence of usage, and it must be limited to the clearing up of the obscurity. It is not admissible for the purpose of adding to the contract new stipulations. Oelricks v. Ford, 64 U. S. 23 How. 49, 16 L. ed. 534; Orient Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 456, 17 L. ed. 505; Stagg v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 599, 19 L. ed. 1038; Hearne v. New Eng. Mut. Mar. Ins. Co. 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 488, 22 L. ed. 395; First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 688, 25 L. ed. 786.

Clear and explicit provisions cannot be varied by proof of a custom existing at the place and known to both parties. Larowe v. Lewis, 44 Hun, 226.

A contract is to be respected, not only in view of its terms, but of its legal effect; and that legal effect can no more be changed or contradicted by parol than its express terms may be. Turnbull v. Osborne, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 203.

Omissions may, in some cases, be supplied by the introduction of a custom, but it is not admitted to contradict or vary express stipulations or provisions of a contract. Bliven v. New England Screw Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 420, 16 L. ed. 510.

Where the plaintiff agrees to deliver flour, in consideration of which the defendants agree to pay the price, parol evidence of usage to deposit a given sum of money in a bank as security is inadmissible. Oelricks v. Ford, supra.

A custom which is not pleaded cannot be considered as modifying an unambiguous written promise on which an action is based. Lindley v. Waterloo First Nat. Bank, 2 L. R. A. 709, 76 Iowa, 629.

A clear, certain and distinct contract cannot be modified by proof of custom inconsistent with it or which expressly or by necessary implication contradicts it. Champion Mach. Co. v. Ervay (Tex. App.) June 16, 1890.

The custom of a party to deliver a part of a quantity of goods contracted to be delivered, though invariable, cannot excuse such party from compliance with his contract. Bliven v. New England Screw Co. supra.

A contract to pay a certain price for railroad ties cannot be modified by proof merely of a general custom to inspect such ties as firsts and seconds. Larowe v. Lewis, 33 N. Y. S. R. 769.

Evidence of a custom of most plasterers to alight their work, and do "drawn work" when three-coat work is contracted for, is inadmissible to excuse violation of a contract to build a house, calling for good three-coat plastering. Cook v. Hawkins (Ark.) April 18, 1891.

The rights of the parties under their contract cannot be changed by proof of a local custom different from the rule of law. Weinstein v. Harrison, 66 Tex. 546.

Evidence of custom or usage.

A custom or usage may be proved by parol evidence. Bliven v. New England Screw Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 420, 16 L. ed. 510; Oelricks v. Ford, 64 U. S. 23 How. 49, 16 L. ed. 534.

The usage of trade may be proved by parol, although such usage originated in a law or edict of the government of the country where it prevails. Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co. 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 506, 3 L. ed. 421.

So evidence is admissible to show that an established usage has been subsequently changed. Cookendorfer v. Preston, 45 U. S. 4 How. 317, 11 L. ed. 992.

Usage may be proved by a single witness who testifies explicitly to the antiquity, duration and universality of the usage, and who is uncontradicted. Robinson v. United States, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 363, 20 L. ed. 653.

Where a question was objected to as calling for a custom instead of for facts, but the objection was overruled, and the witness proceeded to state facts and not a custom, the party objecting was not prejudiced. Patterson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 598.

Evidence of usage and custom is not admissible on the question of negligence. See note to Standard Oil Co. v. Swan (Tenn.) 10 L. R. A. 386.

As part of contract; usage of trade to aid interpretation. See notes to Newhall v. Appleton (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 359; Smith v. Clews (N. Y.) 4 L. R. A. 382; MacCusky v. Klosterman (Or.) 10 L. R. A. 735, 20 Oreg. 108.

Effect on legal right. See note to Atty-Gen. v. Tarr (Mass.) 2 L. R. A. 87.

The defendants subsequently failed to make it all right, and this suit was brought to compel them to do so.

The plaintiffs were met at the very threshold of their case with the contention that there was no contract between the parties nor was there any privity. It may be conceded that no contract with the plaintiff appears upon the face of the tag, nor was there any evidence to show that the defendants had sampled the tobacco at the request of the plaintiffs, or that it had paid them for doing so. On the contrary it was evident that it had been sampled for some previous owner, and had passed, thus sampled, to the plaintiffs.

Had there been no ambiguity about the tag, its construction would have been for the court. As, however, it was unintelligible in some respects without explanation, the learned judge below permitted the plaintiffs to call a number of witnesses, inspectors, and persons in the tobacco trade, to testify to the meaning of certain words and figures on the tags as understood and acted upon by those engaged in the business in this country. The uncontradicted evidence upon this point was in substance that the tag or label on the sample means that the sampler guarantees the tobacco in the case to be identical with the tobacco in the sample, and unless the tag bears marks to the contrary, that the tobacco in the case is sound; that it is the custom in sampling tobacco, when any damaged tobacco is found in the case, to mark on the ticket the percentage of damage that the case contains; the absence of marks indicates that the tobacco is sound. It is inspected for the convenience and safety of both buyer and seller; the tobacco sold by these samples is frequently paid for long before it is delivered; that the label is not only a guarantee of the quality of the tobacco, at the time of inspection, but that the guarantee is good for six months, for the benefit of any person into whose possession the tobacco may come within that time; that if the tobacco thus inspected proves defective the sampler shall make it good by paying for so much as is injured or spoiled.

There is no doubt under the evidence that this is the usage of the trade, so general as to be universal. Whether the usage has continued so long as to have grown into a custom such as the law would write into every such contract is a very serious question, which we are not called upon to rule in this case. As it is one of first impression, and at the same time of vast importance to this large industry, we prefer to decide only what is before us, and not anticipate cases which may arise in the future under other circumstances.

We are of opinion that the evidence explanatory of the tag and the usage of trade in connection therewith was properly received and submitted to the jury. Their verdict settles the matter so far as the facts are concerned. They have found the contract substantially in accordance with the plaintiff's construction of it. Was there evidence sufficient to justify this finding?

However much we might hesitate were there nothing in the case but the proof of the usage of the trade, there is evidence that the defendants' own construction was in harmony with that usage. It is in proof that defendants' agents when notified of the defect in the tobacco, called upon the plaintiffs, examined it, admitted the defect, and promised to make it good. There was also evidence that in other cases, when the same thing had occurred, they had "made it good" by paying for the defective tobacco. It is no answer to this to say that there was no proof of their agency, nor that the tags were placed on the samples by the defendants. It was not only shown that Irwin & Schroeder were acting as agents for the defendants, but there was direct proof of their agency by the admission of a member of defendants' firm. There was also the recognition of the sample tags by the agents, accompanied by the promise to pay for the defective tobacco. We have then the construction of the contract by the defendants themselves—a construction in entire harmony with that of the plaintiff, and the usage of trade which was offered in explanation of it.

The case was submitted to the jury with proper instructions, and the verdict was fully warranted by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Nominal damages only can be recovered for breach of a covenant of warranty

NOTE.—Dower; bar of inchoate right.

A wife, in the lifetime of her husband, can bar her right of dower in no other mode than prescribed by statute; a conveyance thereof by deed signed by the husband will not operate against her by way of equitable estoppel. Mason v. Mason, 1 New Eng. Rep. 106, 140 Mass. 68.

It is not barred by seven years' adverse possession. 13 L. R. A.

by reason of an incumbrance consisting of a right of dower so long as it remains inchoate.

2. An inchoate right of dower is not cut off by a sale of the husband's land for taxes, since the tax proceeding is not strictly in rem, although the statutes do not permit any personal judgment for the tax, where they also provide that the wife's interest shall not be af-

(March 31, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Johnson County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of a covenant of warranty in a deed. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Samuel P. Sparks, for appellant:

The existence of an inchoate right of dower in Mrs. Collier at the time appellant entered into the covenants at most constituted only a technical breach of the covenants against incumbrances, and only nominal damages were recoverable.

Sedgwick, Dam. 4th ed. 195, note; 4 Kent, Com. art. 4; Rawle, Cov. Title, 541; Collier v. Gamble, 10 Mo. 487; Walker v. Deaver, 79 Mo. 664; Priest v. Deaver, 22 Mo. App. 276; Dickson v. Desire, 23 Mo. 151; Wyatt v. Dunn, 93 Mo. 459; Runnells v. Webber, 59 Me. 488; 2 Sutherland, Dam. 1st ed. p. 827; Hazelrig v. Hutson, 18 Ind. 481; Lewis v. Lewis, 5 Rich. L. 12; Nyce v. Obertz, 17 Ohio, 71; Bender v. Fromberger, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 440, 1 L. ed. 900; Durrett v. Piper, 53 Mo. 551.

The existence of this inchoate right of dower was not an act "done or suffered by appellant, nor those under whom he claimed," against the existence of which he covenanted.

Rev. Stat. 1879, § 675; Walker v. Deaver, supra; 4 Kent, Com. § 440; Armstrong v. Darby, 26 Mo. 517; Bender v. Fromberger, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 436, 1 L. ed. 898; Rawle, Cov. Title, p. 541; Alexander v. Schreiber, 10 Mo. 480.

Until there had been an actual loss, eviction, or its equivalent consequent on the breach, only nominal damages could be recovered.

Walker v. Deaver, supra; Hunt v. Marsh, 80 Mo. 396; Morgan v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 68 Mo. 129; Matheny v. Mason, 73 Mo. 677.

The sale for taxes barred the inchoate right of dower of Mrs. Collier.

It was within the power of the Legislature to pass laws which would defeat an inchoate right of dower.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 445; Morrison v. Rice, 35 Minn. 486; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 117, pp. 341, 351.

The proceeding to enforce taxes by the State is always analogous to the exercise by it of the right of eminent domain, which it has always been held bars dower.

It is not defeated by a tax sale where the lien for taxes attached after the dower right had become fixed by the concurring facts of marriage and the husband's seisin. Ibid.

When dower once attaches the husband cannot, by any act or admission of his, defeat it, and no judgment recovered against him will prejudice the right and interest of the wife. See Williams v. Courtney, 77 Mo. 588; Grady v. McCorkle, 57 Mo. 172.

No judgment or decree confessed by or recovered against him, and no laches, default, covin or crime of the husband, shall prejudice the right and interest of the wife provided in the foregoing sections of this chapter. Grady v. McCorkle, 57 Mo. 172; Davis v. Green (Mo.) 11 L. R. A. 90. 13 L. R. A.

In partition proceedings her inchoate right of dower is barred.

Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202.

Messrs. A. B. Logan and W. W. Wood, for respondents:

When respondent discharged the incumbrance, the existence of the inchoate right of dower became a substantial breach, and she was entitled to recover the reasonable amount paid.

Durrett v. Piper, 53 Mo. 551; Ward v. Ashbrook, 78 Mo. 515; 2 Scribner, Dower, 2d ed. chap. 1, § 2, 4; Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. 627; Shearer v. Ranger, 22 Pick. 447; Bigelow v. Hubbard, 97 Mass. 195; Harrington v. Murphy, 109 Mass. 299; Porter v. Noyes, 2 Me. 27; Whisler v. Hicks, 5 Blackf. 100; Smith v. Ackerman, Id. 542; Fitts v. Hoitt, 17 N. H. 530; Kellogg v. Makin, 62 Mo. loc. cit. 433; Chambers v. Smith, 23 Mo. 174.

Under a strict covenant of seisin it is necessary to prove an eviction, but under the covenant of indefeasible seisin or the covenant against incumbrances implied by the Statute as amended in 1879, it is not necessary to prove an eviction. It is only necessary to prove that the estate conveyed has been defeated, or the right to defeat it has been extinguished, or the incumbrance removed.

Collier v. Gamble, 10 Mo. 487, 472; Shelton v. Pease, 10 Mo. 478, 482; Mosely v. Hunter, 15 Mo. 322, 330; Dickson v. Desire, 23 Mo. 151; Walker v. Deaver, 79 Mo. 664.

The tax sale did not convey the dower. There are two theories upon that subject: the one is, that it is a proceeding against the land itself, and has nothing to do with the previous chain of title; that it is a breaking up of all previous titles (Jones v. Devore, 8 Ohio St. 431); the other, that it is a derivative title; the purchaser taking only such title as the party to the proceedings had. This court, in construing the statutes, has adopted the latter theory.

Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472; Grandy v. Casey, 12 West. Rep. 398, 93 Mo. 595.

Under a statute in almost the precise words of § 2197, Rev. Stat. 1879, it has been held by two eminent text-writers, that the laches of the husband in permitting his land to sell for taxes would not debar the wife of her dower.

Black, Tax Titles, 2d ed. 549; Scribner, Dower, 2d ed. 809, 820.

It has been held in Ohio that a valid sale of property for nonpayment of taxes bars dower. Jones v. Devore, 8 Ohio St. 430.

So the exercise of the right of eminent domain bars dower. Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. 110.

Gantt, P. J., filed the following opinion:

This is an action on a covenant of warranty, made by appellant to the respondent Mrs. Sarah C. Blevins. The land conveyed is the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, section 6, township 46, range 25, Johnson County, Mo. The evidence showed title in appellant, Smith, at the date of conveyance to respondent, except an outstanding inchoate right of dower in Mrs. Mary E. Collier, the wife of Daniel Collier. Appellant deduced his title from Daniel Collier by virtue of a tax sale and deed under the Act of 1877. It was admitted that Daniel Collier was still alive at the time of the commencement of the suit. After respondent obtained her deed from appellant, she attempted to mortgage the land, and failed because of this outstanding inchoate dower right in Mrs. Collier. She thereupon purchased this right for \$150, and brought this suit against appellant for that amount. Appellant assigns two grounds for reversal,—one, that the court erred in permitting respondent to recover more than nominal damages for the breach of the covenant by reason of the inchoate dower of Mrs. Collier, remaining outstanding; and, secondly, that the court erred in not holding that the tax sale and deed conveyed the land absolutely, and by it Mrs. Collier's inchoate right of dower was entirely barred, and, of course, could constitute no incumbrance.

We all agree that the first contention of appellant must be sustained. While an inchoate right of dower is an incumbrance, as it is a contingency founded upon a contingency, it is not susceptible of computation by any definite rule; hence the practice has been adopted in this State to allow only nominal damages until the dower becomes consummate. Walker v. Deaver, 79 Mo. 664.

2. In regard to the second assignment. We think the court committed no error in holding that the tax proceedings did not divest Mrs. Collier's dower right. We shall not attempt to discuss the power of the Legislature to collect taxes. We think it sufficient for the case in hand to ascertain, if we can, what the Legislature has determined shall be the policy of the State. In the first place, we have by statute adopted the common law in regard to dower. Lord Coke says: "There be three things highly favored in law,—life, liberty and dower." Co. Litt. Chief Justice McKean, in Kennedy v. Nedrow, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 415, 1 L. ed. 202, asserts that "dower is a legal, equitable, and moral right, favored in a high degree by the law, and, next to life and liberty, held sacred." Strong as these terms are, they are strengthened by our Statute. Section 4525: "No act, deed, or conveyance, executed or performed by the husband without the assent of the wife, evidenced by her acknowledgment thereof in the manner required by law to pass the estate of married women, and no judgment or decree confessed by or recovered against him, and no laches, default, covin, or crime of the husband, shall prejudice the right and interest of the wife, provided in the foregoing sections of this chapter;" that is to say, the sections securing the widow her common-law and statutory dower. Now, at common law, and by our Statute reaffirming it, "the right of dower attaches whenever there is a seisin by the husband, during the marriage, of an estate of inheritance; and, unless it is relinquished by the wife in the manner prescribed by law, it becomes absolute at the husband's death." "It is a right in law fixed from the moment the facts of marriage and seisin concur, and becomes a title paramount to that of any person claiming under the husband by subsequent act." Grady v. McCorkle, 57 Mo. 172. This, then, is the character of the estate that is to be divested by this new construction of the Statute. It is conceded that our Statute requires "the owner" to be made a party before his or her interest in the lands can be affected by a tax proceeding under our Act of 1877, and this section has been uniformly construed so that cestuis que trustent, mortgagees, remaindermen, and incumbrancers, who are not made parties, are not affected by these suits. Stafford v. Fizer, 82 Mo. 393; Corrigan v. Bell, 78 Mo. 58; Graves v. Ewart, 99 Mo. 13. No lawyer will question that inchoate dower is an incumbrance. But it is sought to sustain this new doctrine on the ground that our tax proceeding, beginning with the assessment, is a proceeding strictly in rem, and we may remark here that only by sustaining this position can this new rule be maintained. Beginning with Abbott v. Lindenbower, 42 Mo. 162, under a statute requiring the lands in all cases to be assessed to the person appearing to be the owner at the time of assessment, this court said: "It is unnecessary for us to say further here what might be the effect of this last clause in any cases; but we may go so far as to declare now that an assessment in the name of a person who neither was, nor ever had been, the owner of the property, would be an utterly void assessment." Our present Statute requires the land to be listed and assessed in the name of the owner, if known. Under this Statute, in Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472, Judge Black, speaking for the whole court, says: "While the judgment is against the property, and not personal, still the tax is assessed against the owner, if known. The law looks to him for payment of the tax. Such a proceeding cannot be said to be strictly in rem. Blackw. Tax Titles, 630.

It will serve no good purpose to cite authorities to the same effect. This has been the accepted construction of our tax laws for many years. Were it a proceeding strictly in rem, there would be no such thing as collecting the tax on real estate out of personal property, which it is conceded may be done. Indeed, the whole system is based on the idea that it is the duty of the husband to pay the taxes on his land; and a failure to pay the taxes is a default on his part. The wife is under no obligation to pay the tax. She does not own the fee; she does not reap the usufruct. Certainly no system based upon justice would exact of her tribute on property she might never enjoy, and rob her of her dower for failure to pay a tax she did not owe. If, then, taxes become delinquent, whose fault is it? Not the wife's, certainly.

But it is said that, because there can be no personal judgment for taxes, therefore section 2197, Rev. Stat. 1879, § 4525, Rev. Stat. 1889, cannot be invoked. It would be difficult to conceive of a statute that would protect a wife's dower, if this is not sufficient. But we think this construction of this section too narrow. The injury is not confined to "judgment." The Statute says, in addition to "judgments or decrees confessed or suffered," "no laches, default, covin or crime of the husband shall prejudice the rights of the wife." Is it not laches in a citizen to neglect or refuse to pay his taxes? Is not the word "delinquent," used throughout the Statute, a synonym for "laches" and "default?" And could there be a sale of the land, and a divestiture of the wife's dower, but for this delinquency on his part? The proposition is too clear for argument.

But if it is held that this section does not protect the wife's dower against the laches and default of the husband, we will have an anomalous state of affairs. A husband cannot, by deed or mortgage, the most solemn and praiseworthy, for the most valuable consideration, alien or destroy her dower right. No judgment against him, willing or unwilling, can affect her dower,—no fraud, covin or crime; and yet he can suffer this new "fine and recovery," and successfully bar her dower, by simply refusing to pay his taxes, and let the land sell; and thus a result is reached, by this simple device, that could not be compassed by the most skillful conveyancer. We cannot believe the Legislature intended such result. On the contrary, the whole scope of the Tax Act clearly shows that the Tax Law of 1877 (Rev. Stat. 1879, chap. 145, art. 6), was designed to furnish a method for collecting taxes, in which notice was given to the delinquent of the amount of his taxes, and a day in court, if erroneous, to show the error. When the judgment is entered, an execution issues just as on other judgments, and it is intended to convey the right, title and interest of the defendant who owned the land, and whose duty it was to pay the taxes. Says Judge Black: "We have repeatedly held that the purchaser at these sales acquires, and acquires only, the title and interest of the parties who are made defendants." Graves v. Ewart, 99 Mo. 13; Powell v. Greenstreet, 95 Mo. 14, 14 West. Rep. 339.

An ordinary execution sale conveys to the purchaser all the right, title and interest of the defendant in execution, but it has no effect upon the inchoate dower of the wife. It was clearly the intention of the Legislature to give the same effect to a tax deed, under regular and valid proceedings, that a deed under a general judgment would have,—"no more, no less." "A tax title is a derivative title." Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472. Says Judge Black again: "It must be taken as settled law that purchasers at these sheriff's sales, made on executions in tax suits, acquire only the right, title and interest of the defendant in the tax suits." Powell v. Greenstreet, 95 Mo. 13, 14 West. Rep. 339; Evens v. Robberson, 92 Mo. 192, 10 West. Rep. 393.

No inconvenience has been felt in Missouri, because, in ordinary execution sales, the wife's inchoate dower was not conveyed. Creditors and purchasers know her interest is fixed, and all business transactions are based upon that understanding. The State has adopted a most stringent policy in passing the fee-simple estate to the tax purchasers for the insignificant sum of the tax; a bagatelle, usually, compared to the value of the lands sold. While the State has a right to its revenue, no reason appears why it should take the dower of the unoffending wife, and vest it in the tax speculator, thus giving him a vantage over all creditors and purchasers at all other execution sales. We do not so read the statute. We regard the dower right as of inestimable value to the homes of this State. The trend of public opinion is rather to enlarge, as our Homestead Laws clearly indicate, than to cut off this sustenance of the widow. Instead of being a "shadow," it has proved a "pearl of great price" in thousands of ruined homes. Between the tax speculator and the defenseless widow, section 4525 of our Statutes of 1893 stands as a monument to the wisdom and humanity of our Commonwealth.

Macfarlane, J., concurs in this opinion. Thomas, J., files his separate opinion, holding a different view.

Thomas, J., dissenting:

Daniel Collier owned the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, section 6, township 46, range 25 W., in Johnson County, Mo., and at the time he so owned this land a suit was instituted against him for taxes due thereon, which culminated in a judgment and sale of the land. The sale occurred on the 18th day of February, 1880, and A. H. Tuttle was the purchaser. The sheriff executed the proper deed for the land to Tuttle under this sale. By a succession of conveyances the defendant acquired all the title to this property that Tuttle acquired by virtue of the tax deed. On the 12th day of September, 1882, defendant sold the land to Sarah C. Blevins for a consideration of \$1,000, and gave her a warranty deed therefor, by which he covenanted with said Sarah C. Blevins to warrant and defend the title to this land "against the claim of every person whomsoever." It was admitted that Mary E. Collier was the wife of Daniel Collier at the time of the assessment of the taxes and the institution of the suit which resulted in the sale of the land for taxes. Sarah C. Blevins is the wife of her co-plaintiff, W. R. Blevins. After she acquired the title to this property she attempted to mortgage and sell it, but was unable to do so on account of the supposed existence of an inchoate right of dower in Mrs. Collier in it. She, in conjunction with her husband, then bought Mrs. Collier's interest, and paid therefor \$150, taking a deed from her and her husband for it. They then sold the land to William L. Gaston for \$900; and they bring this suit against defendant upon his covenant of warranty, and in the circuit court they obtained judgment for the amount thus paid Mrs. Collier for her inchoate right of dower, and defendant appeals.

Two controlling questions arise in this case.

(1) Is Mrs. Collier's inchoate right of dower in the land described cut off by the tax sale and deed? (2) Can there be any breach of a general covenant of warranty by the existence of an inchoate right of dower in the land?

The most important question is this: Did the tax deed made by the sheriff of Johnson County to Tuttle, in 1880, divest Mrs. Collier of her inchoate right of dower in the premises, and will it operate to bar her dower in case she survive her husband, it being admitted that he is still alive? This question has never been passed upon in this State, and we have therefore given it a most careful consideration. We are unable to find any reliable guides in the adjudications of other States on this subject, for local statutes have almost wholly controlled the determination of the question. We are hence driven to our own statutes and adjudications on the subject of taxation and sale of land for taxes, in order to arrive at a correct conclusion. We can use only general conclusions reached by text-writers, and the decisions of the courts as illustrating the principles we announce. We will briefly refer to some of these. In the first place we will inquire into the general nature and extent of the power of taxation. "The power to levy taxes," says Judge Cooley, "is one so unlimited in force and so searching in extent that the courts scarcely venture to declare it is subject to any restrictions whatever, except such as rest in the discretion of the authority which exercises it. . . . No attribute of the government affects more constantly and intimately all the relations of life than through the exactions made under it. 'Taxes' are defined to be burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes. The power to tax rests upon necessity, and is inherent in every sovereignty." Cooley, Const. Lim. 3d ed. 479.

The power to tax is analogous to the right of eminent domain. The same author, in his work on Taxation, p. 237, uses this language: "When the State has need of the property of citizens for its sovereign purposes, it may lawfully appropriate it against the will of the owner, either under the power to tax or the right of eminent domain." Mr. Blackwell, on the same subject, says: "There is no difference in principle between the power of taking land for public use and the power to tax and enforce its collection by a sale of the land. In both cases the land is taken for the use of the public: they only differ in degree." 1 Blackw. Tax Titles, 5th ed. § 99. A tax, in legal contemplation, is not a debt due by the owner of property. It is a charge levied upon the person or property of the citizen for a public purpose, by the State. Carondelet v. Picot, 38 Mo. 125; Cooley, Taxn. 15; Re Life Assn. of America, 12 Mo. App. 40. And imprisonment for the nonpayment of taxes is not imprisonment for debt. Cooley, Taxn. 17.

We will, in the second place, inquire into the general rule in regard to the sale of land for taxes, and the title acquired by the purchaser at such sale. There are, in the several States of this Union, two methods of listing lands for taxation; one is to list the lands "as the summation of all interests," and the other is to list the interest of the owners of the land as set out in the assessment roll; and much depends on the method of the assessment as to the interest that passes to the purchaser at a tax sale. Indeed, when the principles underlying the exercise of the taxing power are examined, and the sale of lands for unpaid taxes, it will be found that the title conveyed at a tax sale depends almost wholly on the theory upon which the land is listed and valued for taxation. On this subject, Mr. Blackwell, in his work on Tax Titles, 5th ed. § 954, says: "When the sale and deed are valid, and have their complete effect, . . . the interest conveyed depends upon the circumstances and the statutes. If a particular interest in the land is separately assessed as such, a sale of that does not pass the whole land, nor will a sale of the land pass such interest. If the land alone is assessed, as the summation of all interests, liens, incumbrances, etc., the general rule is that the deed carries a fee-simple absolute, a new and independent title, the land itself being conveyed; and all prior liens, incumbrances and interests in, to or upon the land, are extinguished. . . . In those States where the tax is a charge upon the land alone, where no resort, in any event, is contemplated against the owner or his personal estate, and where the proceeding is strictly in rem, the tax deed will undoubtedly have the effect to destroy all prior interests in the estate, whether vested or contingent, executed or executory, and those in possession, reversion and remainder. . . . On the other hand, where the law requires the land to be listed in the name of the owner of the fee, or of any other interest in the estate, provides for a personal demand of the tax, and, in case of default, authorizes the seizure of the body or goods of the delinquent in satisfaction of the tax, and in terms, or upon a fair construction of the law, permits a sale of the land only when all other remedies have been exhausted, then the sale and conveyance by the officer pass only the interest of him in whose name it was listed, upon whom the demand was made, who had notice of the proceedings, and who alone can be regarded as legally delinquent. In such case the title is a derivative one, and the tax purchaser can recover in ejectment only such interest as he may prove to have been vested in the defaulter at the time of the assessment."

As we shall see later on, the method of listing lands for taxation and the sale of them for unpaid taxes in Missouri does not come under either of the categories mentioned by Mr. Blackwell, but partakes of the nature of both somewhat. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Taxation (2d ed. p. 464), on this same subject, says: "The usual method of enforcing the payment of taxes upon property is by putting the property up at public sale. No one questions the right to do this, and no one doubts that the sale, if fair and made in compliance with the law, and after all preliminary steps have been taken, vests a perfect title in the purchaser to the full extent that the Statute has declared."

With these general rules as lights to guide us, let us examine the statutes and decisions in Missouri in reference to this question. The tax sale involved in this case was made under the Revenue Law first enacted in 1877, and which has substantially continued in force to this time. The title to the property was vested in fee in Daniel Collier, and he alone was made a party to the tax suit. Mrs. Collier not being made a party, the question is whether her contingent right of dower is barred by the tax proceeding, sale and deed. If it is, there can be no recovery in this case for breach of warranty. The Statute in force at the time the tax suit was instituted required the suit to be brought against the "owner" of the property. § 6837, Rev. Stat. 1879. Was Mrs. Collier an "owner of the property" within the meaning of that Statute? Her right of dower at the time of these proceedings was, and is yet, inchoate only. McClean, J., in Johnston v. Vandyke, 6 McLean, 422, says: "It is not easy to define the right of dower before the death of the husband. It is not only an inchoate right, but contingent. It depends upon the death of the husband. If he survive his wife, she has no right transmissible to her heirs, nor during the life of her husband can she give it any form of property to her advantage. . . . So long as the husband shall live, it is only a right in legal contemplation, depending upon the good conduct of the wife and the death of the husband. Until the death of the husband, the right, if it may be called a right, is shadowy and fictitious, and, like all rights that are contingent, may never be vested."

In Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. 110, the court says, in speaking of the inchoate right to a claim for dower, that it is a right "contingent upon the death of the husband. Such a possibility may be released, but it is not, it is believed, the subject of grant or assignment. It is not of itself property, the value of which may be estimated, but an inchoate right, which, on the happening of certain events, may be consummated so as to entitle the widow to demand and receive a freehold estate in the land." Mr. Scribner, in his work on Dower, says: "Although, therefore, an inchoate right of dower cannot be properly denominated an estate in lands, nor indeed a vested interest therein, and notwithstanding the difficulty of defining with accuracy the precise legal qualities of the interest, it may nevertheless be fairly deduced from the authorities that it is a substantial right, possessing, in contemplation of law, the attributes of property, and to be estimated and valued as such." 2 Scribner, Dower, 8.

If we understand the rulings of this court, however, on the subject, it is not conceded that this contingent right of the wife is capable of being estimated and valued. In Hinds v. Stevens, 45 Mo. 209, Judge Bliss, in discussing the effect of a partition proceeding on this right, says: "If the land be divided in specie, her inchoate right attaches at once to the land thus set apart to the husband in severalty; and, if it be sold, I know not how it would be possible to so estimate the value of that shadowy right, or to pay her or invest for her any portion of the proceeds of the sale." And in Durrett v. Piper, 58 Mo. 551, the court, through Wagner, J., says: "A dower interest upon the part of the wife, while the husband is living, is an inchoate and contingent right. Its value depends wholly upon the death of the husband. . . . It is a mere possibility, which may be released, but cannot be the subject of grant or assignment. The covenant being for an indemnity against a claim of dower, it is obvious that no breach could happen till the contingency arose which would legally vest in the wife a valid or substantial claim." From all the authorities, we conclude that the wife is not the owner of any estate or vested right in the property of which her husband is seised. But she is the owner of a contingent interest to dower, however; and the question is whether the owner of such a contingency in real estate is an owner of property in such a sense as to require that she be made a party to a tax suit in order to bar that right. In our Revenue Laws the word "owner" is used several times. Section 6706, Rev. Stat. 1879, provides that the assessor shall list land in numerical order, "with the owner's name, if known, and, if not, then the name of the original patentee," etc.; and, if the land cannot be listed numerically, then he shall describe it as briefly as he can, giving the "owner's name, if known," etc. By section 6834 the clerk of the county court is required to make a "back tax book," and insert therein "a correct list, in numerical order, of all tracts of land and town lots on which back taxes shall be due, . . . setting forth opposite each tract of land or town lot the name of the owner, if known, and, if the owner thereof be not known, then to whom the same was last assessed." It is provided by section 6837, supra, that "all actions commenced under the provisions of this chapter shall be prosecuted in the name of the State of Missouri, at the relation and to use of the collector, and against the owner of the property; and all lands owned by the same person or persons may be included in one petition." Section 6853 provides that "each tract of land or lot shall be chargeable with its own taxes, no matter who is the owner, nor in whose name it is or was assessed or advertised."

We have thus set out in detail the provisions of the Revenue Laws in which the word "owner" occurs, to enable us to determine what was meant by it; for it is a well-established canon of statutory construction that, where the same word is used more than once and in different connections, it must be held to have the same meaning in all, unless it be manifest it is used in different senses. Now, what did the General Assembly mean when it required the assessor to place the name of the "owner" opposite each tract of land or lot on the assessment roll? It will scarcely be claimed that the wife of the owner is included in that term as used in this connection. And the same may be said of the provision in regard to the making of "the back-tax book." The word "owner," as used in that connection, would not include the wife of a man who held the legal title. If the word "owner" does not include the wife having simply an inchoate right of dower, when applied to the assessment roll and the "back-tax book," neither will it include her when applied to a section of the same statute requiring suit for taxes to be brought against the "owner." She cannot be regarded as an owner of property of which her husband is seised, within the meaning of any of the provisions of the Revenue Laws quoted, and hence for that reason she is not a necessary or proper party to an action to collect taxes on the land of her husband. But she was not a necessary party for another reason. This court has frequently held that the word "owner," as used in these laws, does not necessarily mean the actual owner. The collector is not bound to go beyond the record to ascertain the owner of property against whom to bring suit, and a purchaser, at a sale for taxes against the person appearing from the record to be the owner, will take the title in fee, as against the true owner whose deed or title is not of record, if such purchaser has no knowledge of the unrecorded title. Vance v. Corrigan, 78 Mo. 94; State v. Sack, 79 Mo. 661; Evans v. Roberson, 92 Mo. 192, 10 West. Rep. 398; Allen v. Ray, 96 Mo. 542.

The records of the county in which the land is situated do not always nor usually give the name of the wife, and the revenue officers cannot get the names of the wives in making assessments or in instituting proceedings for the enforcement of the state's lien for taxes. Hence if the Statute in terms required the collector to make the wives of the owners of land parties to the proceedings to collect the taxes, it would be impracticable, in a very large proportion of cases, for him to comply with the requisition.

Having determined that the wife is not an owner of the property of her husband; in such a sense as to require her to be made a party to an action to enforce the lien for taxes against his land, it seems this ought to dispose of the case; for when the suit is brought against the owner, and the proceeding is regular, the purchaser gets a title "in fee" to the land sold. And as to the meaning of an estate in "fee," Mr. Tiedeman, in his work on Real Property, § 36, says: "The word 'fee,' without any qualifying adjective, implies an unlimited estate of inheritance. Such is also the case with the term 'fee simple' and 'fee simple absolute.' The three terms 'fee,' 'fee simple,' and 'fee simple absolute' may be used interchangeably; the adjectives in the last two are surplusage." See also Allen v. McCabe, 93 Mo. 138, 12 West. Rep. 113. The lien of the State for taxes is a "first lien on the land." This lien attaches to the res, and is paramount to every interest and estate in the land, as well as to all other incumbrances, whether prior or subsequent. Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472. And a sale to foreclose this lien, in an action where all owners of the land, within the meaning of the statute, have been regularly made parties, "digs up," as it were, the "fee," and vests it in the purchaser. Jones v. Devore, 8 Ohio St. 430; Osterberg v. Union Trust Co. of N. Y. 93 U. S. 424, 23 L. ed. 964; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 445, and cases cited. We have not lost sight of the doctrine laid down by this court in the case of Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472, that the title acquired by a purchaser at a tax sale under our Statute is a derivative one. This we do not deny, but we hold that when all of the owners of the land taxed, within the meaning of our Revenue Laws, are made parties to the suit, a perfect title passes to the purchasers under these laws, because it is provided that a title "in fee" shall pass. Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 464. In the same case in which Judge Black declares that a tax title under our statutes is a derivative one, he is careful to say, also, that the judgment in these cases is in rem.

But it is contended that a judgment against the husband for the taxes cannot affect the wife's inchoate right of dower, and § 2197, Rev. Stat. 1879, is quoted in support of this contention. That section is as follows: "No act, deed, or conveyance, executed or performed by the husband, without the assent of the wife, evidenced by her acknowledgment thereof, . . . and no judgment or decree confessed by or recovered against him, and no laches, default, covin, or crime of the husband, shall prejudice the right and interest of the wife provided in the foregoing sections of this chapter." This is chapter 29, entitled "Of Dower." Plaintiffs denominate the failure of Collier to pay the taxes on the land, and permitting judgment to go against it for them, "laches" on his part, within the meaning of the word as used in the section quoted. Mr. Blackwell, in his work on Tax Titles (5th ed. § 961), holds that a sale for taxes does not cut off the inchoate right of dower under a similar statute in Illinois, and he quotes several cases as authority for that position; but, on examination, it will be found that not a single case he quotes involved the sale of land for taxes. In the most of them it was held that an execution sale, under a judgment against the husband for debt, did not bar dower either consummate or inchoate. There is no doubt about the soundness of that position. That is the unquestioned law in Missouri. This writer announces the same doctrine again in section 954, but his reference is to section 961 of his own work above, as authority for it. It is not easy to determine Mr. Blackwell's meaning when it is a recognized principle, even by himself, that the State can sell the property of the citizen for the payment of taxes, either by a direct proceeding against the owner, or against the rem, or against both, and convey a title in fee to the purchaser. Blackw. Tax Titles, 5th ed. §§ 75 et seq. 954; Cooley, Const. Lim. 3d ed. 402; Cooley, Taxn. 672.

We presume he does not intend to announce the doctrine that the State cannot sell the inchoate right of the wife to dower in her husband's real estate by any process whatever. He intended, no doubt, to simply state the rule to be that, in order to bar this right, the wife must in some way be made a party to the proceeding. We can hardly conceive that the "shadowy" right of dower of the wife, while her husband is living, can be regarded as any more sacred than the vested estate of the husband. In section 954, supra, he states the doctrine to be that where the State assesses and sells the land, irrespective of any particular owner's interest in it, "the tax deed will undoubtedly have the effect to destroy all prior interests in the estate, whether vested or contingent." And Mr. Cooley says, in the extract above quoted, that "no one doubts that the sale, if in compliance with law, vests a perfect title to the purchaser, to the full extent that the Statute shall declare." That the Legislature has the power to divest, by a proceeding of this character, the wife's inchoate right of dower is well settled upon principle and authority. Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 444; Blackw. Tax Titles, §§ 138, 954; Cooley, Const. Lim. 3d ed. 360; 2 Scribner, Dower, p. 8 et seq.; Woerner, Administration, § 112; Morrison v. Rice, 35 Minn. 436; Jones v. Devore, 8 Ohio St. 430.

Let us examine section 2197, supra, and see if a judgment for taxes, where the husband alone is made a party to the action, is within its scope and meaning. That section provides that "no judgment or decree confessed by or recovered against him, and no laches, default, covin or crime of the husband, shall prejudice the right of the wife" to dower. The decree or judgment here referred to does not apply to a judgment for taxes. There can be no personal judgment for taxes. The judgment must be against the land. State v. Sargeant, 76 Mo. 557; section 6838, Rev. Stat. 1879. Hence the judgment in this case was not "confessed by nor recovered against" Collier. The judgment was rendered against the land, and a special execution ordered for the sale of that. The state obtained judgment, and sold the land against the will of Collier. The judgment did not grow out of any contract of Collier. The section quoted was intended to prevent the husband doing anything, either actively or passively, to bar dower, without the consent of his wife. A tax proceeding is a proceeding in invitum. The Revenue Laws of Missouri require that the land itself, and not the interest of any particular owner, be valued for taxation, and that taxes be levied on the land. Allen v. McCabe, 98 Mo. 138, 12 West. Rep. 118. In the first place, the assessor is required to list the land, and set opposite each tract or town lot the name of the owner, if known. In the second place, "the back-tax book" must contain a list of the tracts of land and town lots, with the names of the owners, if known, set opposite to them. In the third place, the judgment must state the amount of taxes due on each tract of land or lot, and "shall decree that the lien of the state be enforced, and that the real estate, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy such judgment, interest, and costs, be sold, and a special fiery facias shall be issued thereon, which shall be executed as in other cases of special judgment and execution; and said judgment shall be a first lien upon said land." Section 6838, supra. Here it is required that the judgment shall not only be against the land, but the taxes must be decreed against the tract or lot on which they have been levied. "The State has no lien upon one lot for taxes charged against another, although both lots are owned by the same person." State v. Sargeant, 76 Mo. 557. In the fourth place, the Statute provides that the land is chargeable with the taxes levied thereon, "no matter who is the owner nor in whose name it is or was assessed." Section 6853. And in the fifth place, the sheriff shall, after the sale of land for taxes, make a deed, "which shall convey a title in fee to the purchaser of the real estate therein named."

Construing all these provisions together, it is manifest that the proceeding under our laws for the sale of lands for taxes is essentially a proceeding in rem. 2 Blackw. Tax Titles, § 954; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 527. It is true the tax when levied is made a personal charge against the owner of the property assessed, and may be collected by the seizure and sale of his personal property, and the owner must be made a party to the action for the recovery of taxes due on land; yet when it is sought to sell the land itself the proceeding is confined strictly to the establishment of a lien against it, and no personal judgment is permitted against the owner, not even for costs, though known, and a party to the suit. Milner v. Shipley, 94 Mo. 18 L. R. A.

109, 18 West. Rep. 199; State v. Sargeant, supra. It seems anomalous, too, that the collector can seize and sell the personal property of the person he supposes is the owner, but that no personal judgment can be rendered against the owner when he is brought before the court, and it has been judicially determined who the owner is; but this is nevertheless true, as is apparent from the plain letter of the statute and the adjudications of this court. In Watt v. Donnell, 80 Mo. 195, it was held that the tax books were not evidence to show, even prima facie, who the owner of the land is. Under this ruling, it would appear difficult for the collector to make any demand, and especially any seizure, of personal property for a land tax. It is clear that the judgment or decree referred to in section 2197, supra, means a judgment or decree against the husband founded upon some act, contract, tort, or fraud of his, and does not embrace a judgment obtained by the State in rem, in the exercise of its paramount power of taxation or eminent domain. It seems to have been uniformly held by the courts of this country, when this question came before them, that, where lands are appropriated by the exercise of eminent domain, the dower of the wife, though not a party to the proceeding, is barred. Moore v. New York, supra. In this case the land had been condemned for public use, and the full value paid to the husband, the wife not being made a party to the proceeding. The court said: "The question which is here presented is whether a wife has such an interest in the premises owned by the husband, while her right of dower is inchoate, as can be divested by this Act of the Legislature and the proceedings under it. . . . The right being merely an incident to the marriage relation, it seems to us that, while this right is thus inchoate, and before it has become vested by the death of the husband, any regulation of it may be made by the Legislature, though its operation is, in effect, to divest the right; the marriage relation itself being within the power of the Legislature to modify or even abolish. The power of the State to take private property for public use results from its right of eminent domain, and that power is not restricted, except by constitutional provision that just compensation shall be made to the owner. In this case the husband was deemed to be the owner of the entire estate in the land, and the inchoate right of the wife was not considered by the commissioners, and we think justly so, as the subject of estimate as to its value separate from his. Indeed, the value of her interest, such as it was, would seem to be scarcely capable of being estimated as a separate interest. We see no reason to doubt that the commissioners were right in considering the entire estate in these lands as vested in the husband, and, he having been paid the full value for them, the corporation, by force of the act, became seised of the lands in fee simple absolute, discharged of any claim of dower of the wife therein." The case went to the Court of Appeals of New York, and was there affirmed (8 N. Y. 110). Gardiner, J., who delivered the opinion of the latter court, said: "The estate of the widow, after assignment of dower, is a continuation of the estate of her deceased husband. It follows that, while living, he, as owner, is entitled to and represents the entire fee. This the statute vests on confirmation of the report of the commissioners, and concludes all those entitled to the land, and all other persons whomsoever. Mrs. Moore, at the time of the proceedings to appropriate the real estate, was not, as we have seen, entitled to it, but her husband; and she was concluded by the general language of the Act. . . . Dower is not the result of contract, but a positive institution of the State, founded on reasons of public policy. In the case under consideration the land was taken, against the consent of the husband, by an act of sovereignty for the public benefit. The only person owning and representing the fee was compensated by being paid its full value. The wife had no interest in the land, and the possibility which she did possess was incapable of being estimated with any degree of accuracy."

The inchoate right of dower may be barred, not only by the State in its exercise of the right of eminent domain, without consulting the wife, but the husband also can, by his own act, bar this right by a dedication of his property to public use when the dedication is complete, or when the public accepts the dedication. This point was ruled by the Supreme Court of Indiana in Duncan v. Terre Haute, 85 Ind. 108. Judge Dillon, in his treatise on Municipal Corporations (2d ed. § 459) says: "As dower is not the result of contract, but is a positive legislative institution, it is constitutionally competent for the Legislature to authorize lands to be taken by a municipal corporation for a market, street, or other public use, upon an appraisal and payment of their value to the husband, the holder of the fee, and such taking and payment will confer an absolute title, divested of any inchoate right of dower. Nor is the widow dowable in lands dedicated by her husband in his lifetime to the public, where the dedication is complete, or has been accepted and acted upon by the municipal authorities." On the same subject, Mr. Washburn, in his work on Real Property (4th ed. 269), uses this language: "One mode in which dower may be defeated remains to be mentioned, and that is by the exercise of eminent domain during the life of the husband, or, what is equivalent to it, the dedication of land to the public use."

In Gwynne v. Cincinnati, 3 Ohio, 24, the husband gave the city a square for a market-house and a street opening to it. His wife did not join in this dedication. The city ordinance accepted this dedication. The supreme court held that the wife was barred. It is there said: "The counsel for the complainants insist that it is a case to be distinguished from that of public grounds for public uses, but the court are unable to comprehend the distinction. When a town is laid out, the law requires the plat to be recorded, and by such record the streets become public highways, and the title to the grounds set apart for public uses is vested in the county for the purposes contemplated. The uses thus created are inconsistent with the exertion of any private right while the use remains; consequently all private rights must be either suspended or abrogated. Such has been the general understanding, not only in this State, but also, as far as we are informed, in other States also."

Mr. Scribner, in his work on Dower, after reviewing the adjudged cases in England and America, and after an examination of the principle involved, concludes the discussion of this question thus: "The rule fairly deducible from these authorities would seem to exclude dower in all cases where lands are dedicated to the public for a legitimate purpose, and the public have acquired a right to the enjoyment thereof, or where they are lawfully appropriated by virtue of the right of eminent domain. The reasoning of the courts appears to apply as well where lands are granted and used for public parks, public libraries, or other public use of a like character, as where they are devoted to the purposes of a market-place or a public highway." Scribner, Dower, chap. 27.

Let us examine this question, now, in the light of the Missouri Statutes and decisions. We have a chapter, and have had for many years, providing for the dedication of streets and grounds to the public. Chapter 127, Rev. Stat. 1889. The Statute authorizes the proprietor of land to make, acknowledge, and file a plat, on which shall be designated the streets and grounds dedicated to the public, and that such plat, when acknowledged by the proprietor and recorded, "shall be a sufficient conveyance to vest the fee of such parcels of land as therein named, described or intended for public uses in such city, town, or village, when incorporated, in trust for the uses therein named." Section 7813, Id. No provision whatever is made for the concurrence of the wife in the dedication; but the authorities we have quoted would seem to indicate that such dedication, when accepted by the public, would operate to bar the inchoate right of dower of the wife of the "proprietor," where she does not join in the dedication. Our Road Laws and laws in regard to eminent domain provided for the appropriation of land for the public use, but no provision is anywhere made to obtain the inchoate right of dower of the wife of the owner of the land which is appropriated. The statutes on these subjects do not look beyond the husband, when he is seised of the fee. Though the question has never been directly involved in any case determined by this court, yet Judge Bliss, in Maguire v. Riffin, 44 Mo. 512 (loc. cit. 515), quotes and approves the doctrine of Moore v. New York, supra. By common consent among the people and members of the bar of this State, it has not been deemed necessary to make the wife a party to a proceeding to condemn her husband's land for a public road, or a railroad, in order to cut off her inchoate right of dower. This common opinion in this instance has so long prevailed in Missouri, and has been so universally acted upon, that its overthrow now would introduce great confusion in the titles to estates. It is not merely speculative and theoretical, but has been made the ground-work and substance of practice. The presumption is that this practice is founded upon the rule announced by Scribner and Washburn, and the cases quoted above.

Again, it has been held in this State that, where the wife joins with her husband in a mortgage of his real estate, she is not a necessary party to a suit to foreclose the mortgage, and that a foreclosure against the husband alone bars her inchoate right of dower. Riddick v. Walsh, 15 Mo. 519; Thornton v. Pigg, 24 Mo. 249; Hoyt v. Oliver, 69 Mo. 188. It is true that in the Riddick-Walsh Case, the foreclosure occurred at a time when our statute provided that a sale under a general execution against the husband carried the wife's dower, yet Judge Scott did not rest the determination of the case wholly upon the Statute, but held that the foreclosure carried the dower without regard to the Statute. He uses this language: "On the one hand it was argued that, as the land out of which this right of dower is claimed had been sold under a special feri facias on the judgment in the mortgage proceedings, that was a sale under execution, within the meaning of the Act, and therefore the right of dower was barred. On the other hand, it was contended that the wife was a necessary party to the proceedings to foreclose the equity of redemption, and, not being joined, she could not be affected by the judgment in a suit to which she was not a party. There is a marked distinction throughout the books between cases where a suit affects a wife's interest in real estate which is claimed in her own right, and those in which she has only an inchoate right of dower. In the former class of cases no instance is to be found in which it is not maintained that a wife is a necessary party to the proceedings in order to divest her right. In the latter class the husband alone is deemed the proper party to defend a proceeding instituted to divest the title to land to which a mere inchoate right of dower has attached. . . . The execution of the mortgage, with the wife's acknowledgment and relinquishment of dower, the proceedings to foreclose the equity of redemption, the judgment, execution, and sale by the sheriff, taken with his deed, are the links in the chain of title of the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. The wife having given her assent to the deed, and having a mere inchoate right in her husband's estate, who was still in existence, and he being competent to defend such interests of the wife in all other proceedings against him, no reason is perceived why the wife should have been made a party to this suit. So, in either point of view, the wife is barred of her dower." The doctrine laid down in this case was directly involved in the case of Thornton v. Pigg, supra, decided in 1857, and was approved by this court; and again, in 1875, the same doctrine received the sanction of this court in Hoyt v. Oliver, supra. In 1885 the question arose in Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202, whether a judgment of partition against the husband divested the wife's inchoate right of dower, and it was distinctly held by a majority of the court that it did; and it was also held that section 2197, which was then in force, did not affect the question. In other words, it was held that a judgment in partition against the husband was not included in that section. Judge Scott, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "There being no law requiring her to be made a party, it is not perceived how the arbitrary use of her name can impart validity to a proceeding which without it would not affect her. Nothing seems clearer than that, if the law does not require a married woman to be made a party to a proceeding, the making her one arbitrarily cannot affect her rights. If the proceeding is such as does not bind her, the use of her name without authority of law cannot produce such a consequence. Under our law, the wife of the husband, who owns an interest in the land to be divided, is not required to be made a party in partition, any more than such wife is required to be plaintiff or defendant in an action of ejectment for lands claimed by the husband, and in which she may have a right of dower. If the husband alone is competent to protect her interests in this action, why not in other actions in which her interests are the same?" And Riddick v. Walsh, supra, is cited as authority. The general principle upon which this decision proceeded was that the wife's interest was subordinate and subject to the right of partition, and for that reason she was not a necessary party. The same question arose again, and was again determined the same way, in 1870, in Hinds v. Stevens, 45 Mo. 209. The opinion this time was unanimous. This case goes further, however, than that of Lee v. Lindell. The judgment of the Hinds-Stevens Case was rendered against the husband in his lifetime, but the sale did not occur till after his death, when his widow applied for her dower, she not having been made a party to the proceeding. Judge Bliss, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Since the decision of this court in Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202, it has never been deemed necessary to make the wife of a person interested in the partition of lands a party to a proceeding for partition. The Statute does not expressly require it, and I cannot conceive of any interest she can have in the result, more than in any other suit touching the realty. . . ." The broad language in relation to parties to proceedings in partition was substantially the same in 1885, under which Lee v. Lindell was decided, as in that of 1855, covering the proceedings in question. Since this decision the question has not been mooted in this State. In 1875, in the case of Hoyt v. Oliver, supra, it was held that a wife was not a necessary party to a suit to correct a deed of trust given on the land of the husband. In the case of Bailey v. Winn, 101 Mo. 649, it was held that a wife was not a necessary party to an action to foreclose a vendor's lien in order to bar her dower. See also Fontaine v. Boatmens' Sav. Inst. 57 Mo. 552; Duke v. Brandt, 51 Mo. 221. Where the husband has taken a title bond for land, and paid part of the purchase money, his wife has an inchoate right of dower in the land thus held (Hart v. Logan, 49 Mo. 47); and yet, in such case, if the husband's interest be sold under a general execution, the inchoate right of dower is barred (Worsham v. Callison, 49 Mo. 206); and the husband alone, in such case, can transfer the property, and bar his wife's right to dower (Duke v. Brandt, 51 Mo. 221). It seems clear that the reason of the rule applicable to the exercise of eminent domain, and the dedication of land to public use, to the foreclosure of mortgages and vendors' liens, and to partition proceedings, applies to the case at bar with great force. When the State appropriates the land of a private citizen for public use, it does it against his will. So when the State enforces its lien against the land of the citizen it does it against his will. If one proceeding cuts off the inchoate right of dower, why does not the other? In case of foreclosure of a mortgage or vendor's lien, the husband and wife both are interested, first, to show that nothing is due; and, in the second place, they have a right to receive the surplus. This court has said that the husband is competent in that case to protect the interests of his wife. In the case at bar the husband and wife were interested, first, to show that no tax was due on the land; and, in the second place, they had a right to receive the surplus arising from the sale after the satisfaction of the lien. In the proceeding instituted against him to enforce the State's lien for the taxes, was he not competent to protect his wife's interests? Was he not, as remarked by Gardiner, J., in Moore v. New York, supra, "the only person owning and representing the fee?" If a judgment in partition against the husband bars the wife's dower, a fortiori will not a judgment enforcing the State's lien for taxes, when the husband is made a party, bar her dower? In a partition proceeding, the wife is peculiarly interested. It is said her dower will attach at once to the land allotted to her husband in severalty, but may not land be allotted to him that is unimproved, and hence be utterly valueless to the widow? She has no right to be heard in regard to whether partition shall be made at all, or in regard to what land shall be allotted to her husband; and, if the land be sold, the proceeds go to her husband, and she is cut off entirely. But still this court has held, and the rule is now firmly established, that the husband is competent to protect his wife's interests in such a proceeding. If that be the rule where the husband may, on his own motion, commence the proceeding, with how much greater force will it apply in a case where the State sells the land against the will of the husband as well as the wife. It is true, no one shall be deprived of his property without "due process of law." But a proceeding in rem, in which no named person is served with notice, is due process of law. Cooley, Const. Lim. 8d ed. 402; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 51. A proceeding defended by one person, who represents another, is due process of law. This was held in the cases we have cited, not probably in so many words, but in effect. A good illustration of this principle is to be found in the administration of estates. The administrator or executor is the only necessary party to establish a debt against the estate of the testator or intestate, though the debt thus established may finally operate to deprive the heir of the property he would otherwise take. Yet he is bound by the judgment against the administrator or executor; and, where the mortgagor dies, the administrator or executor is the only necessary party defendant in a proceeding of foreclosure, and a judgment against him not only bars the widow, but the heir also. Tierney v. Spiva, 97 Mo. 98. "The owner in fee of land represents his heirs as well as creditors in all actions involving the title to the land. In such actions he represents the fee, and this includes everyone who will derive title through him. If he is competent to protect those who will be his heirs, as also his creditors, whose interests are vastly superior, as a rule, to the wife's inchoate right of dower, is he not competent to protect his wife's interests? The dower right of a widow is a continuation of the husband's estate. Her dower interest, whether inchoate or consummate, is part of the fee." Doty v. Baker, 11 Hun, 222; Moore v. New York, supra. There is no provision in the Revenue Laws for making the wife a party to the action against the land of her husband, and as was said in Lee v. Lindell, in the absence of such a provision, making her a party arbitrarily cannot affect her interests. It being provided that the "title in fee" shall pass to the purchaser under a tax judgment, and no provision being made for bringing in the wife, it is the plain intent of these laws to pass not only the husband's interest, but the wife's also, where he alone issued. Cooley, Taxn. 464. The courts, in all the instances named, where the wife's inchoate right of dower was held to have been cut off by a proceeding to which she was not a party, have proceeded upon the general principle that this contingent right was subordinate to other rights; that the wife's right attached subject to a superior claim. So, a tax lien in our State being paramount to all interests and claims, the wife's inchoate right of dower attaches subject to that lien, and she is no more a necessary party to a proceeding to foreclose it in order to bar the right than she is a necessary party in the instances referred to.

From the authorities cited, and from what has been said in this opinion, we deduce these propositions: (1) that when an action is brought against the "owner" of land, within the meaning of that word as used in our Revenue Laws, to establish and enforce the State's lien thereon for taxes, a valid judgment rendered, the land sold thereunder, and the sheriff executes a deed to the purchaser, the whole title in fee is conveyed, as the statute declares; (2) that the wife is not an "owner," within the meaning of the statute, by virtue of her inchoate right of dower in her husband's land, in such a sense as to require her to be made a party to a tax suit against her husband, in order to bar her contingent interest; (3) that the husband in such a case represents the fee, and is competent to protect his wife's interests; and hence (4) that a valid tax sale of the husband's fee-simple estate cuts off the wife's inchoate right of dower.

2. This is the conclusion we have reached upon an examination of the authorities, but we are equally well satisfied that this conclusion is sound upon principle also. It is to the interest of the State, of course, that it should have the power to collect its taxes by the sale of land, and to thereby convey the title in fee; but it is of vastly more importance to property owners that the proceeding to sell lands for taxes should, in the first place, be as inexpensive as practicable, and, in the second place, that the interest and title offered for sale should be definitely known. Suits for taxes are expensive, at best; but to require the wife to be made a party with the husband would add to that expense. Frequently the tax is only a dollar or two, and it would cost that much or more to make the wife a party, and when she is made a party, what can she accomplish more than her husband can accomplish?

Nothing. His interests are identical with hers. The State, in its efforts to enforce the collection of the tax, is the common enemy of both. The proceeding is in invitum as to both. But when lands are offered for sale against the will of the owner, it is important to the owner that the estate offered should be definitely known; otherwise it will be sacrificed. If the title and estate offered for sale be known with certainty the land will probably bring its value. If the collector be required to make the wife as well as the husband party to the suit in order to bar her dower, in ninety-nine hundredths of the tax sales it will not—it cannot—be known whether there be a wife at all or not, and hence there will be a doubt as to the extent of the title conveyed. Sacrifices of land must follow necessarily, and these sacrifices will largely exceed the value of the “shadowy” right of inchoate dower. It is a well-known fact that nearly all tax suits are against non-resident owners, and in such cases it is utterly impracticable to learn the name of the wife of the owner, or to know that the owner is married. Sacrifices of property must result from the enforcement of such a requirement, and these sacrifices will generally exceed the value of the contingent right of inchoate dower. It is said the sale of land for taxes is against common right, and is not, therefore, favored in law. That is true. But it is a common saying that “taxes and death” are certain. Every property owner knows that an annual tax will be levied on his property. He knows, or ought to know, when it becomes due in each year, and the sooner it is known that if the taxes be not paid within the prescribed time the property will be sold and the owner will lose his property the better. This rule would be better for the State and better for the taxpayer. Better for the State, because it would be sure to collect its taxes; and better for the owner, because, when he knows payment will be enforced certainly he will be more apt to pay, and if for any reason he should fail to pay the taxes due by him, and his property be sold to pay them, it would bring its full value, when it is known that a good title in fee is to be conveyed. Hence all embarrassments thrown in the way of tax sales simply operate to make taxpayers careless, in the first place, about the payment of their just share of the expenses of the State; and, in the second place, to sacrifice the property sold, because no one can know definitely what is offered for sale. It should be the policy of the State to create competition at these sales, so that there may be a surplus left, after the payment of costs and taxes, to go to the owner. Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 464.

The second contention on the part of the appellant is that there was no breach of the covenant of general warranty in this case at the institution of this suit, nor now, because there existed only a right of inchoate dower in Mrs. Collier, and no breach could occur till this right became consummate, and vested by the death of her husband. It is universally held that inchoate dower constitutes an incumbrance of land, and the rule is that the covenant is broken as soon as made, in such case. This breach, however, is technical only, and the trial court committed error in giving judgment for substantial damages. Walker v. Deaver, 79 Mo. 664, and cases cited.

Enough has been said in the former part of this opinion to show that this right of inchoate dower is too shadowy and unsubstantial to be valued or estimated.

The judgment will be reversed, and cause remanded for new trial, it being the opinion of a majority of Division No. 2 that the tax sale and deed did not cut off Mrs. Collier's inchoate right of dower and that there was a technical breach of the covenant in the case, for which plaintiffs are entitled to recover nominal damages only.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Charles COOK, Conservator of Sarah A. Bostwick,

Uri P. BARTHOLOMEW et al.

(....Conn.....)

1. A deed granting land for a certain money consideration, with a condition that, if the grantor shall support the grantee during her natural life and give her decent burial the deed shall be void, otherwise it shall remain of full force and effect, constitutes a mortgage which may be foreclosed on failure to fulfill the condition.

2. No entry for breach of the condition is necessary to enable a mortgagee to maintain an action to foreclose the mortgagor's right of redemption although the mortgage is in form a deed absolute with a condition annexed.

NOTE.—Deed on consideration of support for life. See note to Dreibach v. Serfass (Pa.) 3 L. R. A. 826.

(January 7, 1891.)

RESERVATION from the Court of Common Pleas for Litchfield County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff advised.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. R. E. Hall, for plaintiff:

The instrument executed by Ammon Bostwick to Charles Cook is a mortgage.

The condition of a mortgage may be the payment of a debt, the indemnity of a surety, or the doing or not doing any other act.

2 Swift, Dig. 183; Robinson, Elementary Law, § 102; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. *475; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 296; Lanfair v. Lanfair, 18 Pick. 304; Erskine v. Townsend, 2 Mass. 493; Mitchell v. Burnham, 44 Me. 299; Wing v. Cooper, 37 Vt. 179; Lund v. Lund, 1 N. H. 41.

Courts treat as mortgages conveyances conditioned for the support and maintenance of mortgages or others.

1 Jones, Mort. § 388; Austin v. Austin, 9 Vt. 420; Fiske v. Fiske, 20 Pick. 499; Flanders v. Lamphear, 9 N. H. 201; Daniels v. Eisenlord, 10 Mich. 454; Bresnahan v. Bresnahan, 46 Wis. 386; Hiatt v. Parker, 29 Kan. 765; Bryant v. Erskine, 55 Me. 158.

They are at all events so far mortgages that they can be foreclosed.

1 Jones, Mort. § 388; Lanfair v. Lanfair, 18 Pick. 299-304; Marsh v. Austin, 1 Allen, 235; Gilson v. Gilson, 2 Allen, 115; Pettee v. Case, Id. 546; Wilder v. Whittemore, 15 Mass. 262; Gibson v. Taylor, 6 Gray, 810; Austin v. Austin and Flanders v. Lamphear, supra; Rhoades v. Parker, 10 N. H. 88; Eastman v. Batchelder, 36 N. H. 141; Hawkins v. Clermont, 15 Mich. 511; Wright v. Wright, 49 Mich. 624; Hiatt v. Parker and Bresnahan v. Bresnahan, supra.

Our Connecticut courts have repeatedly recognized mortgages to secure the performance of other acts than the payment of money.

See Crane v. Deming, 7 Conn. 387; Harding v. Mill River Woolen Mfg. Co. 34 Conn. 458; Lewis v. Hartford Silk Mfg. Co. 5 New Eng. Rep. 608, 56 Conn. 25.

There is no analogy to a deed upon condition.

See 2 Swift, Dig. *169.

In all doubtful cases a court of equity will construe a conveyance, a mortgage, rather than a deed upon condition.

Boone, Real Prop. § 225.

If the deed is a mortgage it may be redeemed.

1 Jones, Mort. 395, and cases.

Mortgages for support may be redeemed unless the condition be so far a personal covenant that a breach cannot be satisfied by money payment.

Jones, Mort. 395; Henry v. Tupper, 29 Vt. 358-375; Bryant v. Erskine, 55 Me. 153; Bethlehem v. Annis, 40 N. H. 34-43.

If the court judge that compensation in money damages can be made for the breach, then a decree limiting a time for redemption may be granted.

Henry v. Tupper, 29 Vt. 359.

Otherwise an absolute decree of foreclosure without privilege to redeem should be given.

Bresnahan v. Bresnahan, 46 Wis. 386.

Messrs. Henry B. Graves and D. C. Kilbourn, for defendants:

The instrument in question is not a mortgage.

Anderson, Law Dict.; Bouvier, Law Dict.; Bacon v. Brown, 19 Conn. 34; Jarvis v. Woodruff, 22 Conn. 550; Ansonia Bank's App. 58 Conn. 261.

The amount of the debt cannot be ascertained, which is an essential requisite of foreclosure.

Goodrich v. Stanley, 23 Conn. 88.

There is a distinction between the breach of a covenant or condition to pay money and one requiring acts to be done.

Hill v. Barclay, 18 Ves. Jr. 56; 4 Kent, Com. 180.

When an estate is granted upon condition in a deed, and there is a breach of the condition, an actual entry or claim by the grantor is necessary in order to revest the estate (Chalker v. Chalker, 1 Conn. 79); and this entry for the purpose of taking advantage of a condition is 13 L. R. A.

a thing of substance (Bowen v. Bowen, 18 Conn. 541; Warner v. Bennett, 31 Conn. 468), and must be pleaded.

Gould, Pl. chap. 4, § 7.

Carpenter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage, with the alleged mortgage annexed as an exhibit. The mortgage is in two parts,—an ordinary deed for the consideration of $900, duly executed to convey real estate, and a condition thereto attached, of the same date, and signed by the grantor, as follows: "The condition of the within deed is as follows: The said Bostwick, for the consideration named in the within deed, covenants and agrees with said Charles Cook, as such conservator, that he will receive said Sarah A. Bostwick into his care and keeping during the term of her natural life; that he will provide for all her wants in a reasonable and proper way; will provide her with all needed food, drink, and clothing; have a room and fire when needed; lodging and every necessary comfort, both in sickness and health; and at her decease give her decent and proper burial, and erect tombstones at her grave, with a suitable inscription thereon, within one year after her decease, said tombstones to be of a value of not less than fourteen dollars. Now, therefore, if said Bostwick shall well and truly perform all and every of the above covenants and stipulations faithfully, then this deed to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect in law." The complaint also alleges that the defendant Bostwick subsequently conveyed his interest in the premises to the defendant Jones, and that Jones conveyed his interest to the other defendant, Bartholomew. The defendants demurred, and the case is reserved. Whether the instrument sued on is or is not a mortgage is the principal question in the case. What is a mortgage? "A mortgage is a contract of sale executed, with power to redeem. . . . The condition of a mortgage may be the payment of a debt, the indemnity of a surety, or the doing or not doing any other act. The most common method is to insert the condition in the deed, but it may as well be done by a separate instrument of defeasance executed at the same time. . . . A bond or note is usually taken for the debt, which is described in the deed with a condition that if the debt is paid by the time the deed shall be void. In such case the mortgage is called a collateral security for the debt. In like manner an engagement to indemnify, or any other agreement, may be described in the mortgage deed." 2 Swift, Dig. 182, 183. "To constitute a mortgage, the conveyance must be made to secure the payment of a debt." Bacon v. Brown, 19 Conn. 29. "A conveyance of lands by a debtor to a creditor as a security for the payment of the debt." Jarvis v. Woodruff, 22 Conn. 548. What is a debt? "That which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one person is bound to pay to another or to perform for his benefit; that of which payment is liable to be exacted; due; obligation, liability." Webster, Dict.

What is this case? Ammon Bostwick received $900 from the plaintiff, in consideration of which he agreed to support Sarah A. Bostwick during life, and at her death to bury her, and to erect a tombstone to her memory. To secure the performance of this agreement, he executed this deed, with a condition that the deed should be void if the agreement should be performed. He assumed a duty which may be aptly described as a debt. He executed a deed of real estate as collateral security for the performance of that duty,—the payment of that debt. The obligation falls within an approved definition of "debt," and the conveyance is within the legal definition of a "mortgage." There is no force in the objection that this cannot be a mortgage because of the difficulty in ascertaining the amount of the debt, as clearly appears by the definitions. Of course, there is less certainty and more inconvenience in reducing an obligation of this nature to a money valuation than there is in computing the amount due on an ordinary bond or note. Nevertheless it may be approximately done, and that is sufficient for all the purposes of substantial justice. Courts never refuse to redress an injury on account of the difficulty in estimating the extent of the injury in dollars and cents. In this case the age, health, general condition, and expectation of life of Sarah

A. Bostwick must be known. Add to these the probable cost of supporting her for one year, and we have the data for a reasonable estimate of the cost of supporting her through life. It is a problem of the same nature, containing the same elements and similar factors, with the problem which the parties solved 14 years ago. They then, as it seems, fixed the outside limit at $900. The same thing can be done now as well as then. Possibly $900 may be considered an equitable limit, beyond which the plaintiff may not claim in this case. As other circumstances may exist which will materially affect the general question, we will not consider the question further on this demurrer. Regarding the conveyance as a mortgage, as we do, there is no foundation for the claim that an entry for a breach of the condition is essential. An entry is essential when the grantor would divest the grantee of his title for a breach of a condition. This is an action by the grantee, in whom the title is, not to enforce a forfeiture, but to foreclose an equity of redemption, unless the grantor, within a reasonable time allowed him therefor, pays the damage sustained by a breach of his agreement.

The court of common pleas is advised to overrule the demurrer.

The other Judges concur.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

AMERICAN RAPID TELEGRAPH CO.,

Appt.,

v.

Jacob HESS et al., Respts.

(....N. Y.)

1. Legislative authority to a telegraph company to construct its lines along and upon any public roads and highways grants to it no interest in the streets of the city but must be construed as conferring a license which although acted on may be revoked by the Legislature whenever the public interest requires or as an exercise of the police power, and therefore not beyond the control of future legislation.

2. Granting a telegraph company the franchise to construct its line along and upon city streets will not be construed as an abdication of the police power over such streets, but if the poles and wires become a serious obstruction or nuisance therein provisions may be made for their removal; and for that

NOTE.—Telegraphs subject to the police power of municipalities.

A franchise granted to a telephone company, of constructing and operating its lines along and upon streets, is subordinate to the rights of the public in the street for the purpose of travel. Cincinnati Inclined Plane R. Co. v. City & S. Teleg. Asso. (Ohio) 12 L. R. A. 541; Cincinnati & S. G. A. St. R. Co. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 523.

A telephone company having a franchise to erect poles and wires upon the streets of a municipality has not such a vested interest and exclusive right in the ground circuit of electricity as to authorize it to enjoin the operation of an electric street railway subsequently constructed on the same streets and using the ground circuit for the return current of electricity. Cincinnati Inclined Plane R. Co. v. City & S. Teleg. Asso. supra.

Telegraph companies, like all other corporations which occupy the highway of municipalities, are subject to proper police regulation. Philadelphia v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 W. N. C. 455; Philadelphia Steam Supply Co. v. City, 17 Phila. 110.

And such regulations are presumed to be reasonable. Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361; Com. v. Patch, 97 Mass. 221; St. Louis v. Weber, 44 Mo. 550. 13 L. R. A.

So a charge per annum imposed upon all poles erected by a telegraph company is a proper exercise of the police power of a city, where its charter confers upon it police power. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 192.

State legislation compelling electric wires in the streets of a city to be placed under the surface of the streets is an exercise of the police power, and not an unlawful attempt to regulate commerce or an invasion of the rights of a telegraph company (Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New York, 3 L. R. A. 449, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 538, 38 Fed. Rep. 552); nor is it an unwarranted interference through state legislation with its operations, an Act of Congress giving such companies their dual capacity as agents of the general government and instruments of interstate and foreign commerce. Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708. State legislation strictly and legitimately for police purposes does not, in the sense of the Constitution, necessarily trench upon any authority which has been confided expressly or by implication to the national government. Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115.

Corporate rights subject to the police power. See note to People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. (N. Y.) 9 L. R. A. 25.

purpose the company may lawfully be directed to place its wires under ground, commissioners may be appointed to see that the work is done, and a contract made for the construction of conduits in which the wires can be placed, and, if after due notice they are not removed, they may be cut down.

3. That under the Acts of Congress telegraph companies have the right to erect and maintain their lines along and upon the public streets of a city will not prevent the State in which such city is located from requiring the wires to be placed under ground.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term for New York County in favor of defendants in an action brought to restrain defendants from taking down or otherwise interfering with any of the poles or wires belonging to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William G. Wilson, for appellant:

The State has the right to take or destroy property without making compensation only when there is an immediate and urgent necessity, and continues to have that right only so long as the pressing necessity continues. It may be called the right of necessity.

American Print Works v. Lawrence, 28 N. J. L. 590; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 107; Mills, Em. Dom. § 7.

The right of eminent domain differs from the above in that it is exercised with deliberation and according to well fixed rules and courses of procedure and with that due regard to private and vested rights which is impossible in the case of a sudden and overwhelming necessity.

If any scheme for the benefit of the general welfare of the community involves as an incident or as an essential to its accomplishment the appropriation or destruction of private property, the right to take or destroy such property must be exercised through this right or power of eminent domain.

The Constitution protects such property and says it shall not be taken without due process of law and just compensation.

Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. 198; Wynehamer v. People, 18 N. Y. 385.

The police power is, so far as it affects property, the right of the State to prescribe and regulate the use of property so that the public at large or other individuals shall not be injured by its use.

There is in principle a broad line of demarcation between this and the above powers. This power is used to enforce the maxim, sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas.

Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 85.

The limitation which controls the exercise of this power is that which is supplied by the Constitution. When alleged regulations either expressly or by necessary effect take away the property itself, or the substantial right of its enjoyment, then they contravene the constitutional protection of property and property rights, and must be held nugatory and void.

People v. Squires, 1 N. Y. S. R. 633; United States Illum. Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun, 222.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to 1883, the plaintiff was incorporated under Act 265 of the Laws of 1848, the General Act for the incorporation and regulation of telegraph companies, and the Acts amendatory thereof; and prior to that year it had erected its lines of telegraph poles and wires in the streets of the City of New York, described in the complaint. It also had extensive connecting lines in other States, and throughout this State, which constituted a system of telegraphy then in active use and operation. Section 5 of the Act of 1848 provides as follows: "Such association is authorized to construct lines of telegraph along and upon any of the public roads and highways, or across any of the waters within the limits of this State, by the erection of the necessary fixtures, including posts, piers, or abutments, for sustaining the cords or wires of such lines; provided, the same shall not be so constructed as to incommode the public use of said road or highways, or injuriously interrupt the navigation of said waters; nor shall this Act be so construed as to authorize the construction of any bridge across any of the waters of this State." The Act (chap. 471, Laws 1858) amends the Act of 1848, and section 2 thereof provides as follows: "Such association is authorized to erect and construct, from time to time, the necessary fixtures for such lines of telegraph, upon, over, or under any of the public roads, streets, and highways, and through, across, or under any of the waters within the limits of this State, subject to the restrictions in the said recited Act contained." The plaintiff constructed its telegraph lines in the streets of the City of New York under the Acts referred to, without any special grant or authority from the city.

The claim of the plaintiff is that these acts operated as a grant to it of a franchise to use the streets for its poles and wires, and that, therefore, an inviolable contract was created which is under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and hence that neither the State nor the city, under its authority, could cause its poles and wires to be removed from the streets, except upon compensation to it ascertained in the manner prescribed by the Constitution and laws for cases where private property is condemned for public use. We think the Act of 1848, as amended in 1858, can in no proper sense be said to have granted any interests to the plaintiff in the streets of the city. There certainly was no formal grant, and the statutes contain no terms or phraseology appropriate to a grant. They at most confer upon the plaintiff an authority or license to enter upon the streets for its purposes, and subject to certain conditions. The people of the State do not own the streets, and the only authority the Legislature has over them is to deal with them as streets, and to regulate their use as streets for public purposes; and by these acts it, in effect, determined that one of the purposes for which the streets could be used was the erection of poles and stringing of wires for the business of telegraphy, and that that was a public use, not inconsistent with the use of the streets for general street purposes. These were general public legislative Acts, in the exercise of the police power of the State, and therefore they were not beyond the reach or touch of future legislation. The Legislature did not intend to divest itself, and could not divest itself, of its control over the streets for the public welfare, and we must infer from the language used that it did not intend to bind itself by an irrevocable grant. If, therefore, these acts are to be construed as merely conferring a license which has been acted upon by the plaintiff, the Legislature could revoke the license, or modify it in any way, or at any time, when the public interests might require it.

But in this case it is not necessary to hold that the plaintiff did not, by the Acts referred to, obtain some sort of franchise in the streets of the city. We may, for the present purpose, construe these Acts as constituting, in some sense, grants of interests in the streets to the companies organized under them, and contracts sub modo with such corporations, and yet the contention of the plaintiff in this case must fail. In the exercise of its rights under the assumed grant and contract, this corporation was subject to the regulation and control of the Legislature. By giving the franchise, the State did not abdicate its power over the public streets, nor in any way curtail its police power to be exercised for the general welfare of the people; nor did the State absolve itself from its primary duty to maintain the streets and highways of the State in a safe and proper condition for public travel and other necessary street and highway purposes. The grant, if any, was made in reference to the streets, and their maintenance and regulation forever as streets. The State could at all times regulate the size and location of the poles, the height of the wires from the surface of the ground, and their location in the streets; and when the poles and wires became a serious obstruction and nuisance in the streets, from any cause, it could take such action, and make such provisions by law, as were needful to remove the nuisance, and restore the utility of the streets for public purposes. The right of the plaintiff to maintain and operate its wires in the streets could certainly be no greater than the right of railroads, which by public authority occupy the streets and highways of the State. The State, in the exercise of its police power, and the regulating control which it has over corporations created by its authority, may exercise a general supervision over such corporations. It may prescribe the location of the tracks, the size and character of the rails, the precautions which shall be taken for the protection of the public, and the character and style of highway crossings; and no one has ever questioned that it may do whatever is necessary and proper for the public welfare in the control and regulation of the franchises which such corporations have obtained by statutory authority.

Now, what has the Legislature attempted to do in this case? By the Act (chap. 534, Laws 1884), it was provided that all telegraph, telephonic, and electric light wires and cables, in all cities of the State having a population of 500,000 or over, "shall hereafter be placed under the surface of the streets, lanes, and avenues" of the city, and that it should be accomplished before the 1st day of November, 1885. It was further provided that, in case the owners of the property specified should fail to comply with the Act within the time specified, the local governments of the cities should remove, without delay, all such wires, cables, and poles, wherever found in their respective cities. Under that Act, no property was or could be taken from any of the owners specified. They were simply required to remove their poles and wires from the surface of the streets, and place the wires under ground. Their property was not taken, but the use of their franchise was regulated. In 1885, chapter 499 was enacted, which provided for the appointment of a board of commissioners of electrical subways, and that board was charged with the duty of enforcing the provisions of the Act of 1884. It was made the duty of that board to cause to be removed from the surface of the streets, and put and maintained under ground, wherever practicable, all electrical wires and cables, so as to enable and require all duly authorized companies operating the same to transact their business with under-ground conductors, where-ever practicable. All subways for underground conductors of electricity were required to be built under the direction and control of that board, and no electrical wires or cables were to be allowed above the surface of the streets without the permission of the board. Commissioners were duly appointed under that Act, and in 1886, the Consolidated Telegraph & Electrical Subway Company of New York having been incorporated under the laws of this State, the commissioners entered into a contract with it, whereby it contracted to build, with its own capital, the necessary subways for the electrical conductors, the subways to be constructed in all respects subject to the approval of the commissioners. It was also provided in the contract that all corporations owning and operating electrical wires above the streets should have the right to place them in the subways, under certain conditions specified. In 1887 the Legislature enacted chapter 716, entitled "An Act in Relation to Electrical Conductors in the City of New York." By that Act the agreement made between the subway commissioners and the Consolidated Telegraph & Electrical Subway Company, above referred to, was ratified and confirmed; and the Act provided that whenever, in the opinion of the board of electrical control constituted by that Act, sufficient conduits or subways under ground shall have been made ready, the board shall notify the owners or operators of the electrical conductors above ground in such streets or locality to make such electrical connections in such underground conduits or subways as shall be determined by the board, and to remove their poles and wires from the street within ninety days after such notice. This provision was made a police regulation in and for the City of New York, and, in case it was not complied with by the telegraph and other companies referred to, it was made the duty of the commissioner of public works to cause the poles, wires, etc., to be removed forthwith by the bureau of incumbrances, upon the written order of the mayor to that effect. Subways having been constructed in certain of the streets of the City of New York, by the Consolidated Telegraph & Electrical Subway Company, under the supervision and with the approval of the board of electrical control, notice was given to the plaintiff, as provided in the Act, to remove its poles and wires from the streets, and place its electrical conductors in such subways. Having refused to comply with such notice, and with the provisions of the Act, the commissioner of public works of the city caused the poles to be cut down, and the wires to be removed from the streets, and this is what the plaintiff complains of.

Its property was not taken for public use. It was simply removed from the streets, where it had become a nuisance, and the public authorities had the same right to remove it from the streets, doing no unnecessary damage, that it had to remove any other incumbrance therefrom. After the passage of the Acts referred to, and the building of the subways, and the notice to the plaintiff, it had no right longer to maintain its poles and wires above the surface of the streets. They were then there without authority, and thus became a nuisance, and hence the public officials had the right to remove them. It is quite true that the plaintiff could not remove its electrical conductors into the subways without some expense, but the same is true of railroads occupying streets. They cannot change from one style of rail to another, nor from one place in the street to another, nor make a change of grade without a considerable expense; and yet the mere fact that they are subjected to expense is no answer to the right of the public, in pursuance of law, to require them to comply with the prescribed regulations. If the authority did not otherwise exist to require these poles and wires to be removed from the streets, it could be found in section 5 of the Act of 1848, in which is contained the authority to construct telegraphic lines upon public roads and highways, with the proviso that the same shall not be "so constructed as to incommode the public use of such roads or highways." Who shall judge whether they incommode the public use of the streets? It is unquestioned that they do, and the Legislature has determined that fact, and when the plaintiff maintained its wires and poles in the streets in such a manner as to incommode the public use of the streets, the Legislature had the right to provide that they should put them under the streets, so that the streets above the surface could be devoted to the public uses for which they were intended. The plaintiff seeks to strengthen its position, in reference to the use of the streets of the City of New York, under the laws of the United States, to which we will make brief reference. It is provided in section 5263 of the Revised Statutes of the United States that "any telegraph company now organized, or which may hereafter be organized, under the laws of any State, shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post-roads of the United States, which have been, or may hereafter be, declared such by law, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States; but such lines of telegraph shall be so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct the navigation of such streams and waters, or interfere with the ordinary travel on such military or post-roads." Section 5268 provides that, "before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by law, such company shall file their written acceptance with the postmaster general of the restrictions and obligations required by law." Section 3964 provides that all the letter-carrier routes established in any city or town for the collection and delivery of mail matter are post-roads; and by the Act approved March 1, 1884, it is enacted that "all public roads and highways, while kept up and maintained as such, are hereby declared to be post-roads." The plaintiff filed the written acceptance with the postmaster-general required by section 5268. The precise scope and range of operation of these sections within a State are not quite apparent, and cannot be easily defined. But this much, at least, must be true, that under them no telegraph company could interfere with the use of the streets and highways of the State, except under regulations prescribed for the control of all telegraph companies within the State, nor could such companies interfere with streets and highways in the State so as materially to impair their usefulness as ordinary highways. Nor could these congressional Acts deprive the State of its control over its highways, and its right to regulate their use, under the police power, for the public welfare. The laws of Congress are perfectly satisfied by the permission granted to the plaintiff, of which it is perfectly feasible for it to avail itself, to place its electrical conductors in the subways constructed beneath the surface of the streets. We have carefully scrutinized the contract entered into by the board of electrical control with the defendant, the Consolidated Telegraph & Electrical Subway Company, and we find nothing in its provisions unreasonable or impractical, and the power of the Legislature to authorize such a contract, and to confirm it when made, is beyond doubt. These Acts of 1884, 1885, and 1887 have been under consideration in several cases, and have uniformly been upheld and enforced. People v. Squire, 107 N. Y. 593, 10 Cent. Rep. 437, 14 Daly, 154; United States Illum. Co. v. Hess, 19 N. Y. S. R. 883; United States Illum. Co. v. Grant, 55 Hun, 222; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New York, 88 Fed. Rep. 552, opinion by Wallace, J., in United States circuit court, 8 L. R. A. 449, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 533.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

(..... N. Y.)

1. The mere fact of a difference as to the one designated to bring the action

NOTE.—When personal representatives of a deceased party may bring action.

When the statute of a State gives a remedy for the death of a person caused by the negligence of another, and provides that the action shall be brought by the personal representative of such deceased person, the personal representative appointed in a State other than that wherein the death occurred may bring such action in the courts of the State in which he was so appointed. Dennick v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439.

When lex fori governs.

In New York State the party suffering the pecuniary loss must bring the action. This relates only to the form of the remedy, and the lex fori governs in all matters relating to the remedy itself. Thornton v. Western Reserve Farmers Ins. Co. 31 Pa. 531; Dennick v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 24 L. ed. 439; Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. 103 Pa. 250; Lodge v. Phelps, 1 Johns. Cas. 138; Foss v. Nutting, 14 Gray, 484.

The lex fori governs the nature, extent and character of remedies: who shall be proper parties to a suit, the mode of procedure and the execution of judgments. These matters are regulated solely and exclusively by the law of the place where the

in the provisions of the statutes of two States providing for the recovery of damages for the benefit of those injured by the negligent killing of a person is not sufficient to prevent the maintenance of the action in the State where the accident did not occur if the statutes are otherwise substantially the same.

2. The plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the benefit of those injured by the negligent killing of a person which is brought outside of the State where the accident occurred in the courts of a State which enforce the liability because of the similarity of its statutes to those of the former State, must be the person designated by the statutes of the State where the injury occurred.

3. The fact that the amount of recovery for the negligent killing of a person is limited in the lex fori and unlimited in the lex loci does not make the statutes of the two States so dissimilar that the remedy will not be enforced in the former State; but the amount that can be recovered will be governed by the lex fori, at least where the killing was done by one of its corporations.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of Buffalo overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. John G. Milburn, for appellant:

The death of the plaintiff's husband having occurred in Pennsylvania an action will only lie in this State if the legislation of Pennsylvania imposes a liability for negligently causing the death of a person similar to the liability imposed by the Statute of this State.

Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. 84 N. Y. 48; Debevoise v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 377.

It was incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege action is instituted. Story, Confli. L. §§ 242, 253, 556, 558.

Questions as to who are the proper parties to suits relate rather to the form of the remedy than to the right and merit of the claim, and are therefore to be determined by the law of the forum. Kirkland v. Lowe, 33 Miss. 423; Orr v. Amory, 11 Mass. 25; Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. 84 N. Y. 48; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Doyle, 60 Miss. 977, 8 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 171; Selma R. Co. v. Lacey, 49 Ga. 106; Bank of the United States v. Donnelly, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 381, 8 L. ed. 974; McClees v. Burt, 5 Met. 198.

The construction given by the courts of another State to the statutes of that State should control in the tribunals of a sister State. Jessup v. Carnegie, 80 N. Y. 441, 10 N. Y. Week Dig. 150; Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 218; Hoyt v. Sheldon, 3 Bosw. 267, 5 Bosw. 172.

In determining the interpretation to be placed upon a statute, it is important to ascertain whether the courts of the enacting State have considered the subject and the construction which has been placed upon it. Ordinarily the courts of a sister State would feel bound to respect the decision thus made and should not reconsider the subject. This course has been substantially pursued in the state and federal courts, and any other rule would lead and prove a statutory right in Pennsylvania to maintain this action similar to the statutory right in this State.

Debevoise v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. supra.

If the Pennsylvania Statute is similar in its import and character to our Statute then only the executor or administrator of the decedent can maintain this action.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1902.

Plaintiff must show by clear and unequivocal allegations her right to maintain this action in the capacity in which she brings it.

Clark v. Dillon, 97 N. Y. 370.

The widow of the decedent cannot maintain an action of this nature in this State though she may be the party designated by the Pennsylvania Statute, and the court holds that the complaint sufficiently shows this.

If the action can be maintained at all, the lex fori must govern as to the proper party to bring the suit.

The cause of action created by these Statutes is an entirely new one; the Statute in each State is its original source.

Hegerich v. Keddle, 99 N. Y. 258.

There are two possible views of first importance which may be taken: (1) that the designation of the party to bring the action is an integral part of the right created by the statute, or (2) that it is a matter pertaining merely to the remedy, the right created being vested in the beneficiaries named.

If the first view be the true one and the right of action is given to the widow, though the recovery is for the benefit of herself and children, we do not see how she can enforce it in a State whose legislation gives the right of action to the executor or administrator.

Usher v. West Jersey R. Co. 4 L. R. A. 261, 126 Pa. 206, 41 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 508, note.

If the view that the designation of the party to bring the suit for the beneficiaries is a matter pertaining to the remedy merely be deemed to be the true one, then it would seem to follow that the lex fori must govern and this action should have been brought by the plaintiff in her capacity as administratrix.

Whitford v. Panama R. Co. 23 N. Y. 485; Story, Conf. L. § 558, 565 et seq.; Wharton, Conf. L. § 719; Stoneman v. Erie R. Co. 52 N. Y. 429; Andrews v. Herriot, 4 Cow. 508, note 10; Bank of United States v. Donnelly, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 872, 8 L. ed. 978; Smith v. Spinolla, 2 Johns. 198.

In our State the recovery is limited to the pecuniary damages resulting from the decedent's death, not exceeding $5,000, whilst the recovery in Pennsylvania is unlimited.

This is such a radical difference that the two Statutes cannot be said to be similar within the meaning of Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. 84 N. Y. 48.

to confusion, operate injuriously, in many cases, and would be in direct hostility to the comity which is due to the authority which is conferred upon the lawfully constituted tribunals of a sovereign State. Jessup v. Carnegie, supra.

The statutes giving an action for damages resulting from death caused by culpable negligence do not apply where the injury was committed in another State, unless it is proved that the laws of that State were similar in character with the law of the State where the action is brought. Whitford v. Panama R. Co. 23 N. Y. 465; Beach v. Bay State S. B. Co. 30 Barb. 433; Crowley v. Panama R. Co. Id. 99; McDonald v. Mallory, 77 N. Y. 547.

Actions for damages for causing death are creations of Statute. 2 Wait, Act. & Def. 471; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1272, note.

Our statutes giving a right of action in such cases have no extraterritorial effect, nor can our courts infer or presume that a similar statute exists in the State or country where the death was caused and occurred. The only presumption that can be indulged is that the common law exists there. Whitford v. Panama R. Co., Crowley v. Panama R. Co. and Beach v. Bay State Steamboat Co. supra; *McDonald v. 13 L. R. A.

Real party in interest must bring suit.

The immediate and in some respects the most important consequence of the rule that "every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest," is this: Whenever a thing in action is assignable, the assignee thereof must sue upon it in his own name. Pom. Remedies, § 126.

Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except that an executor or administrator, a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 449.

The former chancery practice is now adopted as to making parties. Wallace v. Eaton, 5 How. Pr. 90; Hollenbeck v. Van Valkenburgh, Id. 234; Voorhis v. Childs, 17 N. Y. 354.

An action is properly brought in the name by which the party is generally known. Cooper v. Burr, 45 Barb. 2.

Rule governing the survivability of things in action.

The rules of the common law still determine the survivability of actions for torts, except where the law has been specially modified or changed by statute. The whole scope and design of the statute is to extend a remedy already accrued, to the representatives of a deceased party, and provide for the survival only of an existing cause of action. Hegerich v. Keddle, 99 N. Y. 261, 262.

The qualities of assignability and survivability are tests of each other, and have been declared by the court of appeals to be convertible terms. Blake v. Griswold, 6 Cent. Rep. 771, 104 N. Y. 618, 616.

The assignability and survivability of things in action have frequently been held to be convertible terms, and perhaps furnish as clear and intelligible a rule to determine what injuries to property rights or interests survive, as it is possible to lay down. Hegerich v. Keddle, 99 N. Y. 258.

Mr. Harlow C. Curtiss, for respondent:

The Statutes of the State of Pennsylvania have created a cause of action in favor of the widow, as trustee for the benefit of herself and of the children of her deceased husband, whenever the death of said husband shall have been occasioned by unlawful violence or negligence, the proceeds to be distributed when recovered, as in cases of intestacy.

Huntington & B. T. R. Co. v. Decker, 84 Pa. 419.

A cause of action for wrongfully causing the death of a person, accruing and given by the statute of one State or country, may be enforced in any other State or country where jurisdiction of the parties can be obtained, provided that the laws of both countries correspond or substantially concur in giving a right of action for the injury complained of.

Co.* 12 West. Rep. 688, 118 Ind. 169; McDonald v. Mallory, 77 N. Y. 546; Debevoise v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 377; Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. 108 Pa. 250; Whitford v. Panama R. Co. 23 N. Y. 465; Beach v. Bay State S. B. Co. 30 Barb. 433; Crouley v. Panama R. Co. 30 Barb. 99.

Where a cause of action given by a foreign statute is transitory, and there is an existing statute in this State to the same general purport, an action to recover on such cause of action may be maintained in a court of this State.

Curanagh v. Ocean Steam Nav. Co. 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 391; Robinson v. Ocean Steam Nav. Co. 2 L. R. A. 636, 112 N. Y. 321, 16 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 255; The Harrisburg v. Rickards, 119 U. S. 199, 30 L. ed. 358; McDonald v. Mallory, 77 N. Y. 546; Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. 84 N. Y. 48.

Comity will enforce rights not in their nature local and not contrary to the policy of the government of the tribunal, no matter where arising, and without regard to whether they are of common-law or statutory origin.

Usher v. West Jersey R. Co. 4 L. R. A. 261, 126 Pa. 206; Patton v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 96 Pa. 169; Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. 108 Pa. 250.

Wherever by either the common law or the statute law of a State, a right of action has become fixed, and a legal liability incurred, that liability may be enforced, and the right of action pursued in any court which has jurisdiction of such matters, and can obtain jurisdiction of the parties.

Dennick v. New Jersey Cent. R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439.

The cause of action arose where the tort was committed which caused the death. The decisions of the Pennsylvania courts and the provisions of the Pennsylvania statutes are the laws governing this cause of action, to enforce the remedy given by the Pennsylvania statute.

Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 236; Jessup v. Carr, 13 L. R. A.

negie, 80 N. Y. 440; Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. 2 L. R. A. 636, 112 N. Y. 321; Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. supra; Vandewater v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 27 Barb. 244; Curanagh v. Ocean Steam Nav. Co. supra.

The statutes of the States of New York and Pennsylvania in regard to such actions are certainly of similar import and character, and the similarity is such as to authorize the conclusion that they are founded upon the same principles and possess the same general attributes and purpose and aim.

Books v. Danville Borough, 95 Pa. 153; Hege-rich v. Kedde, 99 N. Y. 267; Dickins v. New York Cent. R. Co. 23 N. Y. 158; Yertore v. Winwall, 16 How. Pr. 8.

Absence, in the foreign Statute of Limitation, as to amount of damages recoverable for death caused by negligence is not a dissimilarity.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from an interlocutory judgment overruling a demurrer and determining that the complaint assailed stated a good cause of action. That pleading alleged that the plaintiff was and is a resident of this State, and the defendant a corporation created and existing under our laws. The contest thus is between a resident individual and a domestic corporation. The latter owned and operated a line of railroad extending beyond our boundaries into the adjoining State of Pennsylvania, and the complaint alleged that in that State the plaintiff's husband was killed by the negligence of the defendant Company. The complaint further averred that the statutes of that State gave a right of action for the injury sustained by the widow and children; that the remedy could be enforced in the name of the former as plaintiff, but for her own benefit and that of the children; and that such Statute was of similar import to that existing in our own jurisdiction. Judgment was thereupon demanded for damages in the sum of $20,000. The demurrer interposed raised two objections: first, that the statutes of the two States were not similar, but different; and second, that the action could not be maintained here in the name of the widow, but only in that of an executor or administrator of the deceased; and the final result sought to be established was that the widow could not maintain an action in this State because that is contrary to our Statute, and that the administratrix could not because that is contrary to the Pennsylvania Statute; and so there is no remedy whatever in our jurisdiction.

Certain propositions essential to the inquiry before us have been explicitly determined in McDonald v. Mallory, 77 N. Y. 546, and need no other citation for their support. That case held that the liability of a person for his acts, whether wrongful or negligent, depends in general upon the law of the place in which the acts were committed; that actions for injuries to the person in another State are sustained here without proof of the lex loci, because they are permitted by the common law which is presumed to exist in the foreign State; that such presumption does not arise where the right of action depends upon a statute which confers it; and that in such case the action can only be maintained here by proof that the statutes of the State in which the injury occurred give the right of action, and are similar to our own. Upon the question of similarity we have also held that the two statutes need not be identical in their terms, or precisely alike, but it is enough if they are of similar import and character, founded upon the same principle, and possessing the same general attributes. Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. 84 N. Y. 58. It is quite evident that the two Statutes are of similar import. They are founded upon the same principle, are aimed at the same evil, construct the same sort or kind of action, and give it for the benefit of the same class of individuals. In both the utter failure of redress at common law where the injury ended in death was the injustice for which a remedy was enacted; and in both the new action was given for the benefit of those who had suffered an injury as the consequence of the wrong. This fundamental agreement in the main and substantial characteristics of the two Statutes is not affected by the differences of detail which the demurrer points out. The first is that by the lex loci the proper person to bring this action, and the only person who can maintain it, is the widow; while by our law the right of action is given to the executor or administrator. But it is given to the latter not in his broad representative character, but solely as trustee, in a case like the present, for the widow and children. Hegerich v. Keddle, 99 N. Y. 267. It is not a right which survives to the personal representatives, but a right created anew. The real parties in interest,—those whose injury is redressed, whose right is vindicated, to whom all damages go,—are one and the same in both forums. If the formal parties are different, the substantial and real parties are identical, and the difference in the trustee appointed by the law to represent their right is not such a difference as to bar our tribunals from their jurisdiction, or make the two Statutes dissimilar under the rule.

It is claimed, however, that, even in that event, the right of action accruing in the place of the transaction can only be enforced in our jurisdiction under our remedial forms, and so should have been brought by the plaintiff, not as widow, but as administratrix, to which office she had been appointed in this State. But it must not be forgotten that the cause of action sued upon is the cause of action given by the lex loci, and vindicated here and in our tribunals upon principles of comity. Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. 84 N. Y. 58, supra. That cause of action is given to the widow in her own right and as trustee for the children, and we open our courts to enforce it in favor of the party who has it, and not to establish a cause of action under our Statute which never in fact arose. We refer to the lex fori, and measure it by and compare it with the lex loci, I think, for two reasons,—one, that the party defendant may not be subjected to different and varying responsibilities; and the other, that we may know that we are not lending our tribunals to enforce a right which we do not recognize, and which is against our own public policy; and we do not refer to our law as creating the cause of action which we enforce. It is the cause of action created and arising in Pennsylvania which our tribunals vindicate upon principles of comity; and, therefore, must be prosecuted here in the name of the party to whom alone belongs the right of action; and that rule the courts of Pennsylvania enforce where the cause of action arises here, by permitting it to be brought by the executor or administrator to whom by our law the right is given, although not by their own. Usher v. West Jersey R. Co. 126 Pa. 207, 4 L. R. A. 261.

But the second difference relied on is that in Pennsylvania there is no restriction upon the amount of damages which may be recovered, while in our State they cannot exceed $5,000. That restriction pertains to the remedy, rather than the right. Dennick v. West Jersey Cent. R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439. It is a limitation upon the discretion of the jury in fixing the amount of damages, but not upon the right of action, or its inherent elements and character. The restriction indicates our public policy as to the extent of the remedy, and the plaintiff who chooses to avail herself of our remedial procedure must submit to our remedial limitations, and be content with a judgment beyond which our courts cannot go. They cannot exceed it in a case arising here, and no principle of comity requires them to enlarge the remedy which the plaintiff voluntarily seeks. There may be—there very possibly is—an exception to that rule, resting upon its own peculiar reasons, in a case where the defendant is not, as here, a domestic corporation, formed under our law, and so entitled to the benefit of our remedial limitations, but is a corporation of the State within whose jurisdiction the cause of action arose, and by whose law no restriction upon the amount of damages is permitted or enacted. We do not decide that question; but the same reasoning which would expose such a corporation to the law of its own jurisdiction would serve equally to justify the right of the domestic corporation to be protected by the remedial limitations of its jurisdiction. The difference between the two Statutes, therefore, does not strictly affect the rule of damages, but rather the extent of damages; and that extent, as limited or unlimited, does not enter into any definition of the right enforced, or the cause of action permitted to be prosecuted; and so the causes of action in the two forums are not thereby made dissimilar.

These views lead to an affirmance of the interlocutory judgment. That judgment should be affirmed, with costs, but with leave to the defendant to withdraw the demurrer and plead anew within twenty days after service of a copy of the judgment entered upon filing the remititur, and upon payment of the costs of the action from the interposition of the demurrer to that date.

All concur.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

John L. MACDONALD, Assignee of J. H. Mahler Co., Insolvent, Rept.,

v.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK of Corunna, Mich., Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

Our State Insolvent Law is effectual as to nonresidents of the State, so far as to control the disposition of property within our jurisdiction. A preferential conveyance of property here situate, by contract made here, may be avoided under that law, notwithstanding the nonresidence of the creditor preferred.

(July 28, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County setting aside a transfer to it by the J. H. Mahler Company of property as security for a debt. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. A. Sperry and Lewis L. Wheelock, for appellant:

Our Insolvent Laws cannot be made applicable to a contract made between a citizen of this State and a citizen of another State.

Wendell v. Lebon, 30 Minn. 284; Gilman v. Lockwood, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 409, 18 L. ed. 432; Donnelly v. Corbett, 7 N. Y. 500; Brighton Market Bank v. Merick, 11 Mich. 405; Anderson v. Wheeler, 25 Conn. 603; Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 213, 6 L. ed. 606.

Mr. J. L. McDonald, for respondent:

The law of the place where the contract is made governs the rights and liabilities of the parties.

Burchard v. Dunbar, 82 Ill. 450, 25 Am. Rep. 334; Brown v. American F. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 516; Central Trust Co. v. Burton, 74 Wis. 329; Addison, Cont. 4th ed. § 241, note 1.

The contract in controversy was executed in this State, and in this city.

Our Insolvent Law is constitutional, and it makes void preferences made by insolvent debtors, as was done in the case at bar.

Weston v. Loyhed, 30 Minn. 221.

Where the point at issue in any case was analogous to the one at bar, it supports our contention here, and we have not found any that hold to the contrary.

In Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529, State Insolvent Laws were adjudged invalid as to pre existing contracts.

Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 213, 6 L. ed. 606, held that such laws were not unconstitutional as respects subsequent contracts between persons of the same State, but that a discharge under them did not affect nonresident creditors.

This result was reached as said in Von Glahn v. Varrenne, 1 Dill. 515, upon the ground, largely, if not wholly, that every contract made in the State has relation to the existing law of the State, which, so to speak, becomes part of the contract, and since the Insolvent Law declares a right on the part of the debtor to be discharged from contracts thereafter made, on certain terms, the exercise of such right cannot be said to impair the obligation of the contract.

As against citizens of other States, as well as those of the State where the assignment is made, an assignment valid by the laws of the State in which it is made is valid everywhere.

were made such that, by force of the Insolvent Law, it was avoided by the insolvency proceedings, as an unlawful preference, unless that result is affected by the fact that the defendant, thus preferred, was a nonresident of the State. The contract was made in this State, and the property in question was, and still remains, here. The defendant (appellant) disclaims making any attack upon the validity of the law, or of the assignment; but relies upon the proposition that, by reason merely of its nonresidence, the Insolvent Law had no effect to avoid its contract. This position of the defendant cannot be sustained. The contract in question, made in this State concerning property here, and to be executed here, was subject to the law under which it was made. Its legal effect in no respect depended upon the residence of the parties. The law under which it was made declared that, under certain specified conditions (which are found to have existed), such a contract should be void, legally ineffectual as a transfer of the property. The legal effect of invalidity followed from the conditions specified in the law, and which the parties must be deemed to have had in contemplation. That law makes no exception in favor of nonresidents entering into such contracts here. The property is still here, subject to our jurisdiction. As to that property, the court is exercising its jurisdiction in the enforcement of the law under which the contract was made. This enforcement of the law, by the legal appropriation of the property within our jurisdiction to the payment of the debts of the insolvent, does not involve the giving of an extraterritorial effect to the Statute.

The appellant relies in support of its contention upon Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 213, 6 L. ed. 606, and other decisions of the same court, and upon what is said in Wendell v. Lebon, 30 Minn. 234. But a later decision of the Supreme Court of the United States removes whatever seeming support the language of prior decisions may have afforded for such a proposition as that here contended for. Denny v. Bennett, 128 U. S. 489, 32 L. ed. 491. That was an action for conversion prosecuted by the assignee of an insolvent debtor against the United States marshal, who, after the assignment under our Insolvent Law, and after the assignee had acquired actual or constructive possession of certain personal property embraced in the assignment, seized the same by virtue of an attachment issued out of the circuit court of the United States in an action against the insolvent by nonresidents of this State. The plaintiff recovered judgment in this court, which was affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States. That court stated the principal question to be decided as being whether our Insolvent Law was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, so far as it affects citizens of other States. The argument of the plaintiff in error was to the point (aside from that based on the doctrine of the inviolability of contracts) that such a statute can have no extraterritorial operation, and cannot, therefore, be binding on creditors living in a different State from that of the debtor, and of the situs of his property; and that is the point of the appellant's argument in this case. The court, referring to its former decisions, including Ogden v. Saunders, said: "The proposition lying at the foundation of all these decisions is that a statute of a State, being without force in any other State, cannot discharge a debtor from a debt held by a citizen of such other State. . . . The substance of the restrictive principle goes no further than to prohibit, or to make invalid, the discharge of a debt held by a citizen of another State than that where the court is sitting, who does not appear and take part or is not otherwise brought within the jurisdiction of the court granting the discharge. In other words, whatever the court before whom such proceedings are had may do with regard to the disposition of the property of the debtor, it has no power to release him from the obligation of a contract which he owes to a resident of another State who is not personally subjected to the jurisdiction of the court. Anyone who will take the trouble to examine all these cases will perceive that the objection to the extraterritorial operation of a State Insolvent Law is that it cannot, like the Bankrupt Law passed by Congress under its constitutional grant of power, release all debtors from the obligation of the debt. The authority to deal with the property of the debtor within the State, so far as it does not impair the obligation of contracts, is conceded; but the power to release him, which is one of the usual elements of all Bankrupt Laws, does not belong to the Legislature, where the creditor is not within the control of the court. The Minnesota Statute makes no provision for any such release. The creditor who became such after the Statute was passed cannot complain that the obligation of his contract is impaired because the law was a part of the contract at the time he made it. . . ."

This decision recognizes our Insolvent Law as being effectual as to nonresidents as well as to residents of the State, so far as it controls the disposition of property within our jurisdiction. The decision in Wendell v. Lebon is to the same effect, and is an authority opposed to the contention of the appellant here.

Judgment affirmed.

Upon the trial of an action for malicious prosecution the plaintiff, when at-

Head note by COLLINS, J.

NOTE.—Malicious prosecution; what must be shown.

To sustain an action on the case for a malicious prosecution, four points must concur, the absence of either of which will be fatal to the right of the plaintiff to recover: (1) falsehood in the demand; (2) want of probable cause; (3) malice in the defendant; (4) damage to the plaintiff. 3 Bl. Com. (Chitty's ed.) *123, note 13.

This question of probable cause, or reasonable ground for suspicion, whether it arises in actions for malicious prosecution or false imprisonment, is one of law, unless the evidence out of which it arises is conflicting; in which event it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury what facts, if tempting to establish a want of probable cause, is not confined to proof of such facts as he can affirmatively show were actually known to defendant, but may also prove the existence of such open and notorious facts as would or should have been ascertained by the latter, had he, before instituting the proceedings, made such inquiry and investigation as anyone with honest motives, and not actuated by malice, would have made.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Jackson County overruling his motion for new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged malicious prosecution. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. L. F. Lammers and T. J. Knox for appellant.

Mr. J. G. Redding, for respondent:

If defendant did not himself believe that the act of plaintiff in taking the horse was larceny, in other words, if he did not believe the horse was stolen, he had, of course, no probable cause for making the complaint.

Wetmore v. Mellinger, 64 Iowa, 741.

Probable cause is a reasonable ground of suspicion supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the person accused is guilty of the offense with which he is charged.

2 Greenl. Ev. § 454; Gilbertson v. Fuller, 40 Minn. 413.

The prosecution of an innocent person without using reasonable care to ascertain the facts is certainly not justified.

Walker v. Camp, 63 Iowa, 627.

A person's belief in a charge made by him, when arising from his own negligence in examining the evidence within his reach, does not constitute probable cause for such charge.

Grinnell v. Stewart, 12 Abb. Pr. 220.

A groundless suspicion unwarranted by the conduct of the accused or by facts known to the accuser when the accusation is made, will not exempt the latter from liability to an innocent person for damages for causing his arrest.

Carl v. Ayers, 58 N. Y. 14.

Mere belief that the plaintiff was guilty is not probable cause for the prosecution if the prosecutor acted negligently or irrationally and upon suspicion not warranted by facts, or by appearances which would not lead a prudent man to suppose the plaintiff guilty.

Farnham v. Feeley, 56 N. Y. 451; Hamilton v. Smith, 39 Mich. 222; Spencer v. Anness, 33 N. J. L. 100.

There is no question as to the manner in which plaintiff went away with the horse and what he was doing with it when he was found by the officer, and surely there was no error in allowing these facts to go to the jury that the jury might pass upon the question as to whether defendant was negligent in not knowing of their existence.

Patterson v. Garlock, 39 Mich. 447.

Defendant acted maliciously in making the complaint against plaintiff. Malice may be inferred from want of probable cause.

Wertheim v. Altschuler, 12 Neb. 591; Carson v. Edgeworth, 43 Mich. 241.

Defendant was bound to have that horse back and he took the shortest, quickest and least expensive means to the end, to wit, have established, will constitute probable cause, and submit to them only the question as to such facts. Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 384.

Burden of proof.

In actions of this nature the onus probandi is always upon the plaintiff, and mere failure of the prosecution does not establish a want of probable cause; plaintiff having alleged malice, must show it. 30 N. Y. Langitt, 63 Pa. 234; McKown v. Hunter, 30 N. Y. 625; Frowman v. Smith, Litt. Sel. Cas. 7; Thaule v. Krekeler, 81 N. Y. 428; Morton v. Young, 55 Me. 24, 92 Am. Dec. 565; Boyd v. Cross, 35 Md. 194; Besson v. Southard, 10 N. Y. 236; Israel v. Brooks, 23 Ill. 575; Purcell v. Macnamara, 9 East. 361; Flickinger v. Wagner, 46 Md. 581; Levy v. Brannan, 39 Cal. 485; Sappington v. Watson, 50 Mo. 83.

Malice must be shown.

Evidence that no previous demand was ever made for a debt before instituting a prosecution therefor in which the debtor was arrested, is admissible to show malice in instituting the prosecution. Tucker v. Wilkins, 105 N. C. 272.

The existence of malice is always a question exclusively for the jury. It must be found by them, or the action cannot be sustained. Hence it must always be submitted to them to find whether it existed. The court has no right to find it, nor to instruct the jury that they may return a verdict for the plaintiff without it. Even the inference of malice, from the want of probable cause, is one which the jury alone can draw. Wheeler v. Nesbitt, 65 U. S. 24 How. 545, 16 L. ed. 765; Newell v. Downs, 8 Blackf. 523; Johnson v. Chambers, 32 N. 13 L. R. A.

C. 287; Van Voorhees v. Leonard, 1 Thomp. & C. 148; Schofield v. Ferrers, 47 Pa. 194.

Slight evidence of malice was held insufficient in Mitchinson v. Cross, 58 Ill. 266; and sufficient in Williams v. Vanmeter, 8 Mo. 339; Ganea v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 51 Cal. 140; Davie v. Wisner, 72 Ill. 262; Palmer v. Richardson, 70 Ill. 544; Stewart v. Cole, 46 Ala. 646; McFarland v. Washburn, 14 Ill. App. 369; Sutton v. Anderson, 103 Pa. 151; Thaule v. Krekeler, 81 N. Y. 428; Thompson v. Lumley, 50 How. Pr. 105; Ames v. Snider, 69 Ill. 378; Wilkinson v. Arnold, 11 Ind. 45; Good v. French, 115 Mass. 201; Heyne v. Blair, 62 N. Y. 19; Calef v. Thomas, 81 Ill. 478; McCormick v. Sisson, 7 Cow. 715; Boyd v. Cross, 35 Md. 194.

The existence of a want of probable cause is essential to every suit for a malicious prosecution. Both that and malice must concur. Malice may be inferred by the jury from want of probable cause, but the want of that cannot be inferred from any degree of even express malice. Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 493; Foshay v. Ferguson, 2 Denio, 617; Murray v. Long, 1 Wend. 140; Wood v. Weir, 5 B. Mon. 544.

What amounts to probable cause is a question of law in a very important sense. In the celebrated case of Sutton v. Johnstone, supra, the rule was thus laid down: "The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and of fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show it probable are true, and existed, is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them to be true, they amount to a probable cause is a question of law." This is the doctrine generally adopted. McCormick v. Sisson, 7 Cow. 715; Besson v. Southard, 10 N. Y. 236. See notes to Pope v. Pollock (Ohio) 4 L. R. A. 255; Antcliff v. June (Mich.) 10 L. R. A. 621.

him arrested and have the officer bring the horse at the same time. This was malice, pure, clean-cut malice.

Ross v. Langworthy, 13 Neb. 492.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action for malicious prosecution, and under the issues as presented by the pleadings, defendant having admitted a criminal prosecution by him which terminated in plaintiff's acquittal or discharge, it was incumbent upon the latter to show that the prosecution was without probable cause, and originated in defendant's malice. The proof of this want of probable cause, although a negative proposition, was on the plaintiff, as is always the case with such issues. He had been prosecuted for the crime of the larceny of a horse, which he had taken from defendant's possession under a claim of title. To establish want of probable cause on defendant's part, the plaintiff had shown that about noon of a certain day he proceeded to defendant's barn in a small village, where he was well known, took the animal out, rode it through the public streets, passing and speaking with several acquaintances, and from thence to his farm, about fourteen miles distant. The defendant knew where he resided, and had been personally acquainted with him for years. Defendant immediately made complaint to a justice of the peace, charging a larceny of the horse, procured a warrant, placed it in the hands of a deputy-sheriff, and before night the deputy had reached the farm, arrested the plaintiff, and with him and the horse was on his return to the village. The officer was one of plaintiff's witnesses, and, notwithstanding defendant's objection, was permitted to testify that he found the plaintiff openly at work in his field, hauling flax upon a wagon drawn by a pair of horses, that in dispute being one. The defendant contends that in admitting this testimony the trial court erred, greatly to his prejudice, because, as he insists, his acts and conduct were to be weighed in view of what appeared to him when he made the complaint, and not in the light of facts appearing subsequently,—citing Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 116. Even if this evidence was inadmissible, its reception was error without prejudice, for all that it tended to prove was a fact already established by the testimony, and which was not controverted on the trial, viz., that the taking and appropriation of the horse by the plaintiff was open and public, without stealth or concealment. But in our opinion the evidence was properly admitted, conceding the rule to be, as it doubtless is, that, in determining whether defendant acted without probable cause, his conduct is to be weighed in view of what appeared to him when he made the complaint, and not in the light of subsequently appearing facts, yet, when establishing want of probable cause, the plaintiff is not confined to the proof of such facts as he can affirmatively show were actually known to the defendant, but may also prove the existence of such open and notorious facts as the defendant would or should have ascertained had he, before instituting the proceedings, made such inquiry and investigation as any man with honest motives, and not actuated by malice, would have made. Now, the importance of the officer's testimony consisted, not in the particular fact that the plaintiff was hauling flax with the animal, but in the general fact that he was keeping and using it openly, and without any attempt at concealment. While the particular time of which the sheriff testified was subsequent to the making of the complaint by defendant, yet the manner and conduct of the plaintiff at that time constituted, under all the circumstances, a legal basis for the inference that it was but a continuation of the same open and unconcealed manner and course of conduct which he had previously pursued, and which the defendant should and would have ascertained had he made the investigation which he ought to have made, instead of shutting his eyes to facts easily to be discovered. The remaining assignments of error need no special consideration.

Order affirmed.

The rule says: "Coupling by hand is strictly prohibited. Use for guiding the link, a stick or pin."

The testimony showed without contradiction that a stick could not be used in setting a pin, and that even where a stick is used in guiding the link that it is necessary for the brakeman to get between the ends of the cars. The ostensible object of the rule is to save the hands of the men from being caught between the draw-bars, and where as in this case the injury results from the man's body being caught between the cars the rule is immaterial.

Whether the use of an engine for switching with a draw-bar so low that it would pass under the draw-bar on a car is negligence or not is a question for the jury.

Lawless v. Connecticut River R. Co. 136 Mass. 1, 18 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 96.

Corliss, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The circumstances under which plaintiff was injured we think warranted the jury in finding that the defendant's negligence was one of the proximate causes of the damage which the plaintiff suffered. He was an employé of the defendant, acting as switchman. The first important fact in the history of the accident was the stepping of the plaintiff upon the foot-board of a switch-engine to ride down upon it to a flat-car standing upon a curved switch, for the purpose of aiding in coupling the engine to the car in order to transfer it to another track. The car did not belong to defendant, but was owned by the Union Tank-Line Company. This fact is of no moment, however, as the defendant was bound to inspect this foreign car the same as one of its own cars. Goodrich v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 750, 116 N. Y. 398; Gottlieb v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 100 N. Y. 462, 1 Cent. Rep. 728; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Kernan, 78 Tex. 294, 9 L. R. A. 703; Bomar v. Louisiana, N. & S. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 983; Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L.

R. Co. 30 Minn. 231; O'Neil v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 9 Fed. Rep. 337; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Barber, 44 Kan. 612, 44 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 523; Guttridge v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 94 Mo. 468, 18 West. Rep. 644.

It was defendant's duty to make this inspection before incorporating the car into one of its trains. More than sufficient time had elapsed since receiving the car to enable it to perform this duty, as the accident occurred in Jamestown, in this State, a considerable distance beyond the point where the car must have first come into its possession. It had been long enough in its custody to be carried to its destination and unloaded, as it was standing empty upon the switch at the time plaintiff was injured. There is no proof that the car was ever inspected. The defect was of such a nature that the exercise of reasonable care in making an inspection must have disclosed the defect. Therefore, whether the car was or was not inspected, there was sufficient to justify a verdict that the defendant had been careless in the discharge of its duty to use reasonable care to furnish its employes with safe appliances of every kind, and keep them in safe condition. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755. This is one of the master's duties, and the servant upon whom the master devolves its performance represents the master in that respect, and is not in the discharge thereof a fellow servant of the employé injured. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Herbert, International & G. N. R. Co. v. Kernan, and Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. supra; Condon v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 78 Mo. 567; Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 107 N. Y. 374, 10 Cent. Rep. 238; Ell v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (N. Dak.) 48 N. W. Rep. 222.

When plaintiff stepped upon the foot-board of the engine, it appears to have been a short distance from the car, and was backing down towards it slowly. Plaintiff stood upon that portion of the foot-board which was on the short side of the curve of the switch. On the other side, standing also on the foot-board, was the foreman of the switching crew. He guided the link into the opening, while plaintiff reached over to the flat-car to pick up a pin lying there, for the purpose of using this pin to complete the coupling. While in this position he was squeezed between the locomotive and the car, and injured, because, as the evidence demonstrated, there was too little space between them, owing to the undue shortness of the draw-bars both of the car and of the engine. He rests his right to indemnity upon this conduct of defendant in permitting a car with so short a draw-bar to be placed upon its track for use, and in augmenting the danger by bringing it into connection with an engine whose draw-bar was likewise, as appears from some of the evidence, much shorter than the draw-bars in ordinary use. Each of these draw-bars was, according to some of the evidence, so much shorter than those in common use that we are inclined to the view that the jury were justified in holding the defendant negligent on this account. Nor can it be said that the 13 L. R. A.

risk attending the use of such short draw-bars—particularly their use in connection with each other—was one of the ordinary risks of the employment, in the usual sense of that phrase. The evidence discloses that they were so short that when their ends came together there was only about ten inches between the end of the car and of the locomotive, whereas the usual space, according to the evidence, is from about twenty-four to thirty inches. To so diminish this usual standing room that an employé is almost sure to be caught when in the discharge of his duty between a heavy standing car and an engine whose momentum, because of its weight, is tremendous, however slow its speed, would seem to be some evidence of negligence. If the space is too narrow for the body, serious injury is almost inevitable in case the servant is caught. There is respectable authority for the proposition that these facts warrant a finding of negligence. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Fredericks, 71 Ill. 294; Greenleaf v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 29 Iowa, 14; Belair v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 43 Iowa, 662; Crutchfield v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 78 N. C. 800; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Callbreath, 66 Tex. 526.

Assuming that the jury were justified in finding the defendant guilty of negligence, it remains to be considered whether the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The question arises not under ordinary circumstances. The defendant appears expressly to have imposed upon plaintiff duties in addition to those which the law would imply from an ordinary contract of employment of a switchman. At the time the plaintiff entered into the service of the defendant, the latter presented to plaintiff for signature certain regulations, and plaintiff, in answer to the question printed thereon, "Have you read and do you understand the following extract from the book of rules of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company?" replied in his own handwriting: "I have read and understand them." So far as they are here material, these rules are as follows: "Great care must be exercised by all persons when coupling cars. Inasmuch as the coupling apparatus of cars and engines cannot be uniform in style, size, or strength, and is liable to be broken, and as from various causes it is dangerous to expose between the same the hands, arms, or persons of those engaged in coupling, all employes are enjoined before coupling cars or engines to examine so as to know the kind and condition of the draw-heads, draw-bars, links, and coupling apparatus, and are prohibited from placing in the train any car with a defective coupling until they have first reported its defective condition to the yard-master or conductor. Sufficient time is allowed, and may be taken by employes, in all cases to make the examination required." Our first concern is to ascertain the true scope of this regulation. It will hardly be claimed that it was the purpose of defendant to impose upon the plaintiff all the duties of a car inspector, so far as the proper discharge of such duties were essential to the protection of the plaintiff. Such an interpretation would in effect exempt the defendant from liability for its own negligence, however gross. The same facts which would convict the defendant of carelessness would, under such a view of the rule, likewise convict the plaintiff of contributory negligence in every instance. The employer would thus save itself from liability, although negligent in the discharge of the duties of a master. It is an elementary rule of construction that the courts shrink from so interpreting the language employed by a common carrier as to exempt it from the consequences of its own negligence. No such interpretation will be adopted, unless by the use of the word "negligence," or by other explicit language, the court is driven to such view. Then the provision so exempting from negligence is often struck down as opposed to public policy. (Whether the doctrine relates to an employé as well as to the public it is not necessary to decide.) It would be unreasonable to give the rule this construction. It would not be practicable for one employed in coupling cars to devote the same amount of time to and exercise the same degree of care in the inspection of the apparatus employed in the coupling of cars, and of such parts of the car as are immediately connected therewith, as a car inspector must. To exempt the Company from liability, something more than a short examination must be made by the car inspector. There may be obscure defects which the exercise of due care renders it imperative he should discover, and for his failure to discover and remedy which the Company would be responsible; and yet for the master to insist that a trainman or a switchman should be held to the obligation of making such an investigation as would result in their disclosure would seriously cripple the power of the Company to handle and ship the freight intrusted to it. It would be an unreasonable and impracticable requirement that all the dangers to an employé which a proper car inspection should bring to light should be discovered every time two cars are coupled together, or one car is coupled to a locomotive. It would be exacting of the trainman or the switchman more onerous duties than those imposed upon the expert car inspector. The company would require the less expert servant to discover at his peril a defect which the more expert employé had failed to detect. With less skill in such matters, and less time to investigate, it would be a gross wrong to allow the master to dictate to his servant the condition that he would have no redress for injury occasioned by the master's carelessness because he, the servant, had not complied with a regulation which it would be impossible for him to observe. But it is within the domain of possibility for the employé to obey this rule, when reasonably construed. There are defects which will appear when extra care is used. We think the reasonable construction of this rule is that more than ordinary care must be exercised by the employé; that he may not rely implicitly upon the uniform discharge by the master, through his servants, of the duty of using ordinary care in furnishing proper and safe appliances and machinery, and in keeping them in repair, and that he must in some measure be on his guard against injury from the occasional negligence of those who are charged with the performance of the master's duties to his employés. No matter what degree of care is exercised in the selection of the servants by whom these master's duties are to be discharged, negligence will sometimes characterize their conduct. Said the court in Smith v. Potter, 46 Mich. 258: "When a brakeman handles any car, he knows that there is at least a possibility that he may be injured unless he examines it carefully. It may not always be legal negligence in him to rely with some assurance on the accuracy of the persons who should have examined it before it comes to him. But he is bound to know that omissions of such care are possible, and are dangerous if they occur. And he is also bound to know, as all men know, that it is impossible for employés to completely guard against it."

It would be contrary to sound policy to suffer the master to exonerate himself from liability in all cases, even by agreement with the servant. But there are defects resulting from the careless performance of the master's duties, so patent that it is very reasonable for the master to charge an employé with the duty of discovering such defects at his peril. Even in the absence of any regulation, the servant is often held accountable for his failure to guard against such defects. In this case the regulation but augmented this obligation. It called the servant's attention to the fact that the very difficulty which occasioned the injury sometimes existed. It notified him that the coupling apparatus of cars and engines were not uniform in size; this embraces differences in length. It apprised him of the dangers of the work; enjoined upon him the duty of examining so as to know the kind and condition of the draw-heads, draw-bars, links, and coupling apparatus; prohibited him from placing in the train any car with a defective coupling; and, that the rule might be faithfully obeyed by the servant, it explicitly granted to him ample time to observe its behests. The language is unmistakable: "Sufficient time is allowed, and may be taken by employés in all cases, to make the examination required." It was insisted at the bar of this court that this rule was not ordained in good faith; that it was never expected that an employé would observe it; and that any servant who took sufficient time to follow and obey its requirements must inevitably look for discharge.

On what principle this court is asked to attribute a Machiavellian policy to the defendant, we are at a loss to determine; and, should we find that only grasping self-interest without one touch of humanity was the motive for this rule, still we must adjudge that its grant of sufficient time to make the examination enjoined was written in good faith, when the rule receives, as we believe it was the purpose of the defendant that it should receive, a reasonable construction. In the light of such an interpretation of it, it is obvious that the use of this time by the servant will not seriously discommode the master or delay the shipment of its freight. And, on the other hand, the master has a deep interest in the safety of the servant; for, no matter how perfect the former's defense to a claim for damage, the making of that defense is always attended with expense. Unadulterated selfishness would prompt the adoption of a regulation, the observance of which would save such expense, while not materially reducing the servant's efficiency or affecting the volume of work he can perform. It is without force to assert that the master would discharge an employé who would take the necessary time to make the required examination. Should he discharge the servant before his term of employment had expired, for no other reason, the law would give the servant redress; and, if no time of employment is prescribed, it is the master's legal right, as it is the legal right of the employé, to terminate the relation at any time, without any excuse at all, or for any reason, however unjustifiable in ethics. We would not, however, be understood as asserting that the master could insist upon a rule when the master's conduct in the discharge of its employés, or in any other manner, indicated a purpose not to accord to the latter the necessary time without which the master's command to the exercise of a higher degree of care could not be obeyed. Its actions must not belie its words. This record discloses no such condition of affairs. Neither the plaintiff nor any other employé of the defendant has been discharged, or threatened with discharge, because he sought in good faith to comply with this regulation, and took the necessary time for that purpose. Nor are we confronted with the difficult question as to the rights of the plaintiff, had someone in superior authority commanded a disregard of the rule; neither was the press of business such that a full observance of its behests was not practicable. There was no exigency. The plaintiff, with the defects in full view,—one immediately beneath his gaze, and one before his eyes only a short distance away,—moved slowly towards his fate, oblivious of danger, because, as is conceded, he took no precautions to discover an open peril. He seeks to excuse his omission to examine the length of the draw-bar by his statement, upon which the verdict of the jury has set the seal of truth, that he was engaged in looking for a pin with which to make the coupling. The pin could have been found as well after he had observed the defendant's rule, that he must examine to ascertain whether there was any danger from the size of the draw-bars of the engine and of the car. The same argument would exonerate him from blame had the coupling apparatus and the dead-woods been entirely wanting. He testified that he knew every road had different cars, with different length draw-heads; that prior to the accident he did not notice the length of the draw-heads of the car and of the engine; that, if he had known of the undue shortness of these draw-heads, he could have escaped injury, as there was plenty of time for him to have stepped down and out from the end of the foot-board 13 L. R. A.

upon the ground, so as to clear himself from the flat-car before he was hurt; and that he knew that, if two cars met upon a curve, the distance between them would be shorter on the inside than on the outside of the curve. It is clear that plaintiff made no effort to obey the rule requiring him to make an examination of the coupling apparatus. He does not pretend to have obeyed it. He disavows any such obedience. That an observance of its requests, giving it a reasonable interpretation, would have saved him from injury, cannot admit of doubt. The defects were patent: the difference between the combined lengths of these draw-bars and the combined lengths of those in ordinary use was fourteen to twenty inches. The ratio was about ten to thirty. One was directly beneath his gaze; the other was almost directly before his eyes. There was time for inspection while the engine was moving slowly backwards. Further time might have been taken, if necessary, under the rule. To fail to discover, under these circumstances, that these draw-bars were only about one-third the usual length, must be negligence, particularly in view of the express warning contained in the rule, the injunction to examine so as to know the kind and condition of the coupling apparatus, and the granting of sufficient time for that purpose. When warned of the danger generally, and afforded time to pause and examine whether it existed in the particular case, the servant may not, with thoughtless imprudence, rush headlong upon peril at the expense of his master.

Said the court in Karrer v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 76 Mich. 400, after quoting a regulation of the defendant very similar to the one in the case at bar: "It was plaintiff's duty to examine into the coupling arrangements of both cars before he attempted to couple them, and as they were only a rod apart at most before he started the train back, and as he says the defect was visible at once to anyone looking, one or two seconds would have furnished all the time needed to satisfy himself had he been acting under anyone else's orders; but, as he had personal direction of the engineer's movements and could move when he pleased, the case, as he presents it, was an aggravated one, of the grossest carelessness, for which he, and no one else, was responsible."

Said the court in Darracott v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 83 Va. 288: "At all events, the evidence shows that the dangerous condition of the coupling was obvious, and that the plaintiff, in violation of the rules of the company, voluntarily put himself in a position of danger, in consequence of which he was injured. Under these circumstances, in the eye of the law, he was the author of his own misfortune: that is to say his negligence, or what is the same thing, his failure to use reasonable and proper care and caution was the proximate cause of the injury complained of. The action is not therefore maintainable."

In Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson, 45 Mich. 212, there was no rule giving warning, enjoining examination and according sufficient time for that purpose; and yet it was held fatal to recovery that the plaintiff, a brakeman, had failed to notice that there were double dead-woods on the cars he was coupling, instead of a single dead-wood on each, it being contended that it was negligence for the defendant to receive and transport cars equipped with double dead-woods. Said Judge Cooley: "If, therefore, a switchman were to declare that he had attempted to couple the double dead-woods without noticing how they differed from the cars of defendant, the conclusion would be inevitable that he had gone heedlessly in the performance of a duty requiring great care, and that he had not allowed his eyes to inform him what was before him. The best notice is that which a man must of necessity see, and which cannot confuse or mislead him. He needs no printed placard to announce a precipice when he stands before it."

In a similar case, Hathaway v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 51 Mich. 253, the court said: "In this case the danger consisted in the brakeman being caught between the two dead-woods as they came together. The dead-woods were in plain sight. They were really the most prominent objects on the end of the cars. The plaintiff had a full opportunity of examining the one by which he stood some moments before the cars came together. Its size, shape, and the location of the draw-bar were before him. He had only to look at it to be informed of any peril surrounding it. The moving car, at a distance of twenty feet, with its dead-wood and draw-bar in plain view, slowly approached the one where the plaintiff was standing. It does not appear that there was any hurry about the business. How could the plaintiff have been better warned? Certainly he knew the car was coming, and could see the dead-woods and draw-bar thereon as well as if he had made the coupling a thousand times before. He could not fail to see it, if he looked at all." See also Kelley v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. (Wis.) 21 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 633; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Black, 88 Ill. 112; Brewer v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 56 Mich. 620; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rice, 51 Ark. 467, 4 L. R. A. 173.

In several of the cases referred to, the master had not, as in the case at bar, imposed upon the servant the duty of extra care, nor had he expressly granted to him sufficient time to enable him to examine the coupling apparatus before making the coupling. It must further be remembered that plaintiff was on the short side of the switch. He testified that he knew that the distance would be shorter on the inside than on the outside of the curve. But he seems to have paid no attention to this obvious law. Being upon the shorter side, it was all the more important for him to ascertain whether there would be sufficient room between the car and the engine for him to stand with safety on the foot-board in making the coupling. It does not seem to be strenuously insisted that a charge of negligence can be predicated upon the curve of the switch. There is no evidence of the degree of the curve, and there is eminent authority for the proposition that, unless the curve is abnormally sharp, the courts will not regard it as evidence of carelessness. Tuttle v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 122 U. S. 189, 30 L. ed. 1114. The language of the court in this case, both on this point and on the further point of contributory negligence, because the injured servant stood upon the inside of the curve in making the coupling, is very applicable here: "The perils in the present case arising from the sharpness of the curve were seen and known. They were not like the defects of unsafe machinery which the employer has neglected to repair, and which his employes have reason to suppose is in proper working condition. Everything was open and visible, and the deceased had only to use his senses and his faculties to avoid the dangers to which he was exposed. One of these dangers was that of the draw-bars passing each other when the cars were brought together. It was his duty to look out for this, and avoid it. The danger existed only on the inside of the curve, and this must have been known to him." On the question whether it was negligent to build a switch with so sharp a curve, the court observed: "We have carefully read the evidence presented by the bill of exceptions, and although it appears that the curve was a very sharp one at the place where the accident happened, yet we do not think that public policy requires the courts to lay down any rule of law to restrict a railroad company as to the curves it shall use in its freight depots and yards, where the safety of passengers and the public is not involved, much less that it should be left to the varying opinion of juries to determine such an engineering question." It is true that in the Tuttle Case there was no one standing on the foot-board on the outside of the curve, as in the case at bar; but, if the brakeman was bound in the Tuttle Case to know that it was dangerous to stand on the inside when there was no one on the outside, surely the plaintiff in this case was bound to know that his position was one of danger, although there was someone standing on the outside. The fact that another stood in one of the places of safety did not render the place occupied by plaintiff any less dangerous or obscure his sense of that danger. The other place of safety was outside of the space between the car and the engine, upon the ground. Perhaps he might not have found room with the foreman on the outside of the curve on the foot-board, but he might have gone ahead, and set the pin, and, if the jar of the collision had not been sufficient to cause the pin to fall down into its place, then, he could have inserted it in the aperture with his hands without the slightest danger, or, at least, he then would have plainly seen the danger of going between the engine and the car on the short side of the curve, and could have completed the coupling on the long side. The plaintiff has sustained severe, and perhaps permanent, injuries. His case appeals to our sympathy, and he may be a not unworthy object of charity, but justice will not seize his master's property to compensate him for the consequences of his own imprudence. There seems to be marked unanimity on the point that, where disobedience to or disregard of a reasonable rule or regulation of the master contributes to the injury, there can be no recovery. Sloan v. Georgia Pac. R. Co. (Ga.) 44 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 553; Cahill v. Hilton, 106 N. Y. 512, 9 Cent. Rep. 255; Karrer v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 76 Mich. 400; *San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Cas. 149.

Plaintiff may not ask us to speculate whether, by the exercise of due care, he would have discovered the peril, and avoided the danger, had he made the examination which the rules of the company required. We think an observance of this reasonable rule would have saved him from injury. If he had stopped and looked, and then failed to discover the peril that menaced him, possibly a different case might have been presented. But this is doubtful. The exercise of proper care must have revealed the danger. We hold that this record discloses the fact that plaintiff's own negligence contributed to his injury, and the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial must therefore be reversed, and a new trial granted.

A single question as to the admissibility of certain evidence remains to be considered. The wife of plaintiff was allowed, against the defendant's objection, to testify to exclamations of pain made by the plaintiff on waking up during the night. She said: "Well, he has more than once woke up,—more than once in the night,—groaning; and I asked him what was the matter." The record discloses nothing further on this point. It does not appear that she testified touching his answer to her inquiry as to what was the matter with him. We are very clearly of the opinion that this evidence was admissible, both on principle and under the great weight of the adjudications. There was no attempt to prove a narration by him of a past transaction. He was not stating that the night before he had suffered pain. He was making no communication whatever to her. It was only the involuntary expression of suffering. True, it might have been simulated, but that was a question for the jury. The evidence of the physician relating to the extent of his injuries must have rested in some degree upon statements of the plaintiff to him, and therefore upon what is more truly hearsay than exclamations of pain. The testimony of the medical expert may often be founded mainly upon such interested declarations of the patient, and yet its competency cannot be seriously questioned. On the other hand, the rule allowing the proof of the expression of present pain will rarely result in imposition upon juries or other triers of questions of fact. Other facts in the case will generally aid them in determining how much of real and how much of fictitious pain the expression of suffering shadows forth. We think the true rule is stated in Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Newell, 104 Ind. 264-269, 1 West. Rep. 890: "Where, however, it becomes important to illustrate the physical or mental condition of an individual, either at the time an injury is received, or from thence to the time of an inquiry as to its severity, effect, and nature, we think expressions or declarations of present existing pain or malady, whether made at the time the injury is received or subsequently to it, are admissible in evidence [citing many authorities]. Expressions of present existing pain, and of its locality, are exceptions to the general rule, which excludes hearsay evidence. They are admitted upon the ground of necessity, as being the only means of determining whether pain or suffering is endured by another. Whether feigned or not, is a question for the jury. Such declarations and expressions are competent, regardless of the person to whom they are made." See also cases cited in opinion, and State v. Geddicke, 43 N. J. L. 86; Eckles v. Bates, 26 Ala. 655; Yeatman v. Hart, 6 Humph. 374; Hagenlocher v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. 99 N. Y. 136.

Bringing and prosecuting an action to assignment for the benefit of creditors, is not such an election of remedies as will debar a creditor from sharing in a distribution of the assigned estate made pending such suit.

(March 20, 1891.)

APPEAL by Reuben O. Smith and the First National Bank of Towanda, Pennsylvania, from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirm-

NOTE.—Election of remedy.

The doctrine of election means that where two inconsistent rights are presented to the choice of a party, by a person who manifests a clear intention that he should not enjoy both, he must accept or 18 L. R. A.

reject one or the other; and so one cannot take a benefit under an instrument and then repudiate it. Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 33 L. ed. 686.

Separate remedies, one legal and the other equitable, are inconsistent and cannot be pursued, being against the policy of the law. One party will not ing a judgment of the Special Term for New York County denying their right to share in the distribution of the insolvent estate of Henry W. Perine. Reversed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

The appellants, being creditors of Henry W. Perine, an insolvent debtor, upon judgments against him, brought an action to set aside an assignment made by Perine for the benefit of his creditors, as fraudulent, in which they were eventually defeated. Before the action was commenced they had made proof of their claims before the assignee. The deed of assignment provided for certain preferences in payments from the assigned estate, but these appellants were not among the creditors preferred. The present action was brought on behalf of the creditors to compel the assignee to account and for a distribution of the assets in his hands. A reference was therein ordered to a referee to ascertain and to report the amount due each of the creditors who should come in under the order and seek the benefit of this action. Appellants appeared by counsel before the referee, but protesting and giving notice that they waived no rights or remedies theretofore exercised, or that might thereafter be insisted upon. At that time an appeal was pending to this court from the judgment in their action, which upheld the validity of the assignment, and objections were made by other creditors to the allowance by the referee of the appellants' claims, upon the ground that they were proceeding in hostility to the assignment in prosecuting their other action. The referee, however, allowed the claims, on the theory that by appearing and refusing to withdraw their claims there was an election to participate in the accounting. Upon the coming in of the referee's report the court, at special term, sustained the exceptions of the creditors to the allowance of the appellants' claims, on the ground stated, and the court at general term affirmed that decision. From the judgment of affirmance the appellants have appealed to this court.

Mr. Benjamin S. Harmon, for appellants:

The doctrine of election is not applicable in the premises.

The action brought by Reuben O. Smith to set aside the assignment herein was not in disregard of the assignment, but distinctly recognized its existence, while seeking, by judicial proceedings, to establish its invalidity.

be allowed to vex and harass another, with two different and inconsistent proceedings, but will be put to his election. Livingston v. Kane, 3 Johns. Ch. 224, 1 L. ed. 600; Butler v. Wehle, 6 Thomp. & C. 242, 4 Hun, 56.

If the plaintiff institute separate actions he cannot carry both to judgment and satisfaction; but may be compelled by order of the court, at any stage of the proceedings, to elect which he will further prosecute. Connihan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 272; Rogers v. Vosburgh, 4 Johns. Ch. 84, 1 L. ed. 772. See note to Terry v. Munger (N. Y.) 8 L. R. A. 216.

A party cannot, either in the course of litigation or in dealing in pais, occupy inconsistent positions. See note to Crossman v. Universal Rubber Co. (N. Y.) 13 L. R. A. 91.

See Woodward v. Harlow, 28 Vt. 338; Jewett v. Woodward, 1 Edw. Ch. 195, 6 L. ed. 103; Sternfeld v. Simonson, 44 Hun, 429.

The bringing of an action to set aside the assignment herein, either was, or was not, an election at the time, upon the part of appellants, such as to preclude them from ever after sharing thereunder in the assigned estate.

Fowler v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 4 L. R. A. 145, 118 N. Y. 450.

That it was not such an election at the time is conceded, and if not, then how can the mere pendency of the action, its nature remaining the same and no substantial benefit having been derived therefrom afterwards have that effect.

If any election became necessary at the time of the proceedings before the referee herein, then appellants elected to share under the assignment.

Creditors may elect to share even under a void assignment, the assignment as to them being, in such case, merely voidable.

Hone v. Henriquez, 18 Wend. 240.

This being so, it follows that merely asserting the invalidity of an assignment, or bringing an action to have its validity or invalidity judicially determined, will not preclude a creditor from sharing under the assignment when the question as to whether or not he will so share thereafter squarely presents itself.

Woodward v. Harlow, supra. See Swanson v. Tarkington, 7 Heisk. 612; Busby v. Finn, 1 Ohio St. 409; Maynard v. Maynard, 4 Edw. Ch. 711, 6 L. ed. 1029; Loney v. Bayly, 45 Md. 447; Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige, 615, 4 L. ed. 800.

The appellants elected to share under the assignment before the bringing of the action to set that assignment aside, and all subsequent acts upon the part of said appellants, inconsistent with said elections, are of no effect.

The proofs of claims never having been withdrawn from before the assignee, nor the dividend declared and paid by him refunded, there was a conclusive election upon the part of appellants to become parties to, and to ratify and accept, said assignment.

Rapalee v. Stewart, 27 N. Y. 310; Hone v. Henriquez, supra.

An election once made is made forever, and if appellants elected to claim under the assignment before the bringing of proceedings hostile to that assignment, then the latter proceedings were without effect, and the said election, with all its advantages or disadvantages, remains unchanged.

An action to set aside an insolvency discharge is not the proper remedy of a creditor seeking to enforce his right to the agreed percentage under a compromise agreement of creditors, but he should sue for the agreed percentage. Drake v. McQuade (N. H.) July 25, 1890.

A creditor who has availed himself in any mode of an assignment made by his debtor, or of the benefits to be derived therefrom, bars himself from taking any action to defeat the purpose of the assignment as a transfer of the property of the assignor. Thompson v. Fry, 51 Hun, 236.

A party should not enjoy an advantage under an instrument and at the same time insist on its invalidity. Babcock v. Dill, 43 Barb. 577; Haydock v. Coope, 58 N. Y. 68. See note to Fowler v. Bowery Sav. Bank (N. Y.) 4 L. R. A. 145.

Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 552; Moller v. Tuska, 87 N. Y. 166; Fowler v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 4 L. R. A. 145, 118 N. Y. 450; Kinney v. Kiernan, 49 N. Y. 164.

Mr. Humphrey McMaster, for respondents:

The appellants, by bringing and prosecuting to judgment their action to set aside the assignment as fraudulent, have elected to repudiate the assignment, and cannot share in the distribution under it.

Any decisive act of the party, with knowledge of his rights and of the facts, determines his election in the case of conflicting remedies.

Fowler v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 4 L. R. A. 145, 118 N. Y. 457; Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 552; Bunker Fertilizer Co. v. Cor, 9 Cent. Rep. 160, 106 N. Y. 555; Conrow v. Little, 5 L. R. A. 693, 115 N. Y. 387; Terry v. Munger, 8 L. R. A. 216, 121 N. Y. 161.

There would seem to be no good reason why a party should not be held as strictly to an election to accept or repudiate an assignment as in any other case calling for an election between inconsistent remedies.

See Sternfeld v. Simonson, 44 Hun, 490; Iaelin v. Henlein, 16 Abb. N. C. 78; New England Bank v. Lewis, 8 Pick. 113.

When a creditor by an attachment suit takes property from the assignee and sells it, on giving bonds to the assignee, such creditor is precluded from claiming any benefit under the assignment.

Valentine v. Decker, 48 Mo. 583; Geisse v. Beall, 8 Wis. 367.

Having made his election, he is bound by it. Moller v. Tuska, 87 N. Y. 166; Strong v. Strong, 3 Cent. Rep. 48, 103 N. Y. 69; Kennedy v. Thorp, 51 N. Y. 174; Joslin v. Cowee, 52 N. Y. 90; Iaelin v. Henlein, supra; Acer v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 397; Terry v. Munger, supra.

And if one makes an election between two inconsistent remedies, his failure to secure satisfaction, by means of the one he adopts, forms no legal reason for permitting him to resort to the other.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first of the two questions which were presented relates to the right of the appellants to come in and share in the distribution of the assigned estate, and the argument against their right is that, in bringing and prosecuting the action to set aside the assignment as fraudulent, they had thereby elected to repudiate the assignment. The doctrine of election, which has been thus far successfully invoked in support of the argument, does not seem to be applicable to such a case, and no authority is found warranting its application. The learned justices, who considered the question at the special and general terms, were influenced in their conclusions by the supposition that these appellants were pursuing two remedies upon their claims against their debtor Perine, and that, though direct authority might be wanting upon precisely such a case, yet analogy with adjudged cases, which hold that inconsistent remedies may not be availed of or concurrently pursued, required the application of the doctrine of election in this instance. If the definition of the legal position taken by these appellants was correctly assumed below, we should have nothing to say, and could not add to their opinion. But we cannot agree with them in their view of the situation of the parties. The elements required to make out a case of election were wanting. The doctrine of election, usually predicated of inconsistent remedies, consists in holding the party, to whom several courses were open for obtaining relief, to his first election, where subsequently he attempts to avail himself of some further and other remedy not consistent with, but contradictory of, his previous attitude and action upon his claim. The basis for the application of the doctrine is in the proposition that where there is, by law or by contract, a choice between two remedies, which proceed upon opposite and irreconcilable claims of right, the one taken must exclude and bar the prosecution of the other. An extended citation of authorities illustrating the principle, in cases of breaches of contract, or of a duty imposed by the law, would be unprofitable here, because of many recent decisions of this court, and because not needed in the present discussion. Where parties are under some contract, or the case is one of a deed or of a will, an election is deemed to be made where there has been an acceptance of a benefit, under the one or the other, and the party benefited will not be heard to raise the question of validity, nor to insist upon some other, but inconsistent, legal rights, however well founded. So it is conceivable that the rule may be so extended as to apply to the case where a creditor comes in under an assignment by his debtor for the benefit of creditors, in such way and with such attitude as should preclude him from thereafter assailing its validity. But how can the converse of the proposition be sustained? The assignment by an insolvent debtor is involuntary as to creditors in the application of his assets to their claims, and, it may be, unequal as well as unjust as to some, and it is of no effect if fraudulently made, within the meaning of the law. Shall the creditor, for endeavoring to set it aside on legal grounds, if unsuccessful, be held incapable of receiving his share of the debtor's assets? Such a rule could not be based upon equitable principles. It would come so near to lending aid and encouragement to attempts at fraudulent assignments as to render its adoption impossible. The assignment is not like a gift of property upon conditions open to the acceptance or rejection of the donee. It is a payment by the assignor of his debts after his own plan. The deed of assignment is in no sense a contract between the debtor and his creditors, and it does not depend for its validity in law upon their assent. It is a means or mode which the Statute permits to be adopted by an insolvent debtor for the distribution of his estate among his creditors, and so long as he has acted without fraud, in fact or in law, and has complied with the prescriptions of the Act, his conveyance to an assignee, for the purposes stated therein, will stand and be effective. If the distribution is to be made unequally among the creditors, and some are preferred to others in payment, the assignment is not viewed by the courts with any favor, and is only tolerated and upheld when all conditions are met for the prevention of fraud. Nichols v. McEwen, 17 N. Y. 22.

The debtor's proceeding sets at naught whatever elements of superiority the non-preferred creditor's claim may possess, as it may nullify the results of any diligent effort on his part to secure his debt. It compels him to submit to inequality in payment, and to take his pro rata share of the estate, unless he discovers and can establish its invalidity. But if he believes himself possessed of proof invalidating the assignment he is not debarred from attacking it, and endeavoring to set it aside. He is then but insisting upon his general right to be paid his judgment in the order of its priority, and on what principle should his endeavor in that direction prevent him from proving and establishing his right, in any event, to his share in the assigned estate, which the assignee must be deemed to be holding in trust for him and all other creditors under the debtor's deed? The creditor may not feel any more hostility to the debtor's proposed distribution of his estate when he sues to annul it than he did before. The bringing of the suit is merely the hostility on his part pronounced in legal proceedings. The learned justice delivering the opinion at the general term conceded that, where an action to set aside the assignment had been brought, and was unsuccessful and terminated, an election would not be held to have taken place. How does the mere pendency of the action affect and change the situation? What is the attitude of the parties? The debtor has transferred his estate to another, upon the trust that he distribute it, in the manner provided in the deed, to and among his creditors. The assignee is a trustee, whose duty it is to make that distribution. A creditor's only alternative, if he is not contented to take what would thus come to him, is to endeavor to set aside the deed of assignment, if he deems himself possessed of the requisite evidence of its invalidity at law. If there is any election for him to make, it can only be with respect to what remedies may be available to him in order to right himself upon his judgment against the assignor and to avoid the assignment. We think, therefore, that this was not a case of election of remedies, and that, in endeavoring to set aside the deed of assignment, in order to render their judgments effective, the appellants were testing and contesting the legality and validity of their debtor's act and disputing its binding force upon them, as they had a legal right to do, and which was a course that recognized the debtor's deed, but alleged the existence of grounds for holding it voidable, and therefore not compulsory upon the creditor. It in no wise militated against the right of the appellants, if defeated upon that issue, to share in the assigned estate, on the basis of distribution provided in the debtor's deed to his assignee. The second question argued was whether the appellants, if entitled to share in the distribution of the assigned estate, could claim preference in payment under the assignment, as being individual creditors of Perline. With respect to that question, we agree with the decision of the court below denying that right. The indebtedness represented by their claims was clearly excepted by the terms of the deed of assignment, and they could only claim to share ratably with other creditors, after the payments previously directed.

So much of the judgment appealed from as affirmed the judgment disallowing the right of these appellants to share in the distribution of the funds in the assignor's hands should be reversed, and these appellants adjudged entitled to share with other creditors not preferred in the assignment. Costs to the appellants to be paid out of the estate in the assignee's hands.

All concur.

The whole question is, Who shall bear the loss occasioned by a vis major? And that depends much upon the question, Who was the proprietor when that loss was occasioned? Mittelholzer v. Fullarton, 6 Q. B. 699.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Haggin, Van Ness & Dibble, for appellant:

If the agreement between the plaintiff and Stewart, and Stewart's entry and possession thereunder, operated as a change of either title or possession, the policy is void.

Title is the "means whereby the owner of lands hath the just possession of his property, and a perfect title consists of actual possession under a right thereto based upon a right to the property."

The contract between plaintiff and Stewart operated as a change of title and consequent vitiation of the policy.

*A decision was reached and an opinion handed down in this case on March 10, 1890, which reversed the judgment of the court below. It is the established doctrine of equity that if a contract to purchase is to be completed at a given period, and the title is finally made out, the parties continuing in treaty, and the purchaser not by any acts released from his bargain, the estate is considered as belonging to him from the date of the contract, and the money from that time as belonging to the vendor. *Harford v. Messrs. Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, for respondents:

If Stewart was in possession as the tenant of the plaintiffs, on the first day of January, 1888, and remained in possession as tenant of the plaintiffs, until the destruction of the building, it is utterly incomprehensible that "he was more than a tenant."

The rule in equity that requires a specific performance in favor of a party who has made improvements, expended money, paid a part or the whole of the agreed price of property purchased in good faith from another, proceeds upon the idea that a failure to make such conveyance would be a fraud upon the purchaser. The application sought to be made of the rule in a court of law, in this case, by the appelcondition, and until that event the property remains at the risk of the vendor. Counter v. Macpherson, 5 Moore, P. C. 83.

Personal property is, equally with real estate, the subject of conditional sale, and possession is to be construed as only prima facie evidence of its ownership. Mount v. Harris, 1 Smedes & M. 185.

At law a failure of consideration in cases of contract is a sufficient ground for considering the contract as rescinded, and for maintaining the action for money had and received on the contract. *Lyon v. lant, would enable the insurance company, after the utmost good faith, on the part of the plaintiffs, in their application for insurance, payment of the premium, notice and proof of the loss, to refuse payment, and turn what was intended as a shield for the protection of honesty into a sword for its destruction.

If we admit, for the sake of argument, that the provision in the lease amounted to a sale of the premises, still the preponderance of authorities, as well as reason, shows that the Company cannot avoid payment on that account.

Beatty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In March, 1890, we made a decision in this case, reversing the judgment of the superior court with directions to enter judgment on the findings in favor of the appellant. 23 Pac. Rep. 383. After a rehearing of the case, and upon fuller consideration of the questions involved, we are satisfied that our former decision was erroneous and that the judgment of the superior court should be affirmed.

The action is upon a fire insurance policy. Plaintiffs had judgment in the lower court and defendant appealed from the judgment alone, claiming that upon the facts found the judgment should have been in its favor.

The policy in suit was issued in August, 1887, and the property insured consisted of a frame building designed for a hotel or boarding house. The defendant was advised by the papers accompanying the application for insurance—which, by the terms of the policy, are made a part of the contract—that the building was occupied, or to be occupied, by a tenant (no particular tenant being named) for hotel purposes, and it is found by the court, as alleged in the complaint, “that before said insurance was effected defendant had full knowledge that said building was built by plaintiffs for the purpose of renting the same for a boarding and lodging house, and was to be occupied by the tenant of the plaintiffs; the said building not being at that time fully completed and furnished.”

After the insurance was effected and the building completed the plaintiffs, on December 24, 1887, by a written lease demised the insured premises to one J. D. Stewart, for a term of five years, at a fixed rent, payable monthly. The lease also contained stipulations binding the plaintiffs to put in certain furniture, consisting of carpets, cooking range, gas fixtures, etc., and binding Stewart to put in other necessary furniture. It was agreed that the building and furniture should be properly insured for the benefit of the parties as their interest might appear, and that Stewart, the lessee, should pay one half of the expense of insuring the building and the entire expense of insuring the furniture.

It was further agreed as follows: “Said party of the second part (Stewart) may at any time during said term of five years purchase said hotel, lots and premises for the sum of $25,000 cash, and likewise purchase said carpets, gas fixtures and range at cost price. It is further agreed that said party of the second part will purchase said hotel, lots and premises on or before five years from this date for the sum of $25,000, together with said carpets, gas fixtures and range at their cost price.”

The defendant had no notice of these stipulations for purchase and sale of the property. Under this lease and agreement Stewart entered into possession of the insured premises, and so continued until the destruction of the hotel by fire in April, 1888.

The plaintiffs thereafter, upon due notice and proofs of loss, demanded payment of the policy, which was refused by the defendant. Hence this action, which is defended on the ground of an alleged violation by plaintiffs of the following conditions of the policy:

“If the property be sold or transferred (in whole or in part) or upon the commencement of foreclosure proceedings against or a sale under a deed of trust or the existence of a judgment lien or the issue or levy of an execution against any kind of property herein described; or if the property be assigned under any bankrupt or insolvent law, or any change takes place in the title or possession (except in case of succession by reason of the death of the assured) whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer, assignment or conveyance; or if the title or possession shall be changed from any cause whatsoever; or if this policy shall be assigned before a loss, without the consent of the company indorsed hereon,—this policy shall in each and every instance be void.”

The passages which we have italicised are those to which attention is particularly directed, the claim of appellant being that the lease and agreement of sale, and Stewart's possession thereunder, wrought a change both in the title and possession of the property insured, involving a forfeiture by plaintiffs of all rights under the policy.

In their argument at the rehearing counsel for appellant took the position, for the first time, that possession by Stewart, under the lease and as a tenant merely, without regard to the contract of sale, was a violation of the provision of the policy against a change of possession. But clearly this position cannot be maintained in view of the statement made in the application upon which the policy was issued, to the effect that the building was to be occupied by a tenant for hotel purposes, and the fact found by the court that defendant had full knowledge, before issuing the policy, of the purpose for which the building was being constructed, and that it was to be occupied by a tenant. Occupancy of the identical character contemplated by the policy was not a change of possession. The issuance of the policy was an express consent to possession by a tenant, and since no particular tenant was named it was a consent to occupancy by any tenant selected by the assured, subject of course to revocation by canceling the policy and returning the premium if an objectionable tenant was selected.

The real and only question in the case is whether the contract of sale embraced in the lease, or superadded to it, wrought a change in the title to the insured premises within the meaning of the policy, or imparted to the possession of Stewart a character materially different from the possession of a tenant. Upon this question we held in our former decision, in accordance with the contention of appellant, that Stewart by taking possession of the insured premises under the lease and agreement of December 24, 1887, not only acquired the right, but became absolutely bound to complete the purchase; that henceforth the buildings were at his risk, that if they were destroyed the loss would be his alone, because he was obliged at the expiration of his term as tenant, upon tender of a deed for the land without the buildings, to pay the full contract price of $25,000. From this it necessarily followed that Stewart, from the time of taking possession, acquired an insurable interest equivalent to the value of the buildings, and that if plaintiffs could collect the insurance and keep it, they would be paid twice over for the buildings, so that they would have a direct interest in their destruction. Of course upon these premises it was impossible to avoid the conclusion that the effect of the transaction with Stewart was to work a change in the title not merely nominal and technical, but substantial and material to the risk, and necessarily violative of the conditions of the policy.

But on a fuller consideration of the case we are satisfied that the authorities cited in our opinion and in the briefs of counsel did not warrant us in holding that under the circumstances of this case Stewart, by taking possession under the lease and contract of December 24, 1887, became absolutely bound to complete the purchase of the premises at the expiration of his term, notwithstanding the previous destruction of the buildings.

There can be no question that under such a contract the equitable title to the land, as between the vendor and vendee, is in the latter. This is a familiar doctrine of equity, based upon the principle that, for the prevention of fraud and the enforcement of the just rights of the parties, equity will deem that to be done which ought to be done. The maxim is applied most frequently in actions by the vendee for specific performance of the contract, or in aid of his defense when the vendor is seeking to recover possession of the land upon his legal title. Laffan v. Nagler, 9 Cal. 668; DeRutte v. Muldrow, 16 Cal. 505; Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 63; Donov. v. Clark, 54 Cal. 48; King v. Ruckman, 21 N. J. Eq. 599.

Decisions almost innumerable to the same effect might be cited from the reports of this and other States, but they do not decide the question involved in this case.

There is a wide distinction between the proposition that the vendee in possession under an executory contract of sale may maintain the possession against the vendor as long as he performs his part of the agreement, and upon full compliance may enforce specific performance of the vendor's contract to convey the legal title, and the proposition here contended for, viz., that the vendor in such a contract, notwithstanding the destruction of the subject of the contract in whole or in part, before the date stipulated for payment and conveyance, and his consequent inability to make a conveyance of that for which the vendee has bargained, may nevertheless compel the vendee to pay the whole contract price in exchange for a fraction of the property sold.

When we come to make a critical examination of the cases cited to this point, and especially the cases in which the precise question we are considering are directly involved, we find that they lend a very slight support to the appellant's contention.

In the case of McKechnie v. Sterling, 48 Barb. 380, the doctrine is, it is true, carried to an extreme degree, but the authorities cited in support of that decision are not in point, and the reasoning by which they are made to support the decision is very unsatisfactory.

In Richter v. Selin, 8 Serg. & R. 439, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania uses this language: "Where a contract is made for the sale of land, equity considers the vendee as the owner of the estate sold, and the purchaser as a trustee for the vendor for the purchase money. So much is the vendee considered in contemplation of equity as actually seised of the estate that he must bear any loss that may happen to the estate between the agreement and the conveyance, and he will be entitled to any benefit which may accrue to it in the interval, because by the contract he is the owner of the premises to every intent and purpose in equity." But this was said arguendo in deciding a case where the point was not directly involved, and the proposition, true enough in general, and in its application to the circumstances of that case, was stated in its most unqualified form and without regard to the special circumstances which in many cases render it inapplicable.

Similar statements of the same doctrine are to be found in some of the insurance cases hereinafter referred to, with reference to most of which it was correctly applied, as we shall see.

But we shall see also that the doctrine has its reasonable limitations, and that this is one of the cases to which it cannot be applied without doing the wrong and injustice which it was designed to prevent.

In the case of Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514, the facts were that the plaintiff agreed to sell the defendant a farm and the defendant agreed to buy. On the day previous to that fixed for the payment and conveyance, the buildings on the farm were destroyed by fire. The plaintiff tendered a conveyance in pursuance of the contract, and demanded payment of the purchase price, which being refused, he sued for damages. It was held that he could not recover, because by reason of the destruction of the buildings he was unable to comply with the contract on his part. It is true the vendee had not taken possession, and the court found it necessary to distinguish the cases in which lessors in possession had been held liable on their covenant to pay rent or make repairs notwithstanding the destruction of tenements by fire during the term. In those cases it was said the liability of the defendant resulted from the fact that the lessors had fully complied with their contracts, while in the case under consideration the plaintiff was unable to do so.

There can be no doubt of the soundness of this distinction, and no difficulty, we think, in showing that it applies to the present case.

In the earlier Massachusetts case, Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134, it was applied where the defendant was in possession and had paid the purchase price for the purpose of sustaining his right to recover back the money paid.

In that case the agreement of purchase and sale was by parol, but the plaintiff paid at different dates the whole purchase price and got receipts in writing specifying the purpose of the payments, and he had entered into possession of the house. Clearly under the circumstances he had put himself in a position to enforce specific performance of the contract to convey, and was the owner of the equitable title. But before any conveyance was tendered, the house was destroyed by fire, and the plaintiff sued in assumpsit for the money paid. In a well-considered opinion the court held that he was entitled to recover back the money on account of failure of consideration.

It was conceded that the contract of the vendor, though by parol, could under the circumstances have been specifically enforced, but it was denied that it could have been enforced against the vendee after destruction of the house.

It may be said that in this decision the mere legal rights of the parties were regarded, and that the court could not act upon the equitable doctrine for want of jurisdiction; but it will be seen that the equitable doctrine was discussed in the opinion and its reasonable limitations pointed out.

What those limitations are it is not necessary that we should consider exhaustively. For the purpose of this decision it is sufficient to say that no case has been cited, and we have discovered none, in which the vendee has been held bound to pay the purchase price where a valuable part of the property has been destroyed before the day fixed for payment and conveyance, unless he has taken possession under the contract of sale, or has the right to such possession under the contract before the occurrence of the loss.

Now, in this case, it is to be remembered that the agreement between plaintiffs and Stewart consisted of a lease for a term of five years, reserving a rent payable monthly in money, a stipulation giving Stewart the privilege of purchasing at $25,000 at any time during the term, and the contract binding him to purchase at $25,000 at the end of the term.

In considering the question before us we may lay out of view the stipulation giving Stewart the privilege of purchasing, for clearly he was not thereby bound to take the property and pay for it even if it remained whole and intact. To determine the character of his possession with reference to the extent of his liability upon his agreement to purchase, the contract is to be viewed as if it consisted merely of the lease and the agreement to purchase. Would Stewart, entering under such a contract, at the beginning of the term demised, be deemed, for the purpose of enforcing a most inequitable liability, to have entered and to be holding under his contract of purchase? Clearly he would not, if his possession could be referred to either the lease or the contract as distinct from the other; for there can be no doubt that during the term of the lease he would hold under that. His right to remain in possession would depend on his payment of rent and performance of other covenants of the lease, and would be determined by failure so to pay and perform.

And we think that, for the purpose of determining his liability under his agreement to purchase, in case of destruction of a material part of the property sold prior to the time for payment and conveyance, this distinction between the lease and agreement ought to be made. It is reasonable and equitable, and not opposed to any authority cited unless the case in 48 Barbour, above referred to, should be deemed an authority against it. If so, we can only say that we think that case goes to an unreasonable length, and that it ought not to be followed. On the contrary, we think the best considered cases warrant us in holding that the liability of Stewart upon his agreement to purchase ended with the destruction of the hotel; that it was never at his risk, but was always at the sole risk of the plaintiffs.

But appellant contends that even on this view there was a change of title and possession within the meaning of the policy, and he cites a number of cases to sustain the proposition that the equitable ownership of a vendee under a contract of purchase constitutes a sole, absolute and unconditional ownership, and consequently that the vendor cannot also be the sole, absolute and unconditional owner. A review of these cases, however, will show that they differ essentially from the case in hand.

In the case of Hough v. City F. Ins. Co., 29 Conn. 10, the legal title to the property insured was in a trustee, who held it as security for about $1,600, subject to which incumbrance the plaintiff and two others owned the equitable title in equal shares. The plaintiff bought out his co-owners, agreeing to pay each the sum of $1,000 for his interest, and he had paid on his purchase $500 to one and $700 to the other. He had also taken possession of the land and erected a dwelling thereon, at a cost of $2,700 and was to receive a conveyance from the trustee upon the payment of the sum secured to him on the property. Under these circumstances the court held that it was not a misrepresentation on the part of plaintiff in applying for insurance to state that the property was his. And it was also held that his interest in the property was within the meaning of the policy an absolute interest, because he could by no contingency be deprived of it except by his own consent. No doubt this case was correctly decided.

The plaintiff by reason of his original interest in the property, his payment to his co-owners upon the purchase of their interests, and the money he had expended in improvements on the property, independent of his agreement to purchase, had bound himself to do so, and he was the only person who could suffer loss by destruction of the property. It was his, therefore, absolutely in every sense of the word material to the risk. And the decision was in line with hundreds of others in which the courts everywhere have refused to defeat recovery upon insurance policies by giving effect to the literal terms of clauses of forfeitures. Such clauses are always, and justly, construed with the utmost strictness against the insurer, and always with reference to their only legitimate object, i. e., the protection of the insurer against risks that are materially different from those which he has undertaken. The cases of Millville Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Wilgus, and Chandler v. Commerce F. Ins. Co. 88 Pa. 107, 223; East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Dyches, 56 Tex. 565; Swift v. Vermont Nat. Ins. Co. 18 Vt. 313, and Gaylord v. Lamar F. Ins. Co. 40 Mo. 16, are all substantially like the Connecticut case, and the decisions rest upon the same ground. In every instance the vendee had made large or complete payments upon his purchase, or valuable improvements, or both. In other words, he had given bonds to complete it, so that the loss must necessarily fall upon him in case of destruction of buildings.

The case of Davidson v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 71 Iowa, 532, upon the authority of which, principally, our former decision herein was based, was another of the same sort. There the vendee had entered into possession of a small farm under a contract to purchase it for $400, upon which $50 was to be paid in cash. Prior to the sale the vendor had, as in this case, procured insurance on a building on the farm. After the sale the building was destroyed by fire, and the vendor sued on the policy. The defense was breach of a condition of the policy against any sale or conveyance of the property by the insured. The defense was sustained on the ground that there was a sale of the property. This ruling was clearly opposed to the decision of the Supreme Court of Maryland in Washington Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 421, and to other decisions cited in the dissenting opinion.

It was rested also upon the false assumption that if the plaintiff could collect the insurance he could also collect the full purchase price of the building from his vendee, which would be holding in effect that the defendant remained bound by the policy after it became the interest of the assured to destroy the property.

But upon the doctrine of equity that the vendee in possession is the equitable owner of the property and the vendor merely his trustee of the legal title, the money collected by the plaintiff on the policy would have been held in trust for the vendee, and applied on the purchase price (Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. 202); so that in fact the plaintiff, even if he had been held entitled to recover on the policy, could have no interest in the destruction of the property. And so in this case, even if Stewart could be held bound by his contract of purchase after the fire, the plaintiff could gain nothing by collecting the amount of the policy. This, however, would be no answer to the objection of defendant that the title was changed in a sense material to the risk; for, to hold that the plaintiff could collect the insurance for the benefit of his vendee would convert the transaction into a virtual assignment of the policy, which can never be done without the consent of the insurer.

We do not, therefore, rest our decision in any degree upon the ground that the plaintiffs could not possibly have derived an advantage from the destruction of the hotel, and have only alluded to the matter for the purpose of calling attention to the false quantity in the reasoning of the Iowa Supreme Court in the case cited in support of our former decision.

The cases of Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 117 Pa. 460, 10 Cent. Rep. 575, and Elliot v. Ashland Mut. F. Ins. Co. 117 Pa. 548, 10 Cent. Rep. 581, cited on the rehearing, are essentially like the other cases cited to the same point, which we have already considered.

We conclude that there was in this case no change of title or possession material to the risk, and that the judgment of the superior court on the facts found was correct.

In reaching this conclusion we have not overlooked the argument based upon the fact that Stewart agreed to pay one half of the premium on the insurance of the hotel. That agreement is evidently one of the terms of the lease as contradistinguished from the agreement to purchase.

The judgment is affirmed.

Petition for second rehearing denied October 19, 1891.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

MOUNT VERNON FIRST NATIONAL BANK et al., Appls.,

v.

(....Ind.....)

1. A property owner may maintain a suit to enjoin the rebuilding, in violation of a valid city ordinance, of a wooden building which has been partially destroyed by fire, although it would not be a nuisance per se, if it will work special and irreparable injury to him and to his property, as by diminishing the value of the property and increasing the rates of insurance thereon.

2. Owners of separate and distinct tenements may unite in an action to restrain the rebuilding, in violation of a city ordinance, of a structure partially destroyed by fire, the injury from which will affect all of them alike.

3. The intention to deprive a municipal corporation of its common-law powers will not be inferred simply because certain of such powers are enumerated and conferred upon it by its charter while no mention is made of the rest of them.

4. A municipality cannot, without express authority, absolutely and without regard to circumstances, prohibit the making, upon any wooden building within designated limits, of repairs to the amount of $300 or over.

(September 22, 1891.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Posey County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the repairing of a certain wooden building. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Elijah M. Spencer and William P. Edson, for appellants:

The ordinance in question is fully authorized by law. The Statute confers upon the City of Mt. Vernon, if not expressly, at least by implication, as a part of the police power of the State, full authority to pass such ordinance.

1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. §§ 141, 143.

Under the police power of the State and general welfare clause of the Statute, a city may, by ordinance, prohibit the erection of frame buildings within its fire-limits, in the absence of express legislative authority; and such city

NOTE.—Municipal control over the erection of wooden buildings.

It is entirely competent for a municipal corporation to regulate the extent of the fire limits and prescribe the character of the material with which buildings within certain designated limits shall be constructed. The city council has the sole, absolute, and final control of all questions of this character. State v. Clarke, 54 Mo. 17; Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 44 Iowa, 508; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 94; St. Louis v. Boffinger, 19 Mo. 15; Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. 184; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 475 p. 401, note 1; *Veazie v. The by-law of a municipality has the same effect within its limits and with respect to the persons upon whom it lawfully operates as an Act of Parliament has upon the subjects at large. Lord Abinger in Hopkins v. Swansea, 4 Mees. & W. 621, 640; Milne v. Davidson, 5 Mart. N. S. 409; The Queen v. Osler, 32 U. C. Q. B. 324.

That a city, especially when authorized by its charter, has the right to establish fire districts, and may prohibit the erection of wooden buildings, as a safeguard against the occurrence and spread of conflagration is not denied, and is well settled by authority. See 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 408, citing Charleston v. Elford, 1 McMull. L. 234; Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 425; Douglass v. Com. 2 Hawle, 262; Wadleigh v. Bickel, 10 Cent. Rep. 381, 117 Pa. 328.

While it is an indisputable proposition that the Legislature is alone empowered to enact statutory laws, it is equally well settled that it may, in its discretion, delegate to municipalities the power to make by-laws and ordinances which are invested with all of the force and effect of general laws duly sanctioned by the Legislature. Heland v. Lowell, 3 Allen, 407; St. Louis v. Co. 66 Ind. 306.

The only test of general legislative action should be, Was the law passed in pursuance of and in accord with the Constitution, and in the exercise of the constitutional powers of the legislative body? In the case of a municipal corporation, the question is, whether it was in accord with the Constitution, state and federal, and then within the powers granted in the charter of the corporation. If so, the propriety and mode of its exercise is one solely for the legislative body exercising it. Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea. 121, 47 Am. Rep. 326.

Cities and villages are vested with power to prescribe fire limits, and direct that all wooden buildings within those limits, when damaged by fire, decay or otherwise, to the extent of fifty per cent of their value, shall be torn down and removed. Hurd, Stat. 1881, p. 219, § 62. See also Harvey v. Dewoody, 18 Ark. 252; Ferguson v. Selma, 43 Ala. 396; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 471; Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403; King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 305; Louisville v. Webster, 108 Ill. 414.

A regulation of the use of property, or a prohibition of its repair when partially destroyed, is not a condemnation to the public use. Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 425.

These cases rest on solid principle, for the rule has always been that a municipal corporation has the inherent power to enact ordinances for the protection of the property of its citizens against fire. 2 Bacon, Abr. 147; Clark v. South Bend, 85 Ind. 276, 44 Am. Rep. 13; North Western Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 669, 24 L. ed. 1036-1039; 2 Kent, Com. 339.

may, by ordinance, prohibit the repair and rebuilding of frame houses within its fire limits, in the absence of express legislative authority.

Monroe v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 651, 29 Am. Rep. 345; Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 580, 581; Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 405, cited approvingly in Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 580; Wood, Nuisances, § 741; Charleston v. Reed, 27 W. Va. 681, 55 Am. Rep. 336; Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403, 28 Am. Dec. 188; Salem v. Maynes, 123 Mass. 372; Try v. Winters, 4 Thomp. & C. 256; Hine v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 478; Alexander v. Greenville, 54 Miss. 669; Hasty v. Huntington, 8 West. Rep. 322, 105 Ind. 542.

A city may adopt an ordinance prohibiting the repair and rebuilding of frame houses within its fire limits, in the absence of express legislative enactments authorizing the same.

Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 425; Clark v. South Bend, 85 Ind. 276; Baumgartner v. Hasty, supra; King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 305, 38 Am. Rep. 89.

The general law which authorizes the City of Mount Vernon to adopt an ordinance forbidding the repair and rebuilding of wooden buildings, either expressly or by necessary implication, is constitutional and valid. The power of the State over police regulations is supreme.

The powers conferred by the laws of the State upon municipal corporations to protect property from fire "are in their nature legislative and governmental; the extent and manner of their exercise within the sphere prescribed by statute are necessarily to be determined by the judgment and discretion of the proper municipal authorities," and "the power of the city over the subject is that of a delegated quasi sovereignty."

Injunction is the proper remedy to prevent the wrongful acts of a person in repairing and rebuilding a frame house on his property, within the fire limits of a city, in violation of its ordinance, after he has threatened and commenced to so repair and rebuild the same, when the injunction is invoked by a person whose private property does and will suffer great and irreparable damage from such wrongful acts.

A Coal Float v. Jeffersonville, 10 West. Rep. 833, 112 Ind. 15.

How unreasonably the second section of the ordinance can operate is graphically stated by Justice Campbell in Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. supra.

McBride, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves the validity of the second section of an ordinance of the City of Mt. Vernon, entitled "An Ordinance Concerning the Prevention of Fires." The first section, the validity of which is not called in question, establishes fire limits and prescribes the material which may be used in the erection of buildings within these limits.

The second section is as follows: "Section 2. It shall be unlawful for any person to alter, repair, or rebuild any frame or wooden building situated within the limit defined and prescribed by this ordinance, whenever the amount required to alter, repair, or rebuild shall equal or exceed the sum of three hundred dollars. Any person violating the provisions of this section may be fined in any sum not less than two dollars, nor more than one hundred dollars, with costs, and each day that workmen are employed on such building shall constitute a distinct offense."

The complaint charges, in substance, that the appellees were the owners of certain real estate in Mt. Vernon, and within the fire limits prescribed by the ordinance in question, upon which they were threatening to and had commenced to rebuild and repair certain frame buildings, at a cost exceeding $300, which had previously been partially destroyed by fire. The appellants (plaintiffs below) are shown to be each the owners of certain other tracts of land, either adjacent to or in the immediate vicinity of the appellee's building, on which valuable buildings have been erected; and they charge that by reason of the threatened repairing and rebuilding by the appellees, the danger of the destruction by fire of their respective buildings is "greatly increased and made more imminent, thereby diminishing the value of said plaintiff's real estate and increasing the rate of fire insurance thereon, to the irreparable injury and damage of the said buildings on each and all of the said pieces of real estate, so, as aforesaid, owned by the plaintiffs, and is an obstruction to the free use by the plaintiffs of their said property and interferes with the comfortable enjoyment thereof," etc.

Prayer for an injunction. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the complaint and rendered judgment for costs in favor of the appellees. Three questions are presented and discussed:

1. Will injunction lie in such a case?
2. If so, is there a misjoinder of parties plaintiff?
3. Is the section of ordinance in question valid?

As a rule, a court of equity will not, at the suit of a city, restrain by injunction the threatened violation of an ordinance of such city regulating the erection of buildings for the purpose of greater security against damage by fire. 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 1172; St. Johns v. McFarlan, 83 Mich. 72, 20 Am. Rep. 671; Waupun v. Moore, 34 13 L. R. A.

Wis. 454, 17 Am. Rep. 446; Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, 4 L. ed. 148; Muncie v. Smythe, 64 N. H. 380, 5 New Eng. Rep. 62.

Nor will the courts thus interfere at the suit of an individual when such interference is sought solely for the enforcement of the ordinance, and not because of special damage threatening the party asking such interference.

Some of the authorities above cited affirm that to warrant the application of the restraining power to prevent the erection of buildings in violation of a city ordinance the act sought to be restrained must be a nuisance in fact, and not one created solely by statutory enactment or municipal ordinance.

We can see no good reason for the distinction. When it is shown that the erection of a building, if permitted, will be in express violation of a valid municipal ordinance, although it would not be a nuisance per se, an individual who shows such fact, and shows, in addition, that its erection will work special and irreparable injury to him and to his property, is entitled to relief by injunction. It is only when the injury is general and public in its effects, and no private right is violated in contradistinction to the rights of the rest of the public, that individuals are precluded from bringing private suits for the violation of their individual rights. Blanc v. Murray, 36 La. Ann. 162, 51 Am. Rep. 7; Wood, Nuisances, 645 et seq.; McCloskey v. Kreling, 76 Cal. 511, 23 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 151; Horstman v. Young, 13 Phila. 19; Rand v. Wilber, 19 Ill. App. 395; Monroe v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 651, 29 Am. Rep. 345. In the case at bar it is charged by the averments of the complaint that the threatened act will be in violation of a municipal ordinance, and that it will work special and irreparable injury to the property of the petitioners. They have the right to maintain the action.

There is no misjoinder of parties plaintiff. While the appellants are shown to be the owners of separate and distinct tenements, and thus are not united in interest with each other, there is one object of common interest among all of them. They all claim one general right to be relieved from that which they insist is a nuisance, and which alike affects all of them. Their common danger and common interest in the relief sought authorizes them to join in the action. Tate v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 10 Ind. 174, and authorities there cited; Sullivan v. Phillips, 110 Ind. 320, 9 West. Rep. 49.

The question as to the validity of the ordinance presents much greater difficulty. There can be no doubt that in this State cities possess ample power to enact and enforce reasonable ordinances to secure protection against fire. In the absence of express statutory authority, the enactment and enforcement of reasonable regulations of this character is recognized as a legitimate exercise of the police power, necessary to the safety of the city. Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575; Hasty v. Huntington, 105 Ind. 542, 3 West. Rep. 322; Clark v. Smith Bend, 85 Ind. 276, and authorities cited in each. Also, Monroe v. Hoffman, supra; King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 305; Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 408, 28 Am. Rep. 188; Salem v. Maynes, 128 Mass. 372; Troy v. Winters, 4 Thomp. & C. 256; McKiddin v. Fort Smith, 35 Ark. 352; Klinger v. Bickel, 117 Pa. 326, 10 Cent. Rep. 381.

In addition to the power thus possessed, clause 32 of § 3106, Rev. Stat. 1881, enumerating the powers conferred upon cities, confers express authority to establish fire limits and prevent the erection of wooden buildings in such parts of the city as the common council may determine. The statutory authority is still further extended by clause 5 of the same section, and by section 3155, known as the "general welfare" clause. Counsel for appellee insist, however, that the enactment of the statutes in question served as a limitation upon the powers of the city; that the powers therein enumerated and more belonged to the city at common law, and that by the statutory enumeration of certain specific powers, all others not thus enumerated are excluded. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius has no application. The Statute, in so far as it enumerates common-law powers previously possessed by the municipality is merely declaratory of the common law. But, while it is no doubt competent for the Legislature, in creating such corporations, to deprive them of all common-law police power, and enact that they shall possess and exercise such only as are conferred by statute, such intention of the Legislature will not be inferred simply because some of the common-law powers are enumerated while no mention is made of others. In the exercise of these powers, they may not only prescribe where wooden buildings may and where they may not be erected, but they may undoubtedly exercise a reasonable control over the making of repairs on all buildings, whether of wood or not, and may prevent the use of inflammable or otherwise dangerous material in making such repairs. It can hardly be doubted, that if the owner of a building proposed to make repairs or additions to it of such material, or in such manner as to seriously menace the public safety or to greatly endanger adjacent property, the city authorities have ample power to interfere and prevent the making of such repairs or additions. Montgomery v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 84 Ala. 127; King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 305. 38 Am. Rep. 89.

They also have full power to abate nuisances, and may, if necessary, remove or compel the removal of buildings which have for any cause become nuisances, by getting in such condition that they greatly endanger the public health or safety or the safety of adjacent property, provided the danger inheres in the building and not simply in the use to which the building is put. Here, also, although the statute gives ample authority, they have, without statutory authority, ample power at common law to cause the abatement of the nuisance; and if it cannot be otherwise abated, they may destroy the thing which constitutes or creates it. Baumgartner v. Hasty, supra, and authorities cited.

They may also remove, or compel the removal of, wooden buildings erected in violation of a valid ordinance, not, necessarily, because the building thus erected is a nuisance, but because its erection was in violation and defiance of the law, and its owner cannot complain when the law is vindicated by its removal. If it were possible to so prepare wood that it would be absolutely non-inflammable, and that a building erected of it would be fire-proof and safer than one erected in the ordinary way, of stone or brick, a building thus erected of wood, in violation of a valid ordinance enacted under clause 32 of section 3106, supra, forbidding such erection, would be as much subject to removal or destruction by the authorities as if it were constructed of wood not thus prepared.

It is manifest, therefore, that the right to remove or destroy the building thus erected in violation of an ordinance does not grow out of the fact that it is a nuisance, as a building made out of such material, if otherwise skillfully and properly constructed, would be as safe or safer than one built in the ordinary way, of stone and brick, and could not be a nuisance. As is said in Baumgartner v. Hasty, supra: "A municipal corporation has no power to treat a thing as a nuisance which cannot be one." See also Wood, Nuisances, 828; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636.

The power in such case to compel the removal of the building grows solely out of the fact that its erection was in violation of the ordinance.

The discovery of a process by which wood could be made non-inflammable, and in all respects as safe to be used in the construction of buildings as stone or brick or iron, would end the common-law power of the city to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings, or its power under the general welfare clause, while under the statute that power would still exist simply because the material was wood, and not at all because it was dangerous. So with the power to remove buildings already erected. There is no express legislation on the subject, and such powers as the city has are its common-law powers, reinforced by the general welfare clause of the Statute.

As above shown, a building erected in violation of a valid ordinance may be removed without reference to its character; but with this exception cities can only condemn as nuisances and compel the removal of buildings which are in themselves for some reason dangerous or hurtful. The author of a valuable work on the law of nuisances states the law as follows: "The power to abate nuisances does not warrant the destruction of valuable property which was lawfully erected; or anything which was erected by lawful authority. It would indeed be a dangerous power to repose in municipal corporations to permit them to declare, by ordinance or otherwise, anything a nuisance which the caprice or interest of those having control of its government might see fit to outlaw, without being responsible for all the consequences; and even if such power is expressly given by the Legislature, it is utterly inoperative and void unless the thing is in fact a nuisance, or was created or erected after the passage of the ordinance and is in defiance of it." Wood, Nuisances, 823. See also the opinion of Justice Miller in Yates v. Milwaukee, supra.

This may serve to indicate the scope of the common-law powers of the city in this direction, and the additional powers given by the Statute. At common-law, they are only authorized to interfere with the erection or repair of buildings far enough to prevent the doing of that which from its nature would have a tendency to create or enhance danger.

There is in this State no statute purporting to give to cities any power to prevent the repair of wooden buildings. If they have such power, it is derived either from the general welfare clause, or it is an incident of their common-law police power. The section of ordinance in question, if valid, absolutely prohibits the altering or repairing of all frame or wooden buildings within the fire limits, in all cases where the cost of altering or repairing will equal or exceed $300. It makes no difference what material is to be used in making the repairs, or what the effect may be on the building. Repairing with fire-proof material is equally prohibited, with repairs from dangerous and inflammable material. A repair which would tend to diminish danger falls under the ban equally with those the tendency of which would inevitably increase it. It makes no difference whether the building was erected before or after the establishment of fire limits, or what its value is. Its value may be trifling. It may be a mere wreck or remnant which $300 would practically rebuild, or it may be valuable, worth many thousands of dollars, and the cost of the repairs although $300 or more, relatively insignificant. It may also be that no other building is near it to be affected or endangered.

As we have heretofore said, we do not doubt that cities may exercise a reasonable control over the making of repairs to buildings, and may prevent alterations and repairs which would create nuisances. This they can do even in the absence of statutory authority, in the exercise of the police power. And where fire limits are established, they may doubtless prevent the repair of a wooden building within such limits, when to repair would practically be to rebuild, whether such repairs would create a nuisance or not. They cannot, however, at least without express statutory authority, enforce a general sweeping prohibition of all repairs.

Whether a statute attempting to confer such power would be constitutional we need not, of course, decide in this case; but a consideration of some of the possible effects of such an ordinance may well suggest a query of that character.

To repair a building means simply to restore it to a sound condition. The natural and probable effect of repairing, if carefully done, would be to diminish danger, instead of to increase it. Certainly, a building so much injured or otherwise out of repair as to require $300 to repair it is more likely to endanger the public and surrounding property than if put in proper repair. If it is lawful to maintain it without repairs, how can the police power afford any jurisdiction for a refusal to allow its owner to remedy the effects of accident or decay and restore it to a sound condition? To hold that this was a proper exercise of the police power would be to prevent entirely the use of that power which is designed to protect society and prevent the doing of things inimical to its well being. Such an ordinance might in many cases compel the owner of valuable property to stand by and allow it to become valueless and a nuisance without the power to prevent it. The accidental destruction or removal of a roof which it would cost $300 to replace might thus reduce valuable property to the condition of a mere heap of material. It is not simply a restraint on a noxious or improper use of property by its owner, but prohibits him doing that which alone will in many cases save his property from becoming a noxious and dangerous thing. Instead of restraining him from so using it as to make it pernicious to his neighbors, it would compel him by inaction to allow it to become and remain so. It might unquestionably in many cases amount to a taking of the property of the citizen without due process of law, and without the sanction of that overriding necessity by virtue of which at times the rights of the individual may be sacrificed for the public good.

Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 54 Am. Rep. 636, Justice Earl, speaking for the court, says: "The constitutional guaranty that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law may be violated without the physical taking of property for public or private use. Property may be destroyed, or its value may be annihilated. It is owned and kept for some useful purpose, and it has no value unless it can be used. Its capability for enjoyment and adaptability to some use are essential characteristics and attributes without which property cannot be conceived; and hence any law which destroys its value or takes away any of its essential attributes, deprives the owner of his property. The constitutional guaranty would be of little worth if the Legislature could, without compensation, destroy property, or its value, deprive the owner of its use, deny him the right to live in his own house or to work at any lawful trade therein," etc.

In Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 166-177, 20 L. ed. 557-560, Miller, J., says: "There may be such serious interruption to the common and necessary use of property as will be equivalent to a taking within the meaning of the Constitution. . . . But the claim is made that the Legislature could pass this Act in the exercise of the police power which every sovereign State possesses. That power is very broad and comprehensive, and is exercised to promote the health, comfort, safety and welfare of society. Its exercise in extreme cases is frequently justified by the maxim: Salus populi suprema lex est. It is used to regulate the use of property by enforcing the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. Under it the conduct of an individual and the use of property may be regulated so as to interfere to some extent with the freedom of the one and the enjoyment of the other; and in cases of great emergency, engendering overruling necessity, property may be taken or destroyed without compensation, and without what is commonly called due process of law. The limit of the power cannot be accurately defined, and the courts have not been able or willing definitely to circumscribe it. But the power, however broad and extensive, is not above the Constitution. When it speaks, its voice must be heeded. It furnishes the supreme law, the guide for the conduct of legislators, judges, and private persons, and so far as it imposes restraints, the police power must be exercised in subordination thereto," etc.

In Potter's Dwaris on Statutes, 458, it is said that, "the limit to the exercise of the police power can only be this, the legislation must have reference to the comfort, the safety or the welfare of society."

In Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 315-319, Colt, J., says: "The law will not allow rights of property to be invaded under the guise of a police regulation for the preservation of health or protection against a threatened nuisance." In Slaughter House Cases, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 36-87, 21 L. ed. 394-412, Field, J., says: "Under the pretense of prescribing a police regulation the State cannot be permitted to encroach upon any of the just rights of the citizen, which the Constitution intended to secure against abridgement," etc.

In Coe v. Schultz, 47 Barb. 64, a learned judge speaking of the constitutional limitations upon the police power says: "I am not willing to concede that the Legislature can constitutionally declare an act or thing to be a common nuisance which palpably, according to one present experience or information, is not and cannot be under any circumstances a common nuisance, by the common-law definitions or common-law decisions. . . . Under the mere guise of police regulations, personal rights and private property cannot be arbitrarily invaded, and the determination of the Legislature is not final or conclusive."

The author of Tiedeman's Limitations of Police Power says: "Sec. 122: . . . An arbitrary interference by the government, or by its authority with the reasonable enjoyment of private lands is a taking of private property without due process of law, which is inhibited by the Constitution. . . . One can lawfully make use of his property only in such a manner as that he will not injure another. Any use of one's land to the hurt or annoyance of another is a nuisance and may be prohibited. . . . Section 122 a:

But, the police power of the Legislature in reference to the prohibition of nuisances is limited to the prohibition or regulation of those acts which injure or otherwise interfere with the rights of others. The Legislature cannot prohibit a use of lands which works no hurt or annoyance to the 18 L. R. A.

neighbors or to adjoining property. The injurious effect of the use of the land furnishes the justification for the interference of the Legislature. The legislative prohibition or regulation of the use and enjoyment of one's private property in land is in violation of constitutional principles, which is not confined to the prevention of a nuisance. A certain use of lands, harmless in itself, does not become a nuisance because the Legislature has declared it to be so."

This author also tersely and correctly states the full scope of police regulations, when confined within their proper limits, substantially as follows: "To compel everyone to so use his own, and so conduct himself as not to injure others, or infringe upon their rights."

Tried by these tests, the second section of the ordinance in question, in so far as it relates to the repair of wooden buildings, is clearly invalid. It arbitrarily attempts to take from the owner of property all power to make repairs necessary for its preservation, or necessary for its enjoyment, regardless of the effect which such repairs may have upon the public, upon adjacent property or upon the rights of others, and applies with equal force to buildings detached and remote from all others, as to those in immediate proximity to others, and not only to repairs which would tend to create danger, but also to those which would serve to remove or diminish it.

It will not be contended by anyone that the establishment of fire limits will justify the condemnation and removal of wooden buildings previously constructed, simply because they are wooden buildings. Before their destruction or compulsory removal can be justified, they must become nuisances. Yet this ordinance by forbidding repairs, would accomplish by indirection what could not be done directly. It would first compel the owner to allow it to become and remain a nuisance, and then punish him for so doing by destroying or removing his property.

We have not been able to find an authority anywhere which would sustain appellants' position in this case. The case of Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co., 11 Mich. 425, cited by them, holds that under the charter of the City of Detroit, which expressly authorized the enactment of an ordinance forbidding repairs to wooden buildings, an ordinance which forbade such repairs without the consent of the common council was valid. That case in two essential particulars differed from the case at bar: (1) the charter gave express authority to enact the ordinance; and (2) the ordinance then in question was not prohibitory, but allowed repairs when consent was first obtained of the common council. The opinion was by a divided court; Campbell, J., filing a strong dissenting opinion holding the ordinance invalid as applied to a building erected before its enactment, notwithstanding the charter.

The case of King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 305, 38 Am. Rep. 89, was also a case where the charter of the City of Jacksonville conferred express authority, and the ordinance in question only forbade the building or repairing of buildings within the fire limits with other than fire-proof material. A party removed an old shingle roof from her building and replaced it with a new shingle roof. Failing to remove it upon notice, the city marshal removed it. It was held that under the express authority conferred by the charter the ordinance was valid. The ordinance in that case, instead of prohibiting repairs, simply prescribed the material that might be used in making repairs. These two cases are the only ones cited by the appellants upon the question of the right to prohibit repairs, although many others are cited upon the general power of the city in the establishment of fire limits, and their power to prohibit the erection of buildings. Other authorities bearing upon the right to prohibit, or to regulate, repairs are as follows:

Horr & Bemis, on Municipal Police Ordinances, page 214, says: "The making of ordinary repairs to existing buildings cannot be prohibited. Reshingling a building for instance, is an ordinary repair." See also, to the same effect, Reg. v. Howard, 4 Ont. 377; Brown v. Hunn, 27 Conn. 332; Stewart v. Com. 10 Watts, 307.

The case of Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, was a case where an ordinance prohibited the alteration or repair of wooden buildings within the fire limits without permission in writing from the fire wardens. The court discusses at some length the provision that certain officers may grant permission to make repairs, and says: "It is clear, however, that a literal compliance with a regulation prohibiting the repairing of a wooden building might work, in some instances, useless hardships. The repair of a leaking roof or broken window would be necessary to the comfort and health of a family, without enhancing the danger which the framers of the ordinance sought to guard against, and repairs of a more extensive character might be made to particular houses, standing in particular localities, without increasing the fire risks. And it is equally clear that no general rule could be established beforehand that would meet the emergencies of individual cases. Therefore, the power to give relief in particular instances is conferred on certain officers; and it is not to be presumed that they will exercise it wantonly, or for purposes of profit or oppression." The court concludes that the conferring of the discretionary power on the fire wardens was valid and sustained the ordinance.

The case of Montgomery v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 84 Ala. 127, was a case where an ordinance prohibited repairing the roofs of buildings within the fire limits with wood or other inflammable material. Like King v. Davenport, supra, it did not prohibit making repairs, but forbid the use of certain material in making them.

In State v. Schuchardt, 42 La. Ann. 49, it is held that a legislative mandate, authorizing a municipal corporation to prevent the reconstruction in wood of old buildings within certain limits, does not include the mandate to prevent the repairing with shingles the roof of buildings originally covered with shingles. It will be observed on examining these cases with others that more or less directly bear upon the question involved, that there is wide diversity in the interpretation given to the law in the different courts. Some go so far as to deny the power to interfere at all with the making of ordinary repairs. The weight of authority, however, is clearly with these cases which recognize the power of municipal corporations to regulate the making of repairs to buildings, and treat it as a legitimate exercise of the police power, but none of them go to the extent of sustaining the power of absolutely prohibiting repairs, as is sought to be done in this case. The complaint contains no averments showing the value of the building proposed to be repaired. It is possible that the part remaining will be of small value, and that this is a case where to repair will mean a substantial rebuilding of a structure. If so, however, it would have been easy to show such fact by special averment. As it is, we are unable to say from any averment of the complaint that the proposed repairs, costing $300 or more, may not be very small compared with the value of that portion of the building which remains, and that to restore or rebuild it may not be to preserve valuable property and to prevent instead of create a nuisance.

In our opinion, the circuit court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

Harris R. DURKEE et al., Respts.

(.... Wis.....)

An officer cannot forcibly take personal property from its owner, who has acquired peaceable possession of it after the officer has levied on it as the property of the third person.

(March 17, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rock County in favor of defendants in an action brought to re-

NOTE.—Right to defend property.

A sheriff, in the execution of a writ of attachment, is not authorized to take personal property into his custody where it is in the possession of a third person; in such case he can only attach the property by leaving a certified copy of the writ, and a notice specifying the property attached, with 13 L. R. A.

the person having the possession of the same. Lewis v. Birdsey, 19 Or. 164.

The right of self-defense extends to the protection of property, and to its recovery after it is taken, where it can be re-taken without undue violence. State v. Elliot, 11 N. H. 540. See 1 Wharton, Cr. L. 8th ed. § 102; Desty, Cr. L. § 81a.

cover damages for an assault upon plaintiff and alleged wrongful ejection of him from a certain railroad car. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fethers, Jeffris & Fifield, with Mr. J. F. Lyon, for appellant:

The owner may lawfully retake the possession of goods unlawfully taken or detained from him wherever he finds them, provided he does not thereby endanger the public peace, etc. Cooley, Torts, pp. 50-56, and cases cited.

It is held in Massachusetts that one may even resort to force to retake his property.

Com. v. Donahue, 2 L. R. A. 625, 148 Mass. 529.

A man is justified in using force to protect his property against a person who attempts to take possession of it wrongfully.

Filkins v. People, 69 N. Y. 101.

The owner of property is justified in resisting the attempt of an officer to take property under process running against another. And if the officer use force upon the owner, the officer is guilty of an assault and battery and is liable to the owner in damages.

Even under the Vermont rule, in view of the undisputed testimony in this case, plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for at least his actual damages.

Merritt v. Miller, 18 Vt. 416. See Sims v. Reed, 12 B. Mon. 51.

Messrs. John B. Simmons and Charles S. French, for respondents:

A mere temporary interference with the property, not going to the extent of removing it from the place of storage selected by the officer, nor withdrawing it from his control, does not amount to a change of possession nor in any way affect the lien of the attachment.

Harriman v. Gray, 108 Mass. 229; State v. Buchanan, 17 Vt. 578; Faris v. State, 3 Ohio St. 159.

The question of the rights of an officer in the execution of an attachment, when directed to levy upon property the title to which is at the time or afterward becomes the subject of controversy, first came up for adjudication in this country, in State v. Downer, 8 Vt. 424.

In that case the court decides the better and safer and only practicable rule to be that, whenever the question of property is so far doubtful that the creditors or officers may be supposed to act in good faith in making the attachment the owner cannot even justify resistance, but must yield possession and resort to his remedy by action.

See also State v. Buchanan, supra; State v. Fifield, 18 N. H. 84; State v. Richardson, 88 N. H. 208; Faris v. State, 3 Ohio St. 159; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 792, note 2, and cases cited; Harriman v. Gray, 108 Mass. 229.

It is the duty of the officer to make the levy, and in doing so to overcome all resistance, and it is just as much his duty to retain it against opposition, until the law has settled the disposition to be made of it.

It is even held that the officer is not excused by his knowledge that the attachment was obtained from an improper motive.

Wakefield v. Fairman, 41 Vt. 339; Bond v. Ward, 7 Mass. 123.

If it be his duty as an officer to levy, then his act is not a mere naked trespass, but it is an act colore or virtute officii, and upon this principle the sureties upon his official bond are liable, and likewise he and they are liable for the acts of his deputies.

Cole, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought to recover damages for the wrong of the defendants in assaulting the plaintiff on or about the 15th of December, 1885, and forcibly ejecting him from a railroad car while he was unloading coal that belonged to him. The defendants justify their acts by answering that at the time the defendant Harris R. Durkee was a constable, and had a writ of attachment in favor of the other two defendants against one Price and one Paul, and that he levied on the coal in the car mentioned as the property of Price and Paul, in good faith, and without malice, and exercised only so much force as was necessary for the purpose of ejecting the plaintiff from the car where the coal was. It appears that the plaintiff, shortly before the 15th of December, ordered a car of coal, which he expected to sell to Price. The car arrived at Geneva, consigned to him. Price paid the freight on the coal, but did not pay for the coal, and it was not delivered to him by the plaintiff. The attachment was levied on the coal in the car, while the car was standing on the side track of the company at Geneva, on the 15th of December, as the property of the defendants in the attachment. The railroad agent was informed of the attachment, and was asked by the constable to seal the car up, and let it stand where it was, for him, temporarily. The next day the plaintiff notified the defendants that Price did not own the coal, but that it belonged to him. On the morning of the 17th of December the plaintiff went to the freight depot, saw the agent about the coal, and the agent formally opened and delivered the car of coal to him. The plaintiff thus took quiet and peaceable possession of the car, and was engaged in removing the coal therefrom, when the constable arrived on the ground, forbade him from interfering with the coal, and demanded possession of the car. This being refused, he forcibly ejected the plaintiff from the same, which is the wrong complained of.

These material facts are clearly established by the evidence, and are really not disputed. The possession of the coal, after the seizure on the attachment, must be deemed to have been constructively in the constable, as he had left the car, with its contents, where he found it, though in charge of the railroad company. But he had taken as complete possession of the coal as was practicable, unless he removed it from the car. The constable had such possession and special interest in the coal by virtue of his levy that he could have maintained an action against anyone who interfered with it, had the coal been the property of the defendants in the attachment. It seems to us there can be no doubt as to the correctness of this proposition. But the coal belonged to the plaintiff. It had been ordered by him, and was consigned to him, and was afterwards adjudged to be his property in an action brought to recover the value thereof. But after the seizure, as we have said, he acquired peaceable possession of the coal, and held such possession when the constable deprived him of it in a forcible manner.

The important question in the case is as to the justification of the officer. The other defendants were present at the time, aiding and abetting him in the execution of the writ. The learned counsel for the defendants argues and insists that, as the officer was required by his writ to levy upon the coal the title to which was in dispute or in doubt, and he being indemnified therefor, he was in duty bound to make the levy and hold the property until the question of title was settled, or the property otherwise released; and that an officer, while so acting, may not be lawfully interfered with or resisted by the rightful owner, whether such owner be the defendant in the attachment or not; but that the officer had the right to overcome such resistance, and keep or regain possession by the use of such force as might be necessary for the purpose. The learned circuit court doubtless adopted this view of the law, as it directed a verdict for the defendants.

The counsel for the plaintiff insists that the court erred in thus directing the verdict for the defendants, because, he says, it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the defendants were acting in good faith in seizing the coal as the property of Price and Paul, and in taking it from the possession of the plaintiff; also whether the defendants used greater force than was necessary in ejecting the plaintiff from the car; and further, that, under the undisputed testimony, the plaintiff was entitled to recover his actual damages for the wrongful act of the defendants in ejecting him from the car. We shall spend no time in considering the first two questions. As it is said by the opposing counsel, no claim was made on the trial that the evidence raised any doubts on these points, and there was no suggestion or request made that they should be submitted to the jury. The judgment must be reversed for the reason which we will now proceed to state. As we have said, the important question is, Was the officer justified or protected in forcibly taking possession of the coal as against the plaintiff, who was the real owner? The counsel for the plaintiff contends he was not so justified or protected. He says, notwithstanding the absolute right of the officer to proceed and execute the writ, still, if he takes the property of the plaintiff on a process against Price and Paul, he is none the less a trespasser upon the rights of the plaintiff, and, if a trespasser, he acquired no property in the thing attached as against the real owner. The plaintiff, he says, may have his action, and recover the value of the property taken, as was done in this case; or if, after the seizure on the attachment, the plaintiff can peaceably obtain the possession of the attached property, he may take it, and thus subject himself to an action at the suit of the officer; but that the officer has no right in law to dispossess the owner by using force for that purpose, and is not protected in doing so. These different positions of counsel as to the duty and liability of an officer attaching property, though diametrically opposed, are sustained by high authority. There is a serious conflict of judicial opinion on the subject, and we have to make a choice to some extent between the rules laid down in opposing decisions. The courts of Vermont, New Hampshire and Ohio support the contention of the defendants, while those in Massachusetts, New York, and Illinois sustain the plaintiff's position. See State v. Downer, 8 Vt. 424; State v. Buchanan, 17 Vt. 573; State v. Fifield, 18 N. H. 84; State v. Richardson, 88 N. H. 208; Paris v. State, 3 Ohio. St. 159. Contra: Com v. Kennard, 8 Pick. 133; Elder v. Morrison, 10 Wend. 123; Wentworth v. People, 5 Ill. 550.

But the rule which commends itself to our judgment as the most salutary and reasonable is to hold that if, after seizure on attachment against a third party, the rightful owner can quietly and peaceably obtain possession of the property, he may retain such possession, and the officer will not be justified in using forcible means to regain possession. If the officer wishes to test the right of the owner, he should bring an action for that purpose. The courts which adopt the Vermont rule think there are strong grounds of public policy, where the question of property is doubtful, that the owner should resort to his remedy at law to settle the question in the courts. There is, doubtless, force in this consideration. Parties should not be permitted to resort to force to vindicate their rights where peaceable remedies exist. But the question can be as well determined in an action brought by the officer as when it is brought by the owner. The courts all admit that due regard should be had to the rights which the owner has to his property, and that these rights should be protected and secured as far as possible. Now, why should the owner then, when he has possession of that which is his own, be required to give it up to an officer who comes with a process, not against him, but against a third party, with whom he has no connection, and demands possession? See Gilman v. Williams, 7 Wis. 329 (side page). We can perceive no sufficient reason, founded either in law or on public policy, for holding that the owner of personal property may not insist upon his rights, and refuse to surrender the same to an officer, because the latter has attached it on a writ against a third party. The creditor or officer is not without legal redress to test the question of title to the property. It is admitted that the officer is a trespasser if he seizes property not belonging to the defendant in the attachment. Why should his unlawful act be regarded with more favor than the rights of the real owner? True, it is said, the owner of property seized or attached on a process against another has legal remedies by an action, and therefore he ought not to be allowed to protect his goods with a strong hand, for this power may be abused so as to cover the property of the debtor, and the creditor may fail to collect his debt. But, as we have said, the officer, after a levy, may bring an action against anyone who interferes with his possession, and thus settle all rights of property. See Merritt v. Miller, 18 Vt. 416. There is no hardship in this rule. It is surely unnecessary to allow the officer to resort to force and violence to regain possession of attached property, where the law affords him an adequate legal remedy to enforce his rights. To allow him to use force under such circumstances is certainly not essential for the protection of the officer, nor to vindicate the authority of the law. But the question is so fully considered and discussed in the cases to which we have referred that no further remarks upon the subject are called for.

We think the circuit court erred in directing a verdict for the defendants, and that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Rehearing denied.

1. A judicial sale of minors' property to their step-grandmother will, at their request, be set aside when, after the death of their mother and at her request the step-grandmother took charge of them and was virtually constituted their guardian by the probate court and had before the sale at their request taken charge of the property and taken up her residence thereon, although the management of the sale was by law imposed on a stranger, the curator of the estate, and the purchaser acted fairly and in good faith.

2. The five years' Statute of Limitations

NOTE.—Confidential relations between parties.

The rule of the civil law is practiced in our courts of equity, and applied to trustees, agents, and generally to all persons who have been employed in a confidential character in relation to property. Saltmarsh v. Beene, 4 Port. (Ala.) 283, 30 Am. Dec. 523; Parkist v. Alexander, 1 Johns. Ch. 397, 1 L. ed. 186.

The rule holds good as to all advantages gained by means of necessary confidence, growing immediately out of the legal relations of the parties as attorney and client, guardian and ward, etc. Marvin v. Bennett, 26 Wend. 183.

A fundamental doctrine of equity is that a trustee can gain no advantage to himself, to the detriment of those for whom he holds a trust. The object of the rule is to secure fidelity on the part of the trustee, and to preserve the interest of those whose rights are confided to his care. Wright v. Ross, 36 Cal. 432; Parkist v. Alexander, supra; Holridge v. Gillespie, 2 Johns. Ch. 33, 1 L. ed. 236; Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. 400, 1 L. ed. 1126; Slade v. Van Vechten, 11 Paige, 22, 5 L. ed. 42.

Personal interests cannot conflict with fiduciary duty.

No one having duties to discharge of a fiduciary nature shall be allowed to enter into engagements in which he has, or can have, a personal interest, conflicting, or which possibly may conflict, with the interests of those whom he is bound to protect. Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 342; Michoud v. Giron, 45 U. S. 4 How. 503, 11 L. ed. 1076; Campbell v. Johnston, 1 Sandf. Ch. 152, 7 L. ed. 276. See note to Manhattan Cloak & S. Co. v. Dodge (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 369.

This principle applies to the relation of trustee or agent. Olcott v. Tioga R. Co. 27 N. Y. 563; Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 252, 1 L. ed. 355; Moore v. Moore, 4 Sandf. Ch. 48, 7 L. ed. 1018. See Ward v. Smith, 3 Sandf. Ch. 562, 7 L. ed. 963; Tyler v. Sanborn (Ill.) 4 L. R. A. 218.

A purchase by the testamentary guardian of one of the devisees will not be rendered valid by the fact that the ward had another guardian, appointed by the surrogate for the express purpose of representing his interests in that particular transaction (Brasher v. Van Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 242, 1 L. ed. 363); this rule applied in Bostwick v. Atkins, 3 N. Y. 60.

Party cannot purchase property for his own benefit where he has a duty to perform in relation to it.

It is a rule in equity that no party is permitted to purchase an interest in property, and hold it for his own benefit, where he has a duty to perform in relation to such property which is inconsistent with the character of a purchaser on his own account, and for his individual use. Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church, 8 Barb. 142, 5 How. Pr. 6; State v. McKay, 43 Mo. 603; Williams v. Townsend, 31 N. Y. 415; Currie v. Cowles, 6 Bosw. 463; Colburn v. Morton, 3 Keyes, 305, 36 How. A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Phillips County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to set aside a judicial sale of land. Reversed in part. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. U. M. Rose, G. B. Rose and John C. Palmer, for appellants:

The rights of the beneficiaries in trust estates have always been carefully guarded by the laws of this State, particularly in regard to transactions involving titles to land.

Imboden v. Hunter, 23 Ark. 632.

A trustee "in the strict sense of the word" is "a person who holds property upon trust."

Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict.

The probate court decreed that O'Conner and his wife should assist in the management of complainants' property. This made them trustees in the strict sense of the term.

The guardian cannot purchase the property of his ward, either in his own name or by the intervention of a third person.

De Felice, La Legislation Universelle, Tome 13, pp. 480, 486.

2 Domat, Civil Law, §§ 2, 3.

"Trustee" is also used in a wide and perhaps inaccurate sense, to denote that a person has the duty of carrying out a transaction, in which he and another person are interested, in such manner as will be most for the benefit of the latter, and not in such way that he himself might be tempted, for the sake of his personal advantage, to neglect the interests of the other.

2 Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. 1802.

This is the sense in which the word is used in the rule forbidding trustees to buy.

See Jones v. Arkansas Mech. & A. Assn. 38 Ark. 26; West v. Waddill, 33 Ark. 587; Lewin, Tr. p. 484; Underhill, Tr. p. 484; McGaughey v. Brown, 46 Ark. 82; Wright v. Walker, 30 Ark. 44; Livingston v. Cochran, 38 Ark. 301; Black v. Keenan, 5 Dana, 570; Brockett v. Richardson, 61 Miss. 766.

The fact that the sale was conducted by the curator can make no difference.

Powell v. Powell, 80 Ala. 11.

Whether the sale be public or private, the trustee is equally disabled from becoming a purchaser of the trust estate.

Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 259, 1 L. ed. 371.

The court below fell into the error of supposing that the plaintiffs must show some actual fraud in order to sustain their complaint.

This rule was not limited in its application to a particular class of persons, such as trustees, guardians, or solicitors, but went much deeper, and the rule was one of universal application, affecting all persons who came within its principle, which was that no party could be permitted to purchase an interest, where he had a duty to perform which was inconsistent with the character of purchaser. Dickinson v. Codwise, 1 Sandf. Ch. 226, 7 L. ed. 200; Marshall v. Carson, 38 N. J. Eq. 254; Fulton v. Whitney, 66 N. Y. 556.

Any person placed in a situation of trust or confidence in reference to the subject of the sale, or who has a duty to perform which is inconsistent with the character of a purchaser, cannot be a purchaser on his own account. Williams v. Townsend, 31 N. Y. 415.

If an agent employed to sell becomes himself the purchaser, or the agent of another; or if he be an agent to buy, and he becomes himself the seller, or the agent of another in making the sale, the principle is the same.

pal may avoid the sale or purchase in equity. New York Cent. Ins. Co. v. National Prot. Ins. Co. 20 Barb. 471; Reed v. Warner, 5 Paige, 650, 3 L. ed. 893; Van Epps v. Van Epps, supra; Barker v. Marine Ins. Co. 2 Mason, 399; Bennett v. Pratt, 4 Denio, 275.

The law will not permit a trustee to act in the double capacity. Wilcox v. Smith, 26 Barb. 352; Bayer v. Phillips, 17 Abb. N. C. 430; Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 337; Forbes v. Halsey, 26 N. Trustee cannot purchase the objects of the trust.

The trustee of property cannot become its purchaser. He has a duty to perform in regard to it which is entirely inconsistent with his assuming that character. Iddings v. Bruen, 4 Sandf. Ch. 263, 7 L. ed. 1096; Dobson v. Racey, 8 Sandf. Ch. 60, 7 L. ed. 770; Moore v. Moore, 4 Sandf. Ch. 37, 7 L. ed. 1014; Cram v. Mitchell, 1 Sandf. Ch. 251, 7 L. ed. 318.

Trustees are never permitted, without the aid of the court, to buy the property which they hold as such. Carson v. Marshall, 37 N. J. Eq. 215; Staats v. Bergen, 17 N. J. Eq. 297, 554; Fulton v. Whitney, 66 N. Y. 548; Bennett v. Austin, 61 N. Y. 808, 332.

A trustee cannot purchase an outstanding title and hold it for his own use, against his cestui que trust, even though he purchases at a judicial sale under a title superior to that conveyed to him as trustee. Roberts v. Moseley, 64 Mo. 511; Jewett v. Miller, 10 N. Y. 405; Kellogg v. Wood, 4 Paige, 579, 3 L. ed. 569.

A trustee acting in his fiduciary character, and without the intervention of the beneficiary, cannot sell the trust property to himself nor buy his own property from himself for the purposes of the trust. Fox v. Mackreth, 2 Bro. Ch. 400, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 4th Am. ed. 188, 212, 237; Lewis v.

Messrs. Stephenson & Trieber, John J. Harnor and E. C. Harnor, for appellees:

Appellants by their conduct, before and after the confirmation of the sale, having full knowledge of all the facts, are estopped to deny the title of appellee.

No word of dissent or dissatisfaction was expressed by appellants, or either of them, until the filing of the bill in this case, more than six years after the confirmation of the sale, full three years of which existed after the disabilities of each of them were removed. This bars their right of recovery.

Appellants were barred by the Statute of Limitations when the bill was filed.

The bill was filed October 13, 1887, six years and two days after the date of confirmation of the sale, at which time Biscoe and Blanche Hindman had been of full age more than three years; and as to the statute bar, so far as they are concerned, there can be no question.

McGaughey v. Brown, supra; Chandler v. Neighbors, 44 Ark. 479.

As to T. C. Hindman, his disabilities of non-age were removed by the Phillips Circuit Court on November 15, 1881, so that at the time of the filing of the bill more than three years had elapsed, during which he was under no disability.

Judgments of superior courts, even of limited jurisdiction, cannot be collaterally attacked where the court had jurisdiction of the person and subject matter.

The circuit courts of the United States are courts of limited jurisdiction, one of the requisites to give it jurisdiction being that there shall be divers citizenship of the plaintiffs and defendants; yet it has been held that a failure of the record to show the necessary citizenship will not vitiate a judgment of such a court in a collateral proceeding, although on appeal such a judgment would be set aside and reversed.

Garland County v. Gaines, 47 Ark. 558.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In September, 1867, Thomas C. Hindman, and on the 19th of August, 1876, Mary B. Hindman, his wife, died intestate, leaving Susie Hindman, Biscoe Hindman, Thomas C. Hindman, Jr., and Blanche Hindman, their only children, surviving them. Biscoe, Thomas C., and Blanche were minors when their parents died,—Biscoe having been born on the 27th of November, 1861; Thomas C. on the 23d of November, 1863; and Blanche on the 2d of December, 1865. Laura E. O'Conner and the mother of Mrs. Hindman were sisters, and Mrs. O'Conner (Laura E. B.) was the step-grandmother of Mrs. Hindman's children, she having been the wife of their grandfather. When Mrs. Hindman was on her death-bed, she requested Mrs. O'Conner to take charge of her children, and she promised that she would to the best of her ability, and proceeded to do so immediately after the death of Mrs. Hindman, by taking them home with her, and exercising personal supervision over them. On the 5th of September, 1876, Susie, Biscoe, and Thomas C. Hindman filed a petition in the Phillips Probate Court, stating that they and Blanche Hindman were children and heirs-at-law of Mary B. Hindman, deceased; that Biscoe, Thomas C., and Blanche were minors; that they were the owners in their own right of an interest in real estate in the County of Phillips in this State, and equally entitled to a distributive share in the estate of their mother, the late Mary B. Hindman, and representing that their mother had requested that Mrs. O'Conner and her husband should take charge of and have the entire control and custody of her children, and assist in the management of their property interests; and asking that B. Y. Turner be appointed curator of the estate of the minors. On the same day the probate court granted the petition, and B. Y. Turner, having given bond with approved security, was appointed curator of the estate of Biscoe, Thomas C., and Blanche Hindman. The court further ordered that the minors remain in the care and custody of Mrs. O'Conner and her husband, in accordance with the last wish and request of their mother; and appointed J. H. O'Conner, the husband of Mrs. Laura E. B. O'Conner, the attorney and next friend of the minors, "to look after and render such aid and assistance to the curator as may be necessary for their interest." After this the children continued to live with Mrs. O'Conner, and she endeavored to act the part of a mother to them. They were the owners of block 17, in that part of the City of Helena known as New Helena, having thereon a valuable residence, the late home of their father and mother, and other buildings. It became delinquent for taxes for the years 1873, 1874, and 1875, and she redeemed it by paying $396.87, the cost of redemption. Susie, needing money to enable her to attend school and pay her debts, offered to sell and convey to her her (Susie's) interest in the block. She bought it, and became the owner of one undivided fourth of the block. On the 22d of November, 1880, Bart. Y. Turner, curator of the estate of the minor children, presented his petition to the Phillips Probate Court for an order to sell the minors' interest in the block; and the court, finding that it was to the interest of the minors that it should be sold to procure means for their support and education, ordered it to be sold on the 10th of January, 1881. The block was not sold on that day for the want of bidders; and the court again ordered it to be offered for sale, and fixed the 11th of April, 1881, as the day of sale. The entire block, including the one fourth purchased from Susie, with the consent of Mrs. O'Conner, was offered for sale on the last-named day; and Mrs. O'Conner, at the request of the children, bid for the same. She offered $4,000 for the block, and, no one bidding more, she was declared the purchaser. The curator reported the sale to the probate court for confirmation. It having been reported that one A. H. Johnson would have given $4,200, the children were dissatisfied, and filed exceptions to the report. Mrs. O'Conner thereupon offered $4,500, and the $4,000 in the report was changed to $4,500, and the exceptions were withdrawn, and the sale was confirmed by the court, and the property was conveyed to Mrs. O'Conner. Three fourths of the purchase money, amounting to $3,375, which was the proportion due the minor children, have been paid.

To set aside the purchase of the three-fourths interest of the block that belonged to Biscoe, Thomas C., and Blanche Hindman, this action was brought by them since they ceased to be minors. They contend that Mrs. O'Conner of his intestate, such purchase is not merely voidable, but absolutely void. Dwight v. Blackmar, 2 Mich. 330, 57 Am. Dec. 132; Walton v. Torrey, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 259; *Beaubien v. A purchase by an auctioneer, employed by an executor, in which the executor became interested before confirmation, is invalid, both because the auctioneer was agent of the executor and because of the interest acquired by the auctioneer. Terwilliger v. Brown, 44 N. Y. 241, 59 Barb. 13.

Sale may be set aside. See note to Wilson v. Brookshire (Ind.) 9 L. R. A. 792.

was under a disability to purchase, arising from the relation she sustained to them at the time the block was sold. Can they avoid the sale?

As a general rule, a party occupying a relation of trust or confidence to another is, in equity, bound to abstain from doing everything which can place him in a position inconsistent with the duty or trust such relation imposes on him, or which has a tendency to interfere with the discharge of such duty. Upon this principle, no one placed in a situation of trust or confidence in reference to the subject of a sale can be the purchaser, on his own account, of the property sold. If such a one purchases the property, it is in the option of the person interested in the property, and to whom the relation of trust or confidence was sustained, to set aside the sale, within a reasonable time, however innocent the purchaser may be. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 307-323, and cases cited.

In Sugden on Vendors the rule and its reason are expressed as follows: "It may be laid down as a general proposition that trustees, unless they are nominally such, as trustees to preserve contingent remainders, agents, commissioners of bankrupts, assignees of bankrupts, solicitors to the commission, auctioneers, creditors who have been consulted as to the mode of sale, counsel, or any person who, by being employed or concerned in the affairs of another, have acquired a knowledge of his property, are incapable of purchasing such property themselves, except under the restrictions which will shortly be mentioned; for, if persons having a confidential character were permitted to avail themselves of any knowledge acquired in that capacity, they might be induced to conceal their information, and not to exercise it for the benefit of the persons relying on their integrity. The characters are inconsistent. Emptor emit quam minimo potest, venditor vendit quam maximo potest." 2 Sugd. Vend. 7th Am. ed. *887; Michoud v. Girod, 45 U. S. 4. Am. ed. 504, 11 L. ed. 1077.

In Imboden v. Hunter, 28 Ark. 622, this court said: "It is a stern rule of equity that a trustee to sell for others is not allowed to purchase, either directly or indirectly, for his own benefit at the sale. He cannot be both vendor and purchaser. As vendor, it is his duty to sell the property for the highest price; and as purchaser, it is his interest to get it for the lowest; and these relations are so essentially repugnant—so liable to excite a conflict between self-interest and integrity—that the law positively forbids that they shall be united in the same person. And it matters not, in the application of the rule that the sale was bona fide, and for a fair price. The inquiry is not whether there was fraud in fact. In such a case, the danger of yielding to the temptation is so imminent, and the security against discovery so great, that a trust of equity, at the instance of the cestui que trust, if he applies in a reasonable time, will set aside the sale, as of course. The rule is not intended to remedy actual wrong, but is intended to prevent the possibility of it. The situation of the party itself works his disability to purchase. . . . The rule is not confined to persons who are trustees within the more limited and technical signification of the term, or to any particular class of fiduciaries, but applies to all persons placed in a situation of trust or confidence with reference to the subject of the purchase. It embraces all that come within its principle, permitting no one to purchase property, and hold it for his own benefit, where he has a duty to perform in relation to such property, which is inconsistent with the character of a purchaser on his own account, and for his individual use."

Following the rule laid down in Imboden v. Hunter, supra, this court held in Wright v. Walker, 30 Ark. 44, that "the purchase by an attorney, at a tax-sale of land in regard to which he had been retained," was inconsistent with his relations to his client, and could be avoided by the client, notwithstanding there was no bad faith in the purchase. After a careful examination of numerous authorities, it held that it was a well-settled principle that no one can be permitted to purchase an interest when he has a duty to perform that is inconsistent with the character of a purchaser,—quoting the remark of Lord Thurlow in Hall v. Hallett, 1 Cox, Ch. 134, that "no attorney can be permitted to buy in things in a course of litigation, of which litigation he has the management. This the policy of justice will not endure."

In West v. Waddell, 33 Ark. 587, reiterating the doctrine laid down in the cases cited, this court held that a purchase of land at an administrator's sale by the attorney of the administrator was voidable at the instance of the heirs of the intestate to whose estate the land belonged.

In Livingston v. Cochran, 33 Ark. 294, this court, in considering the validity of a purchase of lands by a probate judge at a sale made by an administrator under an order of the court of which he was the judge, after quoting, as we have, from Imboden v. Hunter, said: "All that is above said in relation to trustees purchasing at sales made by them applies, on principle, to the case of a probate judge purchasing at a sale made upon his own order, and which he is obliged to have conducted fairly, and for the benefit of creditors, legatees, or distributees of the estate."

In Clements v. Cates, 49 Ark. 242, this court used the following language: "The law forbids a trustee, and all other persons occupying a fiduciary or quasi fiduciary position, from taking any personal advantage, touching the thing or subject as to which such fiduciary position exists. . . . If such a person acquires an interest in property as to which such a relation exists, he holds it as a trustee for the benefit of those in whose interest he was prohibited from purchasing, to the extent of the prohibition. This rule applies to tenants in common by descent with the same force and reason as it does to persons standing in a direct fiduciary relation to others; for they stand, by operation of law, in a confidential relation to each other, as to the joint property, and the duty is imposed on them to protect and secure their common interests. They have a community of interest which produces a community of duty, and imposes on each one the duty to exercise good faith to the others. Neither one can take advantage of the others by purchasing an outstanding title or incumbrance, and asserting it against them. Such an act would be inconsistent with good faith, and against the reciprocal obligations to do nothing to the prejudice of each other's equal claims which' their relationship created. Such a purchaser, notwithstanding the design of the one making it was to the contrary, would be for the common benefit of all the co-tenants, and the legal title acquired would be held in trust for the others, if they should choose, within a reasonable time, to claim the benefit thereof, by contributing, or offering to contribute, their proportion of the purchase money."

We have quoted at length from the opinions of this court to show the reason and extent of the rule laid down. Its applicability to guardians and wards, and persons standing in like relation is apparent. Judge Story, in speaking on this rule, says: "In the next place, as to the relation of guardian and ward. In this most important and delicate of trusts the same principles prevail, and with a larger and more comprehensive efficiency. It is obvious that, during the existence of the guardianship, the transactions of the guardian cannot be binding upon the ward, if they are of any disadvantage to him; and, indeed, the relative situation of the parties imposes a general inability to deal with each other. But courts of equity proceed yet further in cases of this sort. They will not permit transactions between guardians and wards to stand, even when they have occurred after the minority has ceased, and the relation become thereby actually ended, if the intermediate period be short, unless the circumstances demonstrate, in the highest sense of the terms, the fullest deliberation on the part of the ward, and the most abundant good faith, uberrima fides, on the part of the guardian. For in all such cases the relation is still considered as having an undue influence upon the mind of the ward, and as virtually subsisting, especially if all the duties attached to the situation have not ceased; as, if the accounts between the parties have not been fully settled, or if the estate still remains in some sort under the control of the guardian." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 13th ed. § 817.

Quasi guardians and all other persons occupying the relation of confidential advisers have been held to come within the rule. Retett v. Harcey, 1 Sim. & Stu. 502, 1 Eng. Ch. 502; Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. Jr. 273; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 13th ed. §§ 317, 319, and cases cited; 1 Perry, Tr. § 204; Torrey v. Bank of Orleans, 9 Paige, 668, 4 L. ed. 859; Underhill, Tr. p. 293.

In Hobday v. Peters, 28 Beav. 349, a mortgagor consulted a solicitor, "who turned her over to his clerk to assist her gratuitously." The clerk, by reason of information derived during such employment, bought up the mortgage for less than half the amount due thereon. The court held that the clerk was a trustee for the benefit of the mortgagor. The same was held as to the clerk of a broker employed to make sale of land in Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 327.

The relation sustained by Mrs. O'Conner to the Hindman children, at the time of the sale in question, was peculiarly confidential. A dying mother had committed them to her care. She took them to her house, and treated them as a part of her family. They were the children of her niece, and the grandchildren of a former husband. Her treatment of them was kind, and, with the ties of kindred which existed between them naturally caused them to lean on her for protection and repose in her implicit confidence. She recognized this fact, and sometimes, if not always, responded to their wishes. At their request she moved upon the block in question, and with them occupied the late residence of their parents, and continued to do so some time before, and at the time of, and after the sale. At their request the probate court virtually made her and her husband the guardians of their persons, and they accepted the situation. At their request she paid out $896.87 to redeem their home from a forfeiture for taxes. When the home was offered for sale they wanted her to buy it, and looked to her to save it from the sacrifice. She responded to their request, but failed to meet their expectation. She purchased, but, having heard that another would give more, they were dissatisfied. She increased her bid, and they withdrew all opposition to the confirmation of the sale by the probate court; but they had been disappointed and the final result was a lawsuit.

But it is contended for Mrs. O'Conner that "the position occupied by her, at the time of the application for an order to sell, and the sale of the property purchased by her, imposed no duty upon her as to its conduct or management;" that the conduct and management of the sale was, by the law, imposed upon Turner, as curator, and that she acted fairly and in good faith. For this among other reasons, her counsel insist that the sale should not be set aside.

In support of their contention, they cite and rely upon Jones v. Graham, 36 Ark. 383. In that case the facts were: An administrator reported to the probate court that there had come into his possession a deed of trust of certain lands, executed in 1860, by one Sullivan to George W. Beasley, to secure to the intestate a debt of about $5,500. "That he had directed the trustee to sell under the power; that he had attended the sale, and finding the lands were about to go below value, had himself bid the sum of $3,040, and the lands were upon that bid struck off, no one being willing to bid more. He represented that he had no desire to keep the lands, but was willing to hold them as the property of the estate, if the court should deem it best; and submitted the matter to the court to say whether he should keep them as his own, charging himself with the net price, after paying expenses or hold them as administrator for the benefit of the estate." The court ordered him to keep the lands as his own, and to receipt to the estate for the proceeds of the sale, less the amount of the indebtedness of his intestate to himself. In pursuance of this order, he, in his settlement, charged himself with the sum of $2,715.50, as proceeds of the sale. The settlement was laid over until the second term of the court after it was filed, a period of nearly six months, when it was taken up and confirmed without objection. This court held that the whole proceeding of the court upon the report of the administrator was unauthorized and irregular; that the administrator became clothed, upon the purchase, with a constructive trust because of the use of the means of the estate in making the purchase, and also because of his fiduciary relation to the estate; and was wearing it when he went into the probate court to ask, if deemed best, that he should be denuded, by accounting for the proceeds; and that the order of the probate court had no greater effect than mere advice as to the probable future action of the court upon his settlement, when the same should be made. But this court, nevertheless, refused to disturb the sale. Why? The reasons assigned are: Constructive trusts are at the option of those entitled to claim the benefits: that they may leave the property in the hands of the trustee, and accept the proceeds, in accordance with the legal title, and that election, deliberately and intelligently made, dispels the trust; and that in that case the action of the probate court, "in view of the obvious absence of all fraudulent intent, the length of time that the settlement lay unchallenged and its first confirmation," amounted to an election to take the proceeds and discharge the trust.

In Jones v. Graham the court said that it did not mean to say "that, ordinarily, the approval of a sale, or dealing with the proceeds by a probate court, would relieve a purchaser of a constructive trust;" that, ordinarily, it would not; that that case was a peculiar case, not likely to arise again; that it stood on its own peculiar grounds, with such distinctions from reported cases as will be sufficiently obvious; and that it was not like the case of an administrator or attorney who simply purchases for himself, with the design of acquiring the property, and who has the sale confirmed without question or explanation of the circumstances. Whether the court was correct in its conclusion or not it is not necessary for us to say, but it is evident that the court did not intend to repudiate the rule announced in former cases. That case was regarded as exceptional. But this case does not come within the exception as laid down in that case. Here the purchaser bought for herself, with the design of acquiring the property. Three of the Hindman children were minors. She was quasi guardian of their persons, and stood to them in the place of a parent. They were under her care and protection, and the property sold was and had been in her possession. They were not sui juris, and could not act for themselves. If the curator had failed to discharge his duty in the management of their property, and in making settlements in the probate court, it was the duty of her and her husband, if of anyone, to have interfered in their behalf and asserted their rights. No election to accept the proceeds and ratify the sale could have been made by them while the disabilities of minority rested upon them, and none can be imputed to them on account of any act or failure of theirs while such disabilities continued.

The doctrine as to purchases by trustees, guardians, administrators, and persons having a confidential character arises from the relation between the parties, and not from the circumstance that they have power to control the sale. The right to set aside the sale does not depend on its fairness or unfairness. To set aside the purchase, it is not necessary to show that it was actually fraudulent or advantageous. If the trustee or other person having a confidential character, can buy in an honest case, he may in a case having that appearance, but which may be grossly otherwise; and yet the power of the court, because of the infirmity of human testimony, would not be equal to detect the deception. It is to guard against this uncertainty, and the hazard of abuse, and to remove the trustee and other persons having confidential relations from temptation, that the rule does and will permit the cestui que trust or other person to come at his option, and, without showing actual injury or fraud, have the sale set aside. Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 252, 1 L. ed. 885; Torrey v. Bank of Orleans, 9 Paige, 668, 4 L. ed. 859; Ex parte James, 8 Ves. Jr. 845; Brockett v. Richardson, 61 Mass. 766; Van Epps v. Van Epps, 9 Paige, 287, 4 L. ed. 682; Campbell v. Walker, 5 Ves. Jr. 678, 18 Ves. Jr. 601; Callis v. Ridout, 7 Gill & J. 1; Ex parte Lacey, 6 Ves. Jr. 625; Ex parte Bennett, 10 Ves. Jr. 881; Campbell v. Pennsylvania L. Ins. Co. 2 Whart. 62; Michoud v. Girod, 45 U. S. 4 How. 557, 11 L. ed. 1100, and cases before cited; McGaughey v. Brown, 46 Ark. 25.

Mrs. O'Conner comes within the rule. She was virtually constituted guardian of the persons of the minor children by the order of the probate court. Her husband was appointed their attorney and next friend to look after them, and to render such aid and assistance to the curator as might be necessary for their interest. She and her husband took possession of their property, and she redeemed it. How far the curator was controlled by them does not appear, but it does appear that he permitted them to take charge of their property, obviously on account of their relation to the children. They had ample opportunities, by reason of their relation to the children, to acquire full knowledge of the property. Whether they acquired information by reason of such relation, which, if known to the public, would have caused the property to have been sold for more than it did, is not, under the rule, necessary to inquire. She occupied a confidential relation to the children, approaching nearly to that of parent to child. Whether she abused it, no inquiry, under the rule, can be made. She and her husband assumed the duty of taking care of the children and looking after their property. While she sustained that position she was not permitted to purchase their property, because the right to do so might have interfered with a faithful discharge of her duty.

Mrs. O'Conner relies on the five years' Statute of Limitations to sustain her title. That Statute provides: "All actions against the purchaser, his heirs, or assigns for the recovery of lands sold at judicial sales, shall be brought within five years after the date of such sale, and not thereafter; saving to minors and persons of unsound mind the period of three years after such disability shall have been removed." Appellants insist that that Statute has no application to an action like this, the object of which is to set aside a sale of land for fraud. So McGaughey v. Brown, 46 Ark. 25, was an action to set aside a sale of land for fraud. The prayer of the bill in that case was that the sale be set aside; that a master be appointed to take an account of the rents and profits; that the conveyances of the land, which were alleged to be fraudulent, be removed as a cloud upon the title of plaintiffs; and that they be put into the possession of the land. This court held that the object of the bill was to get possession of the land, and that the action was barred by the five years' statute.

In this case the prayer of the complaint is that the sale be set aside; that an account be taken between the plaintiffs and defendants, as to the rents and profits of the block in question, and the sums paid by defendant for the benefit of plaintiffs; and that "the correct and true balance be ascertained between them;" and that said property be sold for purposes of partition and to satisfy the balance found by the master, and for other relief. One of the obvious objects of the complaint was the recovery of the land. That was necessary to accomplish the purpose of the action. The Statute applies.

The sale in question was confirmed on the 11th day of October, 1881. Mrs. O'Conner held adverse possession after that date. This action was brought on the 13th of October, 1887, at which time Biscoe and Blanche Hindman had been of age more than three years, and were barred from maintaining it. Three years had not expired when Thomas C. arrived of age; but it is said his disabilities of nonage were removed by the Phillips Circuit Court on the 15th of November, 1881, and that at the time this action was commenced more than three years had elapsed, during which he was under no disability. On the other hand, it is contended that the judgment of the circuit court which declared his disabilities removed was void for want of jurisdiction.

The authority to remove the legal disabilities of minors was conferred upon circuit courts by an Act of the General Assembly which was approved February 18, 1869. Mansf. Dig. § 1362. Section 2 of the Act, after providing that circuit courts shall have authority to remove legal disabilities of minors, adds: "Provided, the person praying such relief shall be a resident of the county in which the court to which such application shall be made is held." The Act makes the residence jurisdictional,—a condition upon which the court can remove the disabilities of the minor.

The record shows that Biscoe and Thomas C. Hindman made an application to the Circuit Court of the County of Phillips for the removal of their disabilities, and that their application was granted. It does not appear in their application, or in the order removing their disabilities, that either of them was a resident of Phillips County. Is the order void for want of jurisdiction?

In Harvey v. Tyler, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 328, 842, 17 L. ed. 871, 878, the Supreme Court of the United States uses the following language: "The jurisdiction which is now exercised by the common-law courts in this country is, in a very large proportion, dependent upon special statutes conferring it. . . . In all cases when the new powers thus conferred are to be brought into action in the usual form of common-law or chancery proceedings, we apprehend there can be little doubt that the same presumption as to the jurisdiction of the court, and the conclusiveness of its action, will be made as in 13 L. R. A.

cases falling more strictly within the usual powers of the court. On the other hand, powers may be conferred on the court, and duties required of it, to be exercised in a special, and often summary, manner, in which the order or judgment of the court can only be supported by a record which shows that it had jurisdiction of the case."

In Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 350, 371, 21 L. ed. 959, 964, the court said: "But where the special powers conferred are exercised in a special manner, not according to the course of the common law, or where the general powers of the court are exercised over a class not within its ordinary jurisdiction, upon the performance of prescribed conditions, no such presumption of jurisdiction will attend the judgment of the court. The facts essential to the exercise of the special jurisdiction must appear in such cases upon the record." To the same effect, see Pulaski Co. v. Stuart, 28 Gratt. 872; Gibney v. Crawford, 51 Ark. 35; Foster v. Waterman, 124 Mass. 592; Furgeson v. Jones, 17 Or. 204, 3 L. R. A. 620; Brown v. Wheelock, 75 Tex. 385; 1 Black, Judgm. § 279; Freem. Judgm. § 123.

The power to remove the disabilities of minors is a special power conferred upon the circuit courts, and is to be exercised in a summary manner, and not according to the course of the common law. The record does not show the fact—the residence of the minors in Phillips County—necessary to give the Phillips Circuit Court authority to remove the disabilities of Biscoe and Thomas C. Hindman, and the order declaring the removal of their disabilities is void.

This action is not barred as to Thomas C. Hindman. He has not ratified the sale of the block in question by receiving any part of the proceeds thereof since he arrived of age. He is entitled to one fourth of the block, and to one fourth of the rents and profits which have accrued since the 11th of October, 1881, the day on which the sale was confirmed by the probate court, and Mrs. O'Conner is entitled to the remaining three fourths of the block, and of the rents and profits. He should be charged, in account with Mrs. O'Conner, with the proceeds of the sale paid to him, or for him to anyone authorized to receive the same, and lawful interest thereon from the date of the payment, and with one fourth of the taxes paid by her on the block since the sale and interest thereon, and one fourth of the value of the improvements made by her on the block since the sale, and credited with one fourth of the rents and profits. If the property can be divided without prejudice to the interest of the parties concerned, it should be partitioned between them according to their respective interests; and if not, it should be sold, and the proceeds of the sale divided according to their interests. Upon an account being stated as to the rents, profits, purchase money received by Thomas C. Hindman, interest, taxes and improvements, the balance should be made a charge on the part or interest in the block, or in the proceeds of the sale thereof, if it be sold for partition, belonging to the party against whom it is found, and the payment of it (the charge) should be enforced according to the rules of equity.

The decree of the court below is therefore affirm^d as to Biscoe and Blanche Hindman, and as to Thomas C. Hindman is reversed, and the cause is remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Edward ROBERTS, Respt.,

v.

NEW YORK ELEVATED R. CO. et al.,
Appts.

(172 N. Y. 455.)

1. In an action by a landowner to compel a company operating an elevated railroad in the street in front of his property to pay the damage done him by cutting off the easements of light, air and access connected with such property, an expert witness cannot be permitted to state what, in his opinion, the amount of such damage is, nor what would have been the present value of the land if the road had not been built.
2. The admission of incompetent evidence will not be held to be nonprejudicial to defendant in an action to enjoin an elevated railroad company from operating its road until it pays the damage done to an abutting property owner, because the company is not bound to pay the ascertained damages to acquire the easement but may submit to the injunction and proceed to acquire the right by eminent domain.

(October 20, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries caused to plaintiff's property by the construction and operation of defendants' road. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Julien T. Davies and Brainard Tolles, for appellants:

The conclusions of the witness upon the very matters which the court had to decide, viz., the existence and amount of damages, were not competent evidence.

In New Hampshire, Illinois, and Wisconsin the decisions are conflicting and uncertain, with the weight of authority in favor of the exclusion of such evidence. In Arkansas the decisions are uniform to the effect that such evidence should be excluded, except in Texas & St. L. R. Co. v. Kirby, 44 Ark. 106, where there is a dictum to the contrary. In Pennsylvania no case can be found which is in point, White Deer Creek Imp. Co. v. Sassaman, 67 Pa. 415, really turning on another point. The same is true of Connecticut.

With these exceptions it is believed that every State whose decisions are regarded as of importance has adopted the rule excluding evidence of this character.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question in this case is in regard to the admissibility of the opinions of experts in reference to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of injury to his easements of light, air, and access to his property in Third Avenue, in the City of New York, caused by the building and operation of the defendants' railroad. As the question is one of considerable importance, and arises in each one of this class of cases, and as the number of such cases tried and to be tried is, as we understand, very large, a critical examination of the question is called for. It will be well to have a clear view of the facts existing at the time that the questions in controversy were put to the witness, so that we may determine understandingly the precise point in issue.

It appears that the plaintiff, in November, 1852, became the owner in fee of the premises in question, which consisted originally of six lots on the east side of Third Avenue and on the south side of Ninety-ninth Street, but the plaintiff subsequently sold some, leaving himself with a frontage of about 100 feet on Third Avenue, and about 110 feet in depth. These lots cost the plaintiff about $500 apiece at the time he purchased them; at which time they were vacant, and they so remained until 1865, when the plaintiff leased them for $150 per year. The tenant erected a house upon the corner lot, with a stable, which buildings were destroyed by fire about 1877, at which time the tenant gave up his lease, and 18 L. R. A.

the lots remained vacant until 1881. In the meantime the plaintiff filled them in, and graded them. Before filling in, the premises formed a portion of a marsh or swamp over which the tide ebbed and flowed. In 1881 the plaintiff sold these lots under a contract for $40,000, and the purchaser commenced the erection thereon of the present buildings, five in number, four of which front on Third Avenue and the fifth on Ninety-ninth Street, each house being four stories high, constructed of brick with brown-stone trimmings. The buildings are about forty-seven feet front elevation and sixty-five feet deep, and cost about $11,000 each. The purchaser had them substantially inclosed and the plastering nearly completed in the spring of 1883, when the plaintiff foreclosed his liens thereon and took them from him, and completed them, so that they were ready for occupancy in the fall of the year 1888. Since the month of October, 1883, the buildings have been leased to tenants, and the rents actually collected from the Third Avenue buildings from January 1, 1884, to January 1, 1889, have been from one house and lot, $7,058; from the second, $6,129.11; from the third, $7,554.50; and from the fourth, $7,541.66. The defendants' railroad was constructed in Third Avenue in front of plaintiff's lots in the year 1878, and was put in operation in December of that year. The plaintiff in his complaint alleged that the building of the railroad was unlawful, and that the unlawful construction thereof interfered with his access to his premises, and impaired his easement in the street or avenue by depriving him of a large portion of light and air, and of facility of access to them, in the amount of $75,000, and that by reason of the maintaining and operation and managing of defendants' railways the value and the use and enjoyment of his premises, he alleged, had been depreciated and diminished to the amount of $5,000 per annum. He demanded judgment against the defendants, restraining them from operating their road through Third Avenue in front of his premises, and also from continuing the unlawful acts set forth in his complaint; and he asked that the damages he had sustained down to the commencement and during the pendency of this action be adjusted by the court, and that he might have judgment therefor against the defendants, and each of them, and that he might have such other relief as should be just and equitable. The defendants joined issue with the plaintiff in regard to many of his allegations, and set up that the defendants were organized under the laws of the State of New York, granting them the right to use the street in question for the purpose of building their railroad, and that they had built it and equipped it, and used and operated it, under such Acts of the Legislature, and in the most careful and skillful manner in which it was possible to construct, use, and operate the same in the street mentioned in the complaint.

Upon the trial of the action the plaintiff was a witness, and after stating the condition of the premises, and the fact that he had erected or caused to be erected buildings upon them at an expense of about $11,000 each, he said that he had offered the whole premises for sale, including the house on Ninety-ninth Street, about two years previous, which would have been in the fall of 1887, for the sum of $105,000, and that in his judgment that was a fair price for them. Here is certainly a very large appreciation in value over the original cost. Would it have been as much if the railroad had not been built? It will be seen that the present buildings were not erected until some two years after the building of the road had been completed, and the operation thereof commenced. Whether the value of the property would have been still greater without the road than it now is with it, was the fact to be found by the court.

Upon the trial a witness was called on behalf of the plaintiff, and testified that he was a real-estate broker, and had carried on that occupation in the City of New York for 28 years; his transactions had extended throughout the whole city, and had involved both leasing and selling; that he knew the property in question, and was familiar with the value of that property, and of the property in the neighborhood; that he had made an examination of the property with a view of seeing what the physical effects to the abutting property were, produced by the railroad and its trains, commencing at least six months ago, on four or five different occasions; that he had given special attention to the effect upon abutting property produced by the elevated railroad, and the passing of its trains; that he had been examined a large number of times as a witness on the subject, and in reference to property scattered all over the city; that he had made it his business to be familiar not only with the selling but the rental values of property along Third Avenue since the railroad came there; that he had informed himself about such transactions, not only in reference to this property, but other property; that, so far as experience from personal transactions was concerned, he had none in that vicinity since the building of the railroad, in renting or in selling; that he had been engaged by property owners for the last three years to make examinations and testify as an expert witness, and it had been a considerable part of his business, and in every case in which he had testified he had testified against the Railroad Company; that he was paid $100 to come and give these opinions; he did not know but that the property at the upper end of Third Avenue had been benefited to some extent; his opinion was that rapid transit had helped Harlem; that the building up of the upper end of Harlem had been due to the growth and filling up of all the cross-streets; that the growth and filling up of the cross-streets had been due to the rapid transit afforded by the elevated railroad in large part. The following question was put to him: "To what extent, if at all, in your judgment, is the value of Mr. Roberts' four buildings on the Third Avenue—excluding from consideration the house on 99th Street—to what extent, in your judgment, is the value of that property damaged, if at all, by the presence of the structure and the running of the trains?" Under objection and exception the answer was permitted, and the witness stated that the diminution extended from about $110,000 to $80,000, including the loss to the fee value simply. The court then said: "That is, you 13 L. R. A.

think that the four houses fronting on Third Avenue are worth $80,000 now?" Witness: "Yes, sir." Court: "And that they would be worth $110,000 if the structure and road were not there?" Witness: "Yes, sir." Question: "What do you estimate the rental value of the property to be, the railroad not being there?" I refer to the Third Avenue front only." Same objection and exception. Answer: "$90,000." Q. "And with the railroad there?" A. "$6,400; as collectible rents, I mean."

Upon this appeal, the question is: Were these objections of the defendant properly overruled? By resorting to a court of equity, and seeking the aid of such court to prevent the operation of the defendant's road until all his damages consequent upon the illegal construction of its road in front of his premises have been paid once for all, the plaintiff has brought before the court the question, What were the damages to the fee of the premises owned by him, consequent upon this wrongful act of the defendant? The amount of damages thus caused to plaintiff's fee is the precise question which the court or jury must determine, and for such amount the court gives judgment, upon condition of the plaintiff executing a deed to the defendant of the property wrongfully taken or interfered with by it.

The first question asked of this witness, to which exception is taken, as above noted, calls for his opinion as to the amount of such damage; and the second question is of substantially the same nature, except that it refers to the injury of the rental value of the property instead of the injury to the fee. The precise and specific question which is to be determined by the court and jury is by this interrogatory placed before the witness for his opinion and decision. To permit it to be asked and answered is, beyond all question, against the great mass of authority in this and other States. It is now asked that this court, in view of the alleged abnormal character of the litigations growing up in the City of New York over the erection and operation of these elevated railroads, shall sanction in regard to them a departure from well-established rules of law touching the admission of expert evidence. It seems to me that neither the nature nor the extent of the litigation affords the slightest justification for such departure. Expert evidence, so called, or in other words evidence of the mere opinion of witnesses, has been used to such an extent that the evidence given by them has come to be looked upon with great suspicion by both courts and juries; and the fact has become very plain that in any case where opinion evidence is admissible the particular kind of an opinion desired by any party to the investigation can be readily procured by paying the market price therefor. We have said lately that the rules admitting the opinions of experts should not be unnecessarily extended, because experience has shown that it is much safer to confine the testimony of witnesses to facts, in all cases where that is practicable, and leave the jury to exercise their judgment and experience on the facts proved. As is stated by Earl, J., in Ferguson v. Hubbell, 97 N. Y. 507: "It is generally safer to take the judgments of unskilled jurors than the opinions of hired and generally biased experts." It is the general rule that testimony should consist of facts and not opinions, and the admission of opinions forms an exception to that general rule. Mr. Justice Cowen said, in speaking of the opinions of witnesses as to the then present value of real estate, that they were barely admissible, and that to receive them at all was a departure from the general rule of evidence, and that judges who preside at nisi prius sometimes have reason to regret that they should in practice form an exception. He referred to Rochester v. Chester, 3 N. H. 349, 364-366, where the court refused to receive the opinions of witnesses as to the value of land, even from those skilled in the market. They said the land must be described, and the jury must then judge from facts. See Re Pearl Street, 19 Wend. 654. I refer to this, not for the purpose of throwing any doubt upon the admissibility of expert evidence upon the question of the past or present value of real estate, where the witness is shown to be competent to give an opinion thereon,—that has been decided years ago by this court, and has been continuously approved since that time (see Clark v. Baird, 9 N. Y. 183); but I cite it for the purpose of showing the opinion of learned judges regarding evidence of this kind when it first came into practice, and the questions thereon first came up for decision. The only inquiry here is whether this is one of those cases in which the testimony is allowable.

The precise question has been decided by this court as lately as 117 N. Y. 219, and in McGeen v. Manhattan R. Co. The question there asked was, "What would have been the fair rental value in the years 1879, 1880, and 1881, if the railroad had not been built?" and we decided it to be improper. It was so held because it is merely speculative, and it is speculative upon the very question and upon the only question which the court or jury is called upon to decide, and the question calls for the opinion of the witness upon that very subject. Some criticism has been made in regard to that case by the learned counsel for the plaintiff herein, and we are asked substantially to review it, and to reverse our decision therein. We have carefully considered the arguments of counsel on both sides, and have again looked through the cases decided in this court upon the subject, and we are unable to see that there has been any error in the McGeen Case, but on the contrary we think it is in strict conformity with the law as heretofore laid down by this court.

I shall refer to but a few of the cases cited by the appellant herein to sustain his claim that the court below erred in admitting the question in controversy. They are all contained in his very voluminous brief upon the subject, submitted to us, and out of them the following are all that I deem it necessary to comment upon. Morehouse v. Mathews, 2 N. Y. 514, was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for a breach of contract by the defendant in not feeding to the plaintiff's cattle as good hay as had been agreed upon. The plaintiff asked a witness what damage had occurred in consequence of feeding the cattle upon the hay in question instead of that agreed upon. Under objection the witness answered, and stated that he thought the damage would be $50. This court reversed the judgment on the ground that the evidence had been erroneously admitted, and stated that the question called simply for the opinion of the witness as to the amount of damage sustained by the plaintiff. Van Deusen v. Young, 29 N. Y. 9, was an action under the Revised Statutes to recover treble damages for cutting trees on a certain piece of land owned by the plaintiffs who were remaindermen subject to a life estate. A witness was asked, "What, in your opinion, is the difference in value of the farm by the removal of the timber?" and also, "Would the farm be worth more or less with the timber cut off?" Davies, J. held that the questions were objectionable as calling for a speculative opinion and not for facts, and referred to McGregor v. Brown, 10 N. Y. 114; and Mullin, J., said: "It was unquestionably competent for the witness to give his opinion as to the value of the farm with the timber on, and its value after it was taken off. The difference between the two may be the damages, and, in cases where the damages are arrived at by merely subtracting one sum from another, it may seem to be refining overmuch to refuse the witness the right to make the subtraction himself, and declare the result: for this is what he is called on to do when asked to give his opinion as to the amount of damages." The learned judge was speaking of a case where the witness knew the farm in question, knew it when the timber was on it, and knew what its value then was, and, the timber having been cut off, he knew what the value of the land was with the timber thus cut off; and, in a case where the difference between the two would be the legal damages, it does not even then follow that a witness may be asked the bald question, "What amount of damages had the plaintiff sustained?" The reason is that the rule of damages is a question of law, and the witness upon such a question might adopt a rule of his own, and hold the defendant responsible beyond the legal measure. In Marley v. Shultz, 29 N. Y. 346, the court, per Denio, J., held that a witness could not be allowed to state his opinion of the amount of damages. That was in an action for damages for raising a dam so as to overflow the plaintiff's house. The learned judge said the witness could describe the character of the overflow and its effect, and then it would be for the jury to estimate the damages; that what was offered was in substance an opinion as to the amount of the damages which the plaintiff had sustained by the wrongful act of the defendant. This court, in Green v. Plank, 48 N. Y. 669, in an action of replevin for a canal boat, reversed a judgment for the plaintiff where the witness had been asked to state the damages for taking and withholding the boat during the time the defendant had it. In Ferguson v. Hubbard, supra, which was an action for damages for a fire claimed to have been negligently set, from which the plaintiff sustained damage to his land, a farmer was called as a witness for defendant, and asked the question: "What do you say as to whether it was a proper time or not to burn a fallow?"

The testimony was said to have been erroneously admitted. In Van Wycklen v. Brooklyn, 118 N. Y. 424, the question of the admissibility of expert evidence is discussed, and held to be allowable only when, from the nature of the case, the facts cannot be stated or described to the jury in such a manner as to enable them to form a correct judgment thereon, and no better evidence than such opinions is attainable. In Avery v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 121 N. Y. 81, which was an action for damages on account of the violation of a covenant to keep a proper opening from the defendant's depot yard, opposite the plaintiff's hotel, the plaintiff was asked this question: "Do you know what the rental value of your Continental property, real and personal, would have been between the 10th day of September, 1881, and the 28th day of January, 1884, if there had been a sufficient opening kept and maintained by the defendant opposite your hotel, for the convenient access of passengers and their baggage to and from the twenty-foot strip of land lying south of the hotel?" This evidence was held to be improper. Judge Gray, in delivering the opinion of this court, said: "The witness should not have been permitted to give his opinion upon that head. His testimony should have been confined to stating facts. He might have described the condition of his property. He could have given evidence of what the defendant did to or upon the land over which he claimed to possess rights. He could have stated what his business was, and what it amounted to, at times prior and subsequent to any change in the situation and circumstances surrounding its conduct; and it would then be for the jury to draw the conclusions from the facts stated as to whether plaintiff had been injured by the defendant, and what amount of damages he should recover." In Norman v. Wells, 17 Wend. 136, it was held by the old supreme court that the amount of indemnity, when it is not capable of being reached by computation, is always a question for the jury. It was stated that, if there be any rule without exception, it is this; and the court was unable to find any instance where the opinion of a witness has been received upon that particular question. The action was on covenant for damages to the plaintiff by the erection of another mill on the same stream with plaintiff's mill, and a witness was asked the damages which in his opinion the plaintiff had sustained by reason of the erection of such mill. The question was allowed at circuit, and a new trial was granted for the error in allowing it.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff has cited a number of cases on his side, which he claims are authorities for the question put to the witness herein. The briefs of both counsel exhibit untiring industry and research, and all the cases that have been decided involving questions of this nature, both in this and other States, would seem to have been found and cited on the one brief or the other. It is impossible to notice them all, and I shall not make the attempt. Special reliance seems to have been placed, by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, upon the cases I now refer to. In Clark v. Baird, 9 N. Y. 188, the point decided was that the opinions of a witness acquainted with real estate, the value of which was in dispute, were competent upon the question of such value. It was an action on the case by the purchaser of a tavern stand against his vendor for fraudulently misrepresenting the boundaries of the land. A witness for the plaintiff testified that he had examined the tavern stand with a view of buying it, and that "it was worth $1,000 if it extended to the race and trees. The strip taken off would reduce it one fourth." This testimony was objected to on the ground that the amount of damage could not be ascertained by the opinion of the witness. The objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted. Part of the alleged fraud consisted of the statement that the tavern stand extended to the race and trees. The plaintiff claimed that as matter of fact it did not extend so far. The learned judge, in the course of his opinion, said that the witness had in substance stated the value of the stand, including all the land it was represented to include, and also, in contrast with that statement, and as bearing upon the question of damages, had further stated the value of the stand excluding that part which, as the plaintiff contended, did not pass by the defendant's conveyance to the plaintiff by reason of his want of title. I do not see that the case affords any countenance for the claim of the plaintiff herein. The witness simply stated the value of the tavern as it stood, estimating that a certain amount of ground in plain view was attached to the stand, and then stated what in his opinion was the value of the land with that particular piece of land not included. Within any rule regarding the opinions of experts, we think this evidence admissible. In Rochester & S. R. Co. v. Budlong, 10 How. Pr. 289, which was a proceeding by plaintiff to take defendant's property by the right of eminent domain, the opinion of the general term of the supreme court was delivered by Justice Selden, in 1854. It contains expressions which favor the views contended for here by plaintiff's counsel, and it includes all that can be said in favor of the admission of this kind of evidence. The opinion has not been followed by the courts of this State, and many subsequent decisions of this court, some of which have already been cited, are at war with the doctrines announced by Mr. Justice Selden. The case cannot be regarded as authority in this State at the present time. See also Harpending v. Shoemaker, 87 Barb. 270; Simons v. Monier, 29 Barb. 419.

In Hine v. New York Elev. R. Co., 36 Hun, 293, which was an action brought to recover damages for the obstruction of light, air and access to the plaintiff's premises by reason of the construction of the defendant's road, a real estate broker was called on the part of the defendant, who, after stating that he was familiar with the premises in question, was asked this question: "What has been the effect, in your opinion, of the Elevated Railroad upon the value of the property, so far as the items of light, air and access are concerned?" Upon the plaintiff's objection the question was excluded, and the court held that this was error. The court in the course of the opinion, which was delivered by Davis, P. J., said that "the answer to the question should have been received. The witness was an expert, and that fact was sufficiently shown to entitle him to express an opinion on the subject. The opinion called for related to the precise question of damages, which, as will be seen, the court submitted to the jury, and there is no reason why the opinions of experts are not admissible upon those questions." No case is cited in the opinion, and what I have quoted is all the learned judge said in regard to the admissibility of evidence of this kind. The case is not in harmony with the cases in this court, and should not be followed. The evidence is open to all the objections spoken of, in that it puts the witness in the place of the court and jury, and is only his opinion upon the very point to be decided by them.

In Kenkele v. Manhattan R. Co., 55 Hun, 398, an action similar to the one at bar, and where, as here, the defendant had neglected to take proceedings to condemn the property of the plaintiff, the general term of New York held that the measure of damages was the difference, at the time of the trial, between the value of the property to which the easements were appurtenant, with the easements, and its value without them. The manner of proving such difference was not discussed. Mr. Justice Van Brunt, in the course of his opinion in that case, after stating what he regarded the true rule of damages to be, said: "We do not think that the court of appeals has as yet condemned the rule. Until they do, justice seems to require that it should be followed." It is stated as one of the grounds for the motion for a new trial in that case that incompetent evidence upon the subject of damages had been given, but it does not appear what that incompetent evidence was. The learned judge said: "The evidence as to the value of these easements is necessarily, from the very nature of the case, somewhat conjectural, and stringent and strict rules are not to be applied where they would deprive the owner of all proof of damage, as we are dealing with the damage done by a trespasser; and, while damages should be proven with reasonable certainty, the rights and interests of the owner of these easements should not be sacrificed." That is undoubtedly true. Continuing, the learned judge said: "What more certain evidence of the value of these easements can be given than by proof of what the property to which they are appurtenant would now be worth with the easements and what it is worth without these easements?" Evidence as to what the value of the property would be with the easements alluded to, unaffected by defendant's acts, is proper. No dispute arises on that point. The controversy arises when the fact of that value is to be sworn to as an opinion by a so-called "expert," and which opinion, speculative and uncertain as it must be, is directed to the very point which the jury is to determine. Evidence upon the subject of this speculative value,—a value which in fact does not and cannot exist,—should be confined to those facts which the court shall hold to be material for a fair and intelligent judgment; and then the inferences to be deduced from them may be drawn just as well by the jury as by the expert, and in all probability much more fairly. This case is one where the facts which form the basis of opinion can be specified, and should be stated, and the inference to be drawn from those facts should be drawn by the court or by the jury.

A sufficient number of cases have been cited on both sides, I think, to place fairly before us the different reasons for the different views which would exclude or permit evidence of this nature to be laid before a jury. There can be no doubt, as I have already observed, that the great weight of authority, both in the supreme court and in this court, is against the introduction of this evidence; and, indeed, there is no reason why it should be introduced. Expert evidence of the value of real estate is proper, and in many cases essential. The present value of the property of the plaintiff can be proved by expert evidence,—both the value of the fee and the rental value. Both classes of values could also be proved by expert evidence, as of a time immediately prior to the building of this road. They are facts which now exist, or which once existed; and, if the expert have knowledge of them, he should be permitted to state it. As to what the value would have been under wholly different circumstances, he knows and can know nothing, but must form an opinion wholly speculative in its nature, which opinion must be based upon data perfectly easy for him to state, and from which, when once stated, an ordinarily intelligent jury can draw as just and fair an inference of a possible value as could the expert. And that very inference must in some way be drawn by the jury, for it is the question it is called upon to decide. The opinion of the expert, if of the least value, would have to be based upon an intelligent consideration and knowledge of the value of other property as nearly as may be similarly situated, in about the same quarter of the town, and under nearly the same circumstances, but without the presence of a railroad of the nature of the defendants' in front of the property. All this information he could easily impart to the jury. Proof might be made of the filling up of the side streets along the lines of this railroad, and of the incoming of a large population; the erection of buildings somewhat similar to plaintiff's, and their rental and fee value; and finally a general statement of the condition and value of property in the neighborhood of that in question could be proved. All these facts would be of service in determining the question to be submitted to the jury. When they are all stated, and past and present values proved, the jury or the court will then be as fully competent to draw the inference which it is its peculiar province and duty to draw as the expert. This special question is one which all admit is to some extent and in all cases a matter of conjecture and speculation. How much the appreciation of property is itself due to the erection of the road, and the consequent filling up of the neighborhood opened by it, and whether the property without the construction of the road would ever have become as valuable as it is, are questions which, when these various data have been given, can be speculated upon as well by the judicial tribunal as by the hired expert. It is none the less conjecture and speculation because the expert is willing to swear to his opinion. He comes on the stand to swear in favor of the party calling him, and it may be said he always justifies by his works the faith that has been placed in him. This case is a good illustration of what may be almost termed the wholly worthless character, for any judicial purpose, of the testimony on both sides upon this one point, as to what would be the value of this property if this railroad had not been built. The experts on the part of the plaintiff guessed that it would have been $80,000 more valuable, while those on the part of the appellant (equally intelligent, it would seem, and equally honest) thought that the value of the property would have been less if the railroad had not been built. The court is not in the least aided by these various guesses of these hired experts. If the facts upon which these gentlemen based their guesses are placed before the court more exact justice will in my judgment be the result if their speculations be excluded, and all speculation as to the damage sustained by a plaintiff be confined to the court, and drawn entirely from the evidence in the case.

It is claimed, however, on the part of the plaintiff, that, even if this question were objectionable, yet the fault was cured by the questions put by the court, in response to which the witness said that the four houses fronting on Third Avenue were worth $80,000, and would have been worth $110,000, if this structure and road were not there. If the objection were only to the form of the question, that which was made use of by the court would probably have cured the difficulty. But it is no objection to form that I have been discussing. The objection is to the substance of permitting the witness to state what in his opinion would have been the value of this property at this time in case the railroad had not been built and operated. This objection was not cured by the alteration of the form of the question. It is also claimed that there was sufficient evidence, excluding entirely the evidence of experts under the ruling of the court, upon which this judgment may be sustained. There is some other evidence in the case, but what would have been the result if all this objectionable evidence were eliminated, it is impossible for this court to determine. We went to the very extreme limit in upholding the judgment in the McGean Case, but there the evidence was much more minute, and the objectionable evidence seemed to have been objected to on grounds other than its absolute incompetence. We thought that it was doubtful whether the objection specifically and pointedly raised the question. The objection in this case is not only that it was incompetent, but the question was objected to on the ground that it was for the court alone, and not for the witness, to determine the amount of damage. We think the objection was sufficiently exact to raise the question that has been discussed here.

Lastly, it is alleged on the part of the plaintiff that, even assuming error, it is not prejudicial to the defendant, because the defendant is not bound to avail itself of the privilege granted it by taking a deed of the easement from the plaintiff upon the payment of the amount of the damages found by the court, but may submit to the injunction, and in the mean time take proceedings to condemn the property.

We do not think this contention can avail the plaintiff. The inquiry into the fee value of the plaintiff's property is predicated upon the idea that the defendant is to take the property at the value found in order to escape the injunction which would otherwise issue, and indeed it would seem that the defendant would have not much choice in the matter, and that it would be substantially bound by the judgment to take the property at the value found by the court or jury. It is idle to talk about a company situated like this corporation submitting to an injunction, and ceasing to operate its road through the avenue for a single day. It might be questionable whether there would be the slightest justification for such stoppage, founded upon any allegation that the amount of damages found by the court was too great. At any rate, the question was tried by both sides for the purpose of determining what the amount of damages really was, and the defendant has the right under the circumstances, where the investigation of such question was proper and material, to claim that it should be made upon competent and legal evidence; and, where improper evidence is admitted to its damage, it has the right to ask the court for relief.

Our conclusion is that for the error in the admission of this evidence the judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

Andrews, Earl, Finch, and O'Brien, JJ., concur.

Gray, J., dissenting:

The errors presented by this record, and upon which the appellants insist as requiring the reversal of the judgments below, consist in the admission by the trial court of certain evidence adduced by plaintiff to show that the maintenance and operation by defendants of the elevated railroad were damaging to his property rights. Witnesses were called who were qualified to speak from business experience, from familiarity with the values of real property in the City of New York, and who professed to be skilled by reason of an especial study of the general effect upon abutting properties of the elevated railroads, and the exceptions arose upon the admission of their opinions in answer to the following questions: "To what extent, in your judgment, is the value of that property damaged, if at all, by the presence of the structure and the running of the trains?" "What do you estimate the rental value of the property to be, the railroad not being there?" "To what extent, in your judgment, if at all, is the selling and rental value of this property . . . diminished by the presence on Third Avenue of the elevated road, and the operation of the passing trains?" To these questions the defendants interposed objections on several grounds, the only one of which material here is that of the competency of such evidence; but the trial court, nevertheless, permitted the witnesses to answer. The question, which is thus brought prominently before us for decision is, only comparatively speaking, novel; but it assumes very great importance, because not only are the principles of evidence involved, but, as we are informed, a great number of decisions in the courts below, and many recov-eries, rest upon the theory that the admission of such evidence is necessary and proper in such cases. If we shall say that it is inadmissible, it must be because it is deemed contrary to the principles underlying the law of evidence and to settled rules. The point which is mainly made against the competency of such evidence is that it calls for the conclusions of the witness upon a matter which the court or jury should alone determine, and hence invades their province. It is also suggested that to allow of such evidence is to permit speculation to supply proof. If the proposition were wholly true, it might be difficult to sustain the right of the plaintiff to submit his case to the jury upon such proof. But it seems to me that the argument against this species of proof is inapplicable to cases of this character, where evidence as to the damage suffered by the abutting landowner cannot always be furnished by exact data or in statements of facts, and where, to an intelligent judgment upon the issue, expressions of opinions seem so necessary. Nor is it true that the evidence is forbidden by established rules, whether we consider that question upon its truth, or upon the principles of the law of evidence. These principles cannot be embodied in rigid and lifeless formulas which deny adaptation to new conditions in human affairs. They admit of expansion and of frequent exception, whenever it is needed, in order to demonstrate the truth. A different view of the law of evidence might be extremely subversive of justice. The law of evidence, as a system, is based both upon principles and upon rules which, when not prescribed in statutes, arise out of precedents in decided cases. The rule is an exposition of the principle; but it is based upon judicial experience in the investigation of controversies by means of testimony, and is necessarily influenced by what may be the existing condition of things. It is well, though somewhat elementary, to observe that in the application of the principles of the law of evidence to the investigation of the truth, in a controversy over an alleged matter of fact, the aim is to confine the proofs only within the bounds of what is competent and satisfactory evidence; and that by competent evidence is meant such as the nature of the thing to be proved requires, and that by satisfactory evidence is meant such as shall suffice to satisfy the unprejudiced mind. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 1. If some rule of evidence is alleged to militate against the competency of the species of proof offered, I suppose that it should comply with two conditions, to satisfy the mind as to its force. It should appear that it was established upon a sufficient precedent, fitting the case, and that the nature of the thing to be proved did not require any exception to or modification of the supposed rule. In this case the matter of fact, the truth of which is the subject of judicial investigation, is whether the maintenance by the defendants of an elevated railroad structure, and the operation of its trains upon the street in front of the plaintiff's premises, have caused any damage to him by which the value of his property rights has been impaired. The controversy is over that fact, and the question of the damage. Such a condition of things in the street is a new use, and affects certain rights in and over the street, which are considered as appurtenant to the abutting lands. It constitutes a taking of the easements, which the property holder is legally or beneficially entitled to; and, if he can establish that the acts of the defendants have caused damage to him by depreciating the value which his estate in the abutting land would otherwise have, he is entitled to recover from them, as trespassers, damages to the extent of the injury suffered by his estate. It is very plain that the value of these easements cannot be arrived at by exact proof. Judge Van Brunt, in delivering the opinion of the general term of the supreme court in Kenkele v. Manhattan R. Co., 55 Hun, 898, well said: "How are we to arrive at the value of these easements taken by the defendant? To the plaintiffs they are of no value except because of the enhanced value which they give to the property they own fronting upon the streets. By themselves they are worthless,—have no intrinsic value." Hence he reasoned that the more certain evidence of their value was in proving what the property would be worth with the appurtenant easements, and what without them. I think that reflection, and a careful consideration of the real bearings of the evidence and of the circumstances of the case, must induce the conviction that the evidence does not usurp the province of the court or jury, and that there are ample and cogent reasons for its admission.

The admissibility of opinions as proof of the marketable condition and value of property, where it is not practicable to give more definite knowledge, has been long settled, and has formed one of the admitted exceptions to the rule which excludes the opinions of witnesses as evidence. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 440a; Clark v. Baird, 9 N. Y. 183; Robertson v. Knapp, 85 N. Y. 91. The ground of the exception is not because the persons who give such opinion evidence are superior in scientific capacity or attainments, but because they are shown to have a knowledge of such matters which jurors have not, and the value of property is actually a mere matter of opinion. If, then, expert or skilled evidence is admissible to prove generally the value of real property, why should it be deemed inadmissible to prove its value under different circumstances; that is to say, not only what is its value as at present circumstanced, but what would be its value if circumstanced differently, and under ordinary conditions of street uses? And why is an opinion not proper as to the extent of the damage, if any, to the value of the land, as being often the best attainable evidence? The mere objection of incompetency is no longer available to exclude opinion evidence, because upon the fact in controversy, in a case where more definite knowledge is not to be had. There is the strongest reason for admitting the opinions of witnesses to prove the extent of damage sustained by reason of the defendant's acts in the circumstances and necessities of the case. Without the aid of the opinions of persons experienced in the subject of real estate values in a metropolitan center like New York, it would be rarely, if ever, possible for the plaintiff to make a satisfactory or sufficient case for an intelligent judgment by courts or jurors. The values of real estate are fixed by and depend upon many considerations. The factors of value in the particular locality, in the character of the neighborhood, and in the tendencies of trade or of residence, are indefinite, and are not matters of common knowledge. A new and different use of the street may affect the growth in value of a city lot favorably or adversely; but as to which way and to what extent is a matter largely of opinion, based upon study and experience, and not of exact knowledge from definite facts. It is not a matter requiring any particular intellectual attainments to understand, but it involves an acquaintance with affairs and the possession of knowledge acquired through habits of observation and business, which must be essentially peculiar, and it would be stretching presumption rather far to assume that the knowledge is common to all persons. In the growth of a city and the increase of its business and wealth are causes for a steady enhancement of its real estate values, though its direction may be erratic and incapable of being foreseen. That the value of the plaintiff's property upon the Third Avenue might be greater to-day than it was before the defendants built their railroad structure, if the street remained in its earlier condition, is a possible if not a natural assumption. But it is a fact incapable of definite knowledge, and plainly, as it seems to me, best ascertainable through the opinions of persons whose familiarity with the neighborhood and habits of business observation in such respects could qualify them to speak to the issue. The question before us is not like that of a trespass once committed upon property rights, where the value before the trespass and the value after its commission might sufficiently express the facts, from which jurors could deduce conclusions as to any damage. Here the continuing trespass upon and the deprivation of appurtenant property rights introduce an element, the aggregation of which is to be considered in connection with possible general benefits conferred and in relation to municipal growth under normal or usual conditions. Whether the elevated railroad enhanced the values of the abutting property over what they would have become in its absence is a fact which is best and most intelligently determined from competent opinions.

An earlier and leading case in the reports of the decisions of this court is Clark v. Baird, 9 N. Y. 188, which was an action on the case for fraud in misrepresenting the boundaries of property sold by defendant. The premises consisted in a tavern stand, and the representation made was that they extended to a certain mill-race and tree. A witness who had examined the property with a view to purchase was permitted, under objection, to testify that "it was worth $1,000 if it extended to the race and trees. The strip taken off would reduce it one fourth." This testimony was objected to upon the ground that the amount of damage cannot be ascertained by the opinion of the witness. The opinion of the court was flivvered by Judge A. S. Johnson, a most learned and able jurist, and was directed to the discussion and elaboration of the question of the competency of opinions upon such a question. This is clear from an observation of the judge, who said: "The evidence was pointed solely to the question of damages, and the objection was undoubtedly understood by the court to relate to the competency of opinion upon the question of value." Many cases in this and other States were considered, and with such particularity as to render it quite unnecessary to repeat the labor here. The propriety of the evidence objected to was sustained upon the ground of necessity and of superior convenience. The opinion summed up a general discussion in this wise: "Upon this ground [i. e., of necessity], as well as upon that of superior convenience and the constant reception of such testimony upon trials without objection,—a tacit but strong proof of its propriety,—it must be deemed established that upon a question of value the opinion of a witness who has seen the thing in question, and is acquainted with the value of similar things, is not incompetent to be submitted to a jury."

In Robertson v. Knapp, 35 N. Y. 98, Clark v. Baird is referred to with approval as authority for the rule that opinions are admissible "as to the value of property in cases where the value was properly the subject of inquiry." The point of the objection in Clark v. Baird is precisely the same in principle, if not in its facts, as the one now presented.

In the early case of Rochester & S. R. Co. v. Budlong, 10 How. Pr. 289 (which was decided in 1854, a year later than Clark v. Baird), the opinion of a witness was held competent to show what would be the injury to the appellant's farm, arising from the construction of the railroad, and what would be its diminution in value from the same cause. The general term of the supreme court, at which the case was decided, was composed of Justices Selden, Welles and Johnson, and the opinion was delivered by Justice Selden. The evidence was held admissible upon the ground that unless questions involved a subject, knowledge of which is presumed to be alike common to all men, skilled opinions were proper. The authority of these cases has sufficed for the views of courts in other States, though it must be admitted that judges have not uniformly agreed. Some of these cases are cited in the respondent's brief; but extended reference to them seems unnecessary. The proposition must commend itself upon obvious grounds of necessity and of right, as well as because it is sanctioned by authority in the courts of this State. But I may refer to some cases in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, where the question has been pertinently discussed.

In Shattuck v. Stoneham Branch R. Co., 6 Allen, 115, where lands were taken for a railroad, testimony as to the amount of damage done to the petitioner's estate was allowed upon the theory that, where the amount of damage done to property is in controversy, opinions by persons acquainted with the value of the property may be given. It was there observed that, "as value rests merely in opinion, this exception to the general rule that witnesses must be confined to facts, and cannot give opinions, is founded in necessity and obvious propriety;" and the opinion cites Clark v. Baird, supra. In Swan v. Middlesex County, 101 Mass. 173, where land was taken for widening a street, the admission of such opinions was justified upon like reasoning and "rather from necessity, upon the ground that they depend upon knowledge which anyone may acquire, but which the jury may not have, and that they are the most satisfactory and often the very best attainable evidence of the fact to be proved." It was there said: "The witnesses, being competent to testify to the value of the land affected before and after the alteration of the highway, might testify to the simple question of arithmetic, which of those two values was the greater; in other words, whether the petitioner's estate was benefited or injured." And see Sexton v. North Bridgewater, 116 Mass. 200.

The decisions in our own State, which I have mentioned, have been relied upon by several text-writers. See Lawson, Exp. Ev. p. 451; Rogers, Exp. Test. § 152; and also Whart. Ev. § 450. In Rogers' work it is remarked: "That there is no such inherent distinction between questions of value and questions of damages, if from the latter is excluded all idea of any legal rule or measure of damages, as brings the one within and the other without the province of the opinion of witnesses." And in Wharton's work it is remarked, with respect to the facts upon which a witness bases his opinion as to the depreciation in value, that "when, as is often the case, these facts can be best expressed by the damage they cause, then this damage and its extent may be testified to by witnesses." The following authorities are in point, and may be referred to in connection with this discussion: Snow v. Boston & M. R. Co. 65 Me. 230, 231; Keithsburg & E. R. Co. v. Henry, 79 Ill. 294; White Deer Creek Imp. Co. v. Sassaman, 67 Pa. 415; Snyder v. Western U. R. Co. 25 Wis. 66, 70; Lehmick v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co. 19 Minn. 464 (Gil. 406).

As against the weight of authority in the cases of Clark v. Baird, supra, and Rochester & S. R. Co. v. Budlong, supra, I find no case since, in this court, which compels a different view. Van Deusen v. Young, 29 N. Y. 9, was an action of trespass for damages caused by cutting down and taking away trees from land, and a witness was asked, "Would the farm be worth more or less with the timber cut off?" The impropriety of this question was deemed to exist in its being irrelevant to the issue, and as calling for a speculative opinion. Clearly this is not authority for the case at bar. Judge Mullin, who delivered an opinion in the case, in discussing the competency of opinion evidence as to value, most pertinently says: "There are cases in which it is necessary to put to the witness the very question how much damages the plaintiff has sustained by reason of the act or neglect of the defendant. These are cases in which no data can be given which could enable a jury to arrive at the measure of damages, because the amount of the damage is known and can be properly appreciated and measured only by persons of skill in the business or matter to which the damage in the case relates. For a full and accurate examination of the cases on the question, see Clark v. Baird, 9 N. Y. 183."

Marley v. Shultz, 29 N. Y. 356, was an action for damages for the overflowing of the plaintiff's land from a mill-dam, and a question discussed related to the offer to ask the plaintiff (himself a witness) what the value of the use of the house was per annum before the raising of the dam. This was deemed objectionable because the value of the rent was not important, "except argumentatively." It was remarked, however, that "if the house had been kept for renting, and something in the nature of a market price for the use could have been proved, it might have been competent." Teerpenning v. Corn Eack. Ins. Co., 43 N. Y. 279, was an action on a policy of insurance for the loss of goods by fire, and cannot be deemed to be, either in fact or in principle, controlling. Clark v. Baird is there cited with this observation, "that upon questions of value the opinions of witnesses are admissible, but with the qualification that the witnesses must have peculiar knowledge of the article in question and its value."

I do not think other authorities cited from the decisions of this court call for discussion, until we come to the recent cases of McGean v. Manhattan R. Co., 117 N. Y. 233, and of Avery v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 121 N. Y. 81. The first of these cases might be deemed upon a cursory consideration, decisive of a contrary view. The decision of that case, however, did not turn nor depend upon the point as to the competency of the evidence as to value, nor was the question altogether the same as in the present case. There was no discussion by counsel of the point, except in the brief of the appellant's counsel, and the case of Clark v. Baird was not alluded to at all. The case was affirmed upon other considerations; and, as our decision did not involve any necessary determination as to the principle of evidence in question, there is no valid or just reason why we should be limited in our present discussion by the McGean Case, especially when the point becomes important, and the determination of the question essential. In the other case, of Avery v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., the plaintiff was a witness, and he was asked this question: "Do you know what the rental value of your property, real and personal, would have been between the 10th day of September, 1881, and the 28th day of January, 1884, if there had been a sufficient opening kept and maintained by the defendant opposite to your hotel for the convenient access of passengers and their baggage to and from the twenty-foot strip of land lying south of the hotel?" The propriety of such a question was denied upon several grounds. It was held that the witness had not been shown to be qualified to give such an opinion, and that the question assumed the insufficiency of the opening. It was said that it was an attempt "to prove through the witness that he was prejudiced by the existing condition of things as to the opening in the fence, and, under the guise of giving his knowledge, to elicit his opinion that the value of his business to him would have been greater if something different in the way of an opening had been maintained." Therefore, and on the strength of authorities mentioned in the opinion, the question was condemned as usurping the province of the jury. There was no question nor discussion as to the competency of expert evidence, or as to opinions of persons possessing a knowledge of a subject which in its nature is peculiar, and cannot be assumed to be common to all. The plaintiff was conducting a hotel and restaurant business, and was a lessee of the premises. Whether his business was injured or not was the subject of definite knowledge, and capable of being testified to by exact data. The present case, therefore, differs in its facts, as in its principles, from the cases relied upon, and is only appositely met by the authorities of Clark v. Baird and Rochester & S. R. Co. v. Budlong, supra. Here we have a new structure in the streets, which was a perversion of a street use, and which the Legislature could not authorize nor sanction without providing for compensation to the abutting property owner for the value of the appurtenant easements appropriated, if shown to have a value to him greater than any particular benefit conferred upon his estate by the presence of the structure. How, in the nature of things, is such a matter susceptible of exact proof by facts? Is not the effect upon the plaintiff's estate from the presence of the defendant's structure and its operation of trains, and any damage sustained thereby, best shown by receiving in evidence the opinions of those persons who, by reason of experience, observation, and familiarity with the various and more or less inexact and indefinite causes which operate upon real estate values, are skilled or expert upon the subject? How can the value of the property, if enjoyed in a usual manner and if subjected to ordinary street uses, be ascertained except by way of such evidence? There is no application of any new principle of evidence. Clark v. Baird is sufficient authority for the reception of opinions in evidence upon questions of value and damage. But there is, in a changed and new condition of things, a new reason for the admission of expert opinions as to the extent of damage sustained by an abutting landowner from the presence of these elevated railroads. This court has decided that their structures destroyed the ordinary uses for which a street was intended, and appropriated certain easements of the abutting property owners, wherefore they should make compensation in damages for any injury which may be proved to have been suffered. Is not that injury, under the extraordinary circumstances of the case, more intelligently proved through the opinions of persons shown to be competent to express such opinions? The witness' evidence does not conclude the court or jury; and it is still left to them to decide, with the aid of such skilled opinions, as to the measure and amount of damages which should be awarded by way of compensation. And, if the witness is asked for his opinion as to the extent to which the plaintiff's estate has been damaged, it seems an overrefinement of argument to deny the propriety of allowing him to state the result of a mere subtraction of the values assigned to the premises with and without the structure. The judgment of the court or of jurors is not limited to the opinions given, but is formed from the consideration they may give to the evidence, and is simply aided by the information they may have derived from the skilled opinions in the case. Upon the grounds of superior convenience, of necessity, and of an obvious propriety, and if we would have intelligent and just decisions of such issues, I think the evidence objected to is admissible in such cases, and therefore that the judgment below should not be reversed for the errors alleged.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

A. W. WERTZ, Respt.,
v.
WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.,
Appt.

(.....Utah.....)

A stipulation in a telegraph blank exempting the company from liability for NOTE.—Telegraph companies; effect of stipulations in contract to transmit.

A telegraph company cannot limit its liability for the plain and palpable negligence of its operators and agents. Garrett v. Western U. Telegr. Co. (Iowa) 10 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 115.

It is not relieved from liability for failing to forward a message, by a stipulation that it shall not be liable for errors or delays or for nondelivery. Ibid. See Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Collins, 10 L. R. A. 516, 45 Kan. —.

Its liability for mistakes or delays in delivering telegrams written not on the company's blank forms is not limited by stipulations in such forms, the terms of which were not actually known to the sender, although he had been in the habit of sending messages on those forms. Pearshall v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 124 N. Y. 266.

A stipulation on a telegraph blank that the company will not be liable for delays arising from un-mistakes and delays in the transmission of un-repeated messages will not prevent recovery of the full damages occasioned by a mistake resulting from the negligence of the company's servants.

(July 1, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for the First District setting avoidable interruption in the working of its lines, does not embrace a temporary, exclusive usurpation of the wire in sending out train orders. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Roentreter (Tex.) March 24, 1891.

A stipulation in a printed form upon which messages are required to be written before being accepted for transmission that the company shall not be liable for mistakes or delays or for nondelivery of un-repeated messages beyond the amount paid for their transmission is contrary to public policy and void so far as it seeks to relieve the company from liability for negligence. West. Union Telegr. Co. v. Short, 9 L. R. A. 744, and note, 58 Ark. 434; West. Union Telegr. Co. v. Stevenson, 5 L. R. A. 515, 128 Pa. 442; Kiley v. Western Union Telegr. Co. 11 Cent. Rep. 595, 109 N. Y. 331.

Where the message was properly transmitted and transcribed and the loss was occasioned by failure to promptly deliver, a stipulation on the blank limaside a verdict favorable to defendant and granting a new trial in an action brought to recover the damages caused by a mistake in the transmission of a telegraph message. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Evans & Rogers for appellant. Messrs. Smith & Smith, for respondent.

Notwithstanding the terms of the blank, the Company was not released from liability for the negligence of its servants.

Gillis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 4 L. R. A. 611, 61 Vt. 461; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fopet, 8 L. R. A. 224, 118 Ind. 248.

This question is also substantially controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627.

The telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages that a railroad does as a carrier of goods.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 30 L. ed. 1187.

The Company is liable for the full damage incurred.

Pepper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 4 L. R. A. 660, 87 Tenn. 554; Alexander v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 8 L. R. A. 71, 66 Miss. 161; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Griswold, 87 Ohio St. 301; Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 64 Wis. 531; Fowler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 80 Me. 381; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crail, 38 Kan. 679; Brown v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Utah) June 21, 1889.

Telegraph companies are in all respects bound by the same rules that control common carriers, and it is held that they cannot contract with their employers for exemption from liability for the consequences of their negligence.

Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 269, 270, 22 L. ed. 558, 559.

Zane, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff delivered to the defendant, at its office in Ogden City, Utah, to be transmitted to Eagle Rock, the following message: "To

Geo. H. Storer, Eagle Rock, Idaho: I will give one thousand cash, ball, six months. Answer." Which was delivered to the addressee at Eagle Rock in the following language: "I will give one hundred cases, balc six months. Answer." In consequence of the change, the evidence tended to show that the plaintiff lost a contract for the conveyance for $4,000 of real estate then worth $5,500. The message was written on a blank, on which was printed a condition that the Company would not be liable for mistakes and delays in transmission, from negligence of its agents or otherwise, unless the message should be repeated, and requiring therefor an additional charge of one half the regular rate. The message was not repeated. The jury returned a verdict under the charge of the court for the amount received for transmission, which the court, upon the motion of the plaintiff, set aside. From this order the defendant has appealed, and assigns the same as error. The cause of the failure to transmit the message as delivered is not expressly shown; but the probability is that the defendant's agents knew precisely how the failure occurred. If they did not, the defendant had the best means of finding out. If it was not the Company's fault, it should have shown it. The presumption from the evidence is that the negligence of the defendant's agents caused the failure. This brings us to the question, Did the contract exempt the defendant from liability for the negligence of its agents? If the senders of dispatches and telegraph companies were the only parties interested in such transactions, they might make such contracts. The public has an interest in the telegraph service. The property employed belongs to the Company, as well as the proceeds of the business; but the property is used and business is conducted for the accommodation and convenience of the public. Public policy forbids contracts by telegraph companies exempting them from the consequences to others of the negligence of their agents in transmitting messages for their employers. Such liability promotes promptness, skill, and care in that branch of business.

iting the company's liability in case of unrepeatd messages is no defense to a suit to recover damages for the loss. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lowrey (Neb.) 49 N. W. Rep. 707, citing Guif, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wilson, 69 Tex. 799; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Broesche, 72 Tex. 664; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Way, 83 Ala. 542; White v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 710; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Tyler, 74 Ill. 168; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 80 Ala. 510; Guif, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Miller (Tex.) Feb. 14, 1888.

A stipulation in a telegraph blank limiting the liability of the company for mistakes or delays in transmitting or delivering unrepeatd messages is void under Neb. Comp. Stat., chap. 89d, § 12. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lowrey (Neb.) 49 N. W. Rep. 707, citing Kemp v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 28 Neb. 661, distinguishing Becker v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 11 Neb. 87.

Such a stipulation does not protect the company from its negligent delay in transmission. If it has any validity at all, it is only in cases of a mistake in transmitting, and then only when the negligence is slight. Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 449.

A printed stipulation in a telegraph blank, that no claim for damages for negligence in transmitting the telegram shall be valid unless presented in writing within thirty days, is reasonable and obligatory. Beasley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Fed. Rep. 161.

It is binding on the party injured where the damages were known within three days from the sending. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Culbertson, 79 Tex. 65.

The rule that a telegraph company cannot stipulate against its own negligence will not prevent a stipulation requiring a claim to be presented within a certain time. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Daugherty (Ark.) 11 L. R. A. 102.

A stipulation contained on the blank of a telegraph company, that the company will not be liable for damages where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after sending the message, does not apply when suit is commenced before the expiration of the sixty days. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Trumbell (Ind.) April 14, 1891.

Such a stipulation does not require any notice or demand to fix the liability of the company, where there is a total failure to transmit the message. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Yopet, 8 L. R. A. 224, 118 Ind. 248. See note to Gillis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Vt.) 4 L. R. A. 611.

Such companies may by contract exempt themselves from loss or damage to others not from their own fault. Notwithstanding such conditions, the companies are liable for ordinary negligence in transmitting dispatches. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Grinold, 87 Ohio St. 801; Gillis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 61 Vt. 461, 4 L. R. A. 611; Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 64 Wis. 581.

In the case of Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 264, 22 L. ed. 556, the court said: "Telegraph companies, though not common carriers, are engaged in a business that is in its nature almost, if not quite, as important to the public as is that of carriers. Like common carriers, they cannot contract with their employers for exemption from liability for the consequences of their own negligence. But they may by such contracts, or by their rules and regulations brought to the knowledge of their employers, limit the measure of their responsibility to a reasonable extent. Whether their rules are reasonable or unreasonable must be determined with reference to public policy, precisely as in the case of a carrier." And in New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 857, 21 L. ed. 627, the same court held that a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility from the negligence of himself or his agents. If the plaintiff lost the difference between the contract price of the land and its actual value at the time because of the negligence of defendant's agents, that difference was his damage.

The decision of the court granting the new trial is affirmed, and the cause is remanded to the court below.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Board of COMMISSIONERS of ALLEN COUNTY, Appl.,

v.

Millard W. SIMONS et al.

(...Ind....)

1. To sustain a tax upon land which is shown to have been legally exempt from taxation for a long period prior to the year for which the tax was assessed, the burden is on the tax officers to show that something had occurred before such year to remove the exemption.
2. Art. 3 of U. S. Ord. July 13, 1787, providing that lands and property of Indians shall never be taken from them without their consent, is in force in Indiana.
3. The land of an Indian who has retained his tribal relations cannot be taxed by a State in which U. S. Ord. July 13, 1787, art. 3, is in force, although it has been patented to him in fee simple without restraint on alienation.

(September 22, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Allen County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover money paid at a tax sale for lands which were alleged to have been legally exempt from taxation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bell & Morris for appellant.

Messrs. Randall & Vesey, W. G. Colerick, S. R. Alden and Colerick & Oppenheim for appellee.

Coffey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The central question in this case relates to NOTE.—Taxation, exemption of Indians from.

The right of Indians in the land is merely a right of occupancy, the fee being in the United States, subject only to such right of occupancy. Johnson v. McIntosh, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 574, 5 L. ed. 686; 1 Kent, Com. 267; Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 48, 8 L. ed. 42.

Possession when abandoned by the Indians attaches itself to the fee without further grant. Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 17, 8 L. ed. 81.

But where by treaty the Indian title is extinguished, with provision for their removal, the lands are assessable. Fellows v. Denniston, 28 N. Y. 420; State v. Miami County Comrs. 68 Ind. 497; Franklin County Comrs. v. Pennock, 18 Kan. 579; The Kansas Indians, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 737, 18 L. ed. 667; Peck v. Miami County Comrs. 4 Dill. 370; Pennock v. Franklin County Comrs. 108 U. S. 44, 36 L. ed. 367.

The lands belonging to an Indian tribe are not taxable. The New York Indians, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 761, 18 L. ed. 708; State v. Miami County Comrs. 68 Ind. 497.

So long as the tribal organization is recognized by the national government, lands in possession of the Indians are not subject to state taxation. The Kansas Indians, 72 U. 13 L. R. A.

Indians and their property exempt from taxation by treaty or statute of the United States cannot be taxed by any State. United States v. Rogers, 45 U. S. 4 How. 567, 11 L. ed. 1105; United States v. Holliday, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 407, 18 L. ed. 182; The Cherokee Tobacco, 78 U. Where the consideration of an exemption was the cession of the Indian title to a tract of land, the exemption was a part of the purchase price of the land ceded. New Jersey v. Wilson, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 164, 8 L. ed. 308.

State lands purchased from the Indians may be exempt from taxation in the hands of purchasers; but where for many years the purchasers had paid taxes without question this fact raises a conclusive presumption that by some convention with the State the right of exemption had been surrendered. State v. Wright, 41 N. J. L. 478.

The language used in treaties with the Indians should never be construed to their prejudice. If words are used susceptible of a more extended meaning than their plain import as connected with the tenor of the treaty, they should be considered as used only in the latter sense. Worcester v. Georgia, 21 U. S. 6 Pet. 681, 8 L. ed. 508, followed in Choctaw Nation v. United States, 21 Ct. Cl. 92.

the right to tax certain lands in Allen County. The cause was tried in the circuit court before a jury, who returned a special verdict. Among others, the following facts appear by the verdict, viz.: That John Baptiste Richardville, prior to the year 1818, and until his death in 1841, was the principal chief of the Miami Tribe of Indians. For some time prior to the year 1818 he had, with the consent of his people, and under their law, resided upon and held exclusive possession of the land in controversy, the same being the property of the tribe of which he was principal chief; which included three sections of land described in the third article of the Treaty of 1818 between the United States and the Miami Nation of Indians. By that Treaty, the United States agreed, in consideration of the cession, by the tribe, of certain lands to the United States, to grant or release the three sections to Richardville in fee simple. The Treaty was signed by Richardville as one of the parties thereto; and pursuant to its terms, letters-patent were issued to him on the 24th day of September, 1823. By another treaty made on the 6th day of November, 1838, the United States granted to Richardville and his family the privilege of remaining in Indiana when his tribe should remove from the State, and stipulated that he and his family should receive the annuities due them, under the terms of the Treaty, at Fort Wayne.

In the year 1846, all the Miami Nation of Indians, except the family of Richardville and some other families granted a similar privilege, removed from the State to the then Territory of Kansas. Richardville remained in the undisturbed possession of these three sections of land until his death. By his last will he devised the land to his daughter, La Blonde, or Mary Louise Richardville. The daughter and other descendants of Richardville remained in the possession of the land until the daughter's death in the year 1847. By her last will she devised the land to her son, Ke-la-ke-wa-ke-ah, alias George Aussum, and her daughter, Mon-go-se-quah, alias Archange Godfrey. Both wills were duly probated. Ke-la-ke-wa-ke-ah died and left his portion of the land to his sister, Mon-go-se-quah and his son, Me-che-ke-no-quah, alias William Cass. In the year 1856, Mon-go-se-quah and Me-che-ke-no-quah, by order and judgment of the Common Pleas Court of Allen County, had partition of the land between themselves. Before the death of Richardville, Mon-go-se-quah intermarried with James R. Godfrey, son of Francis Godfrey, the war chief of the Miamis, who, with his family, was also permitted by the United States to remain in Indiana. Mon-go-se-quah and her husband resided with Richardville on this land, and she and her descendants continued to reside there until her death, which occurred in the year 1865. Her husband is still living, and continues to reside on the land. Ke-la-ke-wa-ke-ah and his son, Me-che-ke-no-quah have, since the death of La Blonde to the present time been in the possession and occupancy of their portion of the land. There has been born to

Mon-go-se-quah and her husband thirteen children, five of whom are still living, and, with their families, have ever resided on this land. The families of Godfrey and Me-che-ke-no-quah are among the families mentioned in the Treaty of 1854 between the Miami Indians and the United States, and after that Treaty the United States annually took a census of the family and placed upon the list Che-ke-no-quah, James Godfrey, Mon-go-se-quah and all their children and grandchildren, as provided by that Treaty, and annually paid to each of them, at Fort Wayne, their portion of the annuities provided for by that Treaty, and in the year 1882 paid to them their portion of the amount of the principal sum agreed by the Treaty to be paid. They have at all times resided upon and owned the land patented to Richardville, being his descendants. The government of the United States has never consented that they should put off their tribal relations. By all the treaties made before his death, the United States recognized Richardville as the principal chief of the Miami Nation, and as a member of that tribe. He executed, as chief of the Miami Nation, the Treaty of 1795, and every subsequent treaty with that nation, until the time of his death. The tribe and the whites who came among them treated and recognized him as a Miami Indian, and the principal chief of the nation. James M. Godfrey is a Miami Indian and has always been treated as such by the United States. All the above named and their descendants have been treated with by the United States and known as the Miamis of Indiana, and have been so enumerated. The chiefs and head men of the nation, in the west, from time to time called upon them and consulted with the descendants of Richardville whenever any question between them and the United States arose requiring the presence, at Washington, of representatives of the Miami Nation. None of the owners of this land have ever become citizens of the United States or any State therein. The Miamis of Indiana wear such clothing as is usually worn by the white people in the neighborhood where they reside. Some of them have been married by Catholic priests and some by justices of the peace, under licenses procured from state authority. In 1886, 1887 and 1888, the children of Me-che-ke-no-quah attended public school, and in 1880, George Godfrey, a son of Mon-go-se-quah voted at the presidential election. They speak both the Indian and English languages. In her lifetime, Mon-go-se-quah caused the lands received from her mother, La Blonde, to be platted into lots numbered from one to nine inclusive; but the title and possession of the lots has never been out of the descendants of Richardville since his death. For the years 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1877, lots one to nine inclusive were placed upon the tax duplicate of Allen County and assessed for state and county purposes, and were duly returned delinquent. On the 18th day of February, 1878, they were bid in for delinquent taxes by Charles H. Aldrich. The land not having been redeemed, the auditor executed to him a deed. Aldrich conveyed to the appellee in this case and assigned to him all his rights in the premises. Aldrich brought suit in the Allen Superior Court, after receiving his deed, to enforce a tax lien against said lands; but after the determination of the case, Wau-pe-man-quā, reported in 28 Federal Reporter, 489, holding that the land was not subject to taxation, his suits were dropped from the docket without any final adjudication. This suit was brought against the Board of Commissioners of Allen County to recover the amount paid for taxes by Aldrich, under the assumption that the lands above named were not subject to taxation.

It is contended by the appellant that as these lands were granted and patented to Richardville in fee simple, without any restraint upon alienation, for his own use, and not to any nation or tribe of Indians, or for their benefit, that they are subject to taxation as any other lands in the State.

On the other hand, it is contended by the appellee that the Indian title to these lands was never extinguished, and as the owners of the same have kept up their tribal relations with the Miami Nation and have never become citizens of the United States, the lands are within the purview of article 3, Ordinance 1787; and are not, therefore, subject to taxation by the State.

So far as we are informed by the record, no effort was ever made to tax these lands prior to the year 1871. Long acquiescence in the imposition of taxes, unexplained, raises a presumption of a surrender of the privilege of exemption. Given v. Wright, 117 U. S. 648, 29 L. ed. 1021.

As it does not appear in the special verdict that these lands, prior to that date, had been assessed for taxation, we think it should be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that they had not paid taxes for the support of the state and county government up to that time. If for any reason they had been legally exempt from taxation between the year 1818 and the year 1871, the burden of showing that something had occurred between those dates which rendered them liable to taxation rested upon the appellant. Such reason is not found in any change in our Statute upon the subject, for the statutes declaring what lands in the State shall be subject to taxation have remained substantially the same from 1848 to 1881.

It is earnestly contended by the appellant that the Ordinance of 1787 is not in force in the State of Indiana; but it has been judicially determined that the third article of that ordinance is in force in this State. Me-shing-go-mesia v. State, 36 Ind. 310; Wau-pe-man-quā v. Aldrich, 28 Fed. Rep. 489.

The third article of that ordinance contains this clause: "The utmost good faith shall always be observed towards the Indians. Their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent; and in their property rights and liberty they shall never be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars authorized by Congress; 13 L. R. A.

but laws founded in justice and humanity shall from time to time be made for preventing wrongs being done them and for preserving peace and friendship with them."

In the month of April, 1816, Congress passed an Act which provided that the people of the Indian Territory might form a constitution and be admitted into the Union; provided that the same when formed should be republican, and not repugnant to the articles of the Ordinance of July 13, 1787, which are declared to be irrevocable between the original States and the people and the States of the territory northwest of the River Ohio, etc. On the 10th day of June, 1816, the Territorial Legislature of Indiana enacted the following: "That we do for ourselves and our posterity agree, determine, declare and ordain that we will and do hereby accept the proposition of the Congress of the United States as made and contained in their Act of April nineteen, eighteen hundred sixteen, etc."

It will thus be seen, as adjudged in the cases above cited, that Indiana made a solemn compact with the United States by the terms of which certain portions of the Ordinance of 1787, among which is the clause above set out, was kept in force. This clause is a provision in favor of the Indian tribes residing on Indian territory, and as such is to be liberally construed in their favor. Choctaw Nation v. United States, 119 U. S. 27, 30 L. ed. 314; United States v. Kagama, 118 U. S. 388, 30 L. ed. 231; The Kansas Indians, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 737, 18 L. ed. 667.

It takes no argument to prove that if the State of Indiana can tax these lands, and sell them for the nonpayment of such taxes, it may deprive the owners of such lands of their title and use without their consent. This the clause of the Ordinance of 1787, above set out, prohibited.

It is claimed, however, by the appellee that this case does not come within the rule laid down in the case of Me-shing-go-mesia v. State, supra, for the reason that it was patented to Richardville in fee simple, without any restraint upon alienation and for his own use, and not for the benefit of a tribe of Indians. The cases relied upon by the appellee as sustaining this position, viz.: Taylor v. Vandergrift, 126 Ind. 325; Lowry v. Weaver, 4 McLean, 82; Pennock v. Franklin County Comrs. 103 U. S. 44, 26 L. ed. 367; Langford v. Monteith, 102 U. S. 147, 26 L. ed. 54; Pka-o-wah-ash-kum v. Sorin, 8 Fed. Rep. 740; Hilgers v. Quinney, 51 Wis. 62; McMahon v. Welsh, 11 Kan. 290; Miami County Comrs. v. Brackenridge, 12 Kan. 114; South Western R. Co. v. Wright, 116 U. S. 231, 29 L. ed. 626,—are not, in our opinion, in point in this case. Those bearing upon the question under immediate consideration turn upon the construction of particular treaties and statutes; but none of them bear upon the construction to be placed upon the Ordinance of 1787. There is nothing in the language used in the clause here involved limiting it in the manner contended for by the appellee. The language is broad enough to cover the claim of individual Indians, and titles held in fee simple, acquired by treaty or otherwise from the United States. We are unable to discover any substantial reason for depriving an Indian of his land without his consent, where he owns a fee-simple title, when he would be permitted to hold it if his title were less than a fee. The question as to whether these lands are subject to taxation by the State does not, we think, depend so much upon the question as to whether the owners hold the fee or a less estate, as it does upon the question of their tribal relations. That the owners of this land constituted a part of the Miami Nation and have kept up their tribal relations is abundantly shown by the special verdict before us. They are not citizens of the United States; and, indeed, could not rid themselves of their allegiance to their nation and become citizens without the consent of the United States. Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94, 28 L. ed. 643.

At the time the lands were granted to Richardville, he was the principal chief of the Miami Nation. It has been held by this court that the lands granted to Me-shing-gome-sia, an inferior chief, were not subject to taxation by the State. It is not reasonable to presume that it was the intention of Richardville and of the government to place his lands where they could be taken without his consent, while all the other lands reserved to the Miamis were placed beyond the reach of the State. In our opinion, the lands described in the complaint in this case were not subject to taxation for state and county purposes during the period for which they were assessed. What the status of this land is now we are not called upon to decide. We are not unmindful of the fact that the conclusion here reached is in seeming conflict with the case of State v. Miami County Comrs., 63 Ind. 497. That was an action by the State on the relation of Godfrey, to compel the Board of Commissioners of Miami County, by writ of mandamus, to refund certain taxes alleged to have been illegally assessed and collected. It was held that mandamus was not the proper remedy. It was also held that the complaint was bad for the further reason that it did not allege that the land upon which the tax had been assessed was reserved to the Indians as a band, and not to them individually; but the question of the effect of the Ordinance of 1787 upon the lands assessed was not decided; and, so far as we know, was not considered. However, the question as to whether these lands are exempt from taxation under the treaties and laws of the United States is a federal question, and it was expressly held in the case of Wau-pe-man-gus v. Aldrich, supra, that they are not subject to taxation, and that the particular tax involved in this suit was void. The reasoning in that case seems to us to be sound, and we know of no reason why we should hold the opinion rendered by the federal court erroneous.

Judgment affirmed.

CENTRAL IRON & STEEL CO.

(....Ind....)

Taxation of the excess in value of the capital stock of a corporation over that of its tangible property subjected to taxation is not prohibited by a statutory provision that when the tangible property of a corporation is, its shares of capital stock shall not be, listed and assessed for taxation.

(September 15, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clay County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin defendants from collecting a tax assessed on plaintiff's capital stock by the County Board of Equalization. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Measrs. William B. Schwartz, James A. McNutt and Hiram Teter, for appellants:

The right to assess the franchises or capital stock of individuals or corporations is a conceded or adjudged principle, and has ceased to be a subject of discussion or argument.

Cooley, Taxn. pp. 82, 379, 383; People v. Astor, 1 Cent. Rep. 770, 100 N. Y. 597.

It is nowhere averred that appellee has tendered the taxes properly chargeable to it, and there is nothing in the complaint showing any intention to ever pay any taxes, and the appellee can therefore have no standing in equity.

Logansport v. McConnell, 121 Ind. 416.

There are two entirely separate and distinct quantities in relation to every private business corporation, that may become the object of assessment for the purposes of taxation, to wit, the corporate property in its proprietary sense to the corporation as owner, and the capital stock, representing the aggregate of the shares held by the individual owners. These two separate quantities may be regarded as distinct legal units not in any manner alike, but in contemplation of law and in fact possessed of independent attributes and values.

And since the board assessed the value of said capital stock of corporation and therefrom deducted the assessed value of all the tangible property, there is in this case no double taxation in any sense.

Messrs. George A. Knight and A. W. Knight, for appellee:

The complaint avers that the entire capital stock of appellee was invested in tangible property, all of which was listed and assessed for taxation; that its capital stock represented its tangible property and was of the value of it and no more, that it had no surplus or accumulations. This being true, to tax all the tangible property, under its own proper designation, and then to tax the capital stock invested in that property, is to tax the same property, owned and held by the same person, twice for the support of government. This cannot be done under our Constitution and laws.

Const. art. 10, § 1; Loftin v. Citizens Nat. Bank, 85 Ind. 345, 346; Richmond v. Scott, 48 Ind. 568; Lafayette, M. & B. R. Co. v. Geiger, 34 Ind. 185; Bright v. McCullough, 27 Ind. 228; Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 6305, 6308.

A statute which exempts the shares of stock from taxation exempts the capital stock from taxation also.

King v. Madison, 17 Ind. 480; Cooley, Taxn. 212.

There are four recognized methods of taxation of corporate interests: (1) tax on franchise; (2) on capital stock; (3) on real and personal property; (4) on shares of stocks in hands of stockholders.

Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 561.

The action of the board of equalization in this case cannot be justified or upheld upon the ground that its assessment of appellee's stock is a tax on the franchise, for the reason that under our tax laws the board of equalization has nothing whatever to do with assessing it.

Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 6303, 6336. See also Taylor, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 477a; 2 Waterman, Corp. § 251.

A tax assessed on the capital stock of a corporation is a tax on the property of which such capital is composed.

Our statute expressly forbids assessing the shares of stock where the capital stock or the tangible property of the corporation is assessed. Our law-makers recognized this as double taxation and hence expressly forbade it.

Elliot, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are similar to those presented by the record in Hyland v. Brazil B. Coal Co. (Ind.), 26 N. E. Rep. 672; but there is one material fact presented by the record now before us, which was not presented by the record in the case cited. Many of the questions presented here were decided in the case to which we have referred, and it is unnecessary to again discuss those questions in detail; but it is perhaps proper to speak very briefly of one of them. It was not decided in the case of Hyland v. Brazil B. Coal Co. that a tax-payer might enjoin the collection of taxes where his property was subject to taxation, although part of the taxes are illegal, without tendering the part for which his property is liable; on the contrary, it was expressly declared that where the property is subject to taxation, the collection of the tax cannot be enjoined without paying or tendering the amount for which the property is liable, although part of the amount levied may be illegal. The cases of Logansport v. Case, 124 Ind. 254, and Morrison v. Jacoby, 114 Ind. 83, 12 West. Rep. 187, were there fully approved and so they are here. What was decided in Hyland v. Brazil B. Coal Co. is, that where the property is not subject to taxation at all, and there is no jurisdiction to levy any part of the tax assessed on the particular property, no tender is necessary. There was no departure from the long and firmly settled doctrine that where the property is subject to taxation, but is irregularly assessed, or assessed beyond its value, a tender of the amount for which the property is liable is always indispensable.

The fact which we have said appears in this record, but was not contained in the record in Hyland v. Brazil B. Coal Co., supra, is this: The schedule made out and verified by the appellee contains these statements:

"Actual value of stock	$150,000
Total amount of indebtedness except for the indebtedness for the current expenses, excluding from such expense the amount paid for the purchase and improvement of property	294,761
Assessed value of lands	7,485
" " " personal property	27,880
Total assessed valuation of all tangible property of said Company	35,315."

It thus appears from the appellee's return of property for taxation, that the tangible property is of less value than the capital stock; inasmuch as the actual value of the capital stock is $150,000, while the tangible property is of the value of $35,315. This fact clearly and decisively discriminates the present case from Hyland v. Brazil B. Coal Co. inasmuch as in that case, according to the confessed allegations of the complaint, the entire capital stock was invested in and represented by the tangible property returned for taxation. We there said that "the question whether an assessment may be levied upon capital stock to the extent to which it exceeds in value the tangible property is not presented by the complaint; nor is the question whether corporate franchises may be taxed where they have a value over and above the capital stock presented for our decision." The question which we declared not then before us is now presented.

It seems quite clear that no tax-payer can be twice taxed upon the same property, and so the authorities declare. State v. Hannibal, & St. J. R. Co. 37 Mo. 265; People v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594; State v. Cumberland, & P. R. Co. 40 Md. 22; Cooley, Taxn. 225.

Where the property once pays its full share of taxes to the State or county, it cannot be subjected to a greater burden for the same purposes, although it may be subjected to special taxes in the form of assessment for local improvements, or to municipal corporation taxes in common with other property. Where there is an attempt to doubly tax property, there is a violation of law. Our Statute provides that "in all cases where the tangible property of an incorporated company is listed and assessed under this Act, the shares of capital stock of such incorporated companies shall not be listed and assessed." Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 6305, 6308.

This provision was intended to prohibit double taxation and enforces the principle stated by us. We cannot, however, hold that the provision quoted is to be considered apart from other provisions of the Statute and construed as prohibiting the taxation of capital stock in all cases; on the contrary, we hold, as was held in Hyland v. Brazil B. Coal Co., supra, that it is to be considered in connection with other provisions of the Statute, and that, when so considered, it does not exclude the taxation of capital stock where it is not invested in and fully represented by tangible property subjected to taxation. If the capital stock exceeds in value the tangible property subject to taxation and assessed for taxation, then, to the extent of its value in excess of the value of the tangible property, it may be listed and assessed; for it is apparent that in such a case there is not double taxation. It cannot be assumed that the tangible property necessarily represents the value of the capital stock, for the business of a corporation owning comparatively little tangible property may be so profitable as to impress upon its stock a value much beyond its tangible property; or it may be the owner of a franchise which gives the stock a value much greater than that of the tangible property of which it is the owner. A corporation which, in its sworn return, values its capital stock at almost five times as much as its tangible property, cannot successfully assert that the taxation of its tangible property entirely absolves its capital stock from liability. It is, at all events, entirely clear that where it affirmatively appears, as it does from the evidence in this case, that the tangible property is not equal to the value of the stock, the stock is taxable to the extent that it exceeds in value the tangible property. The only evidence as to the value of the capital stock, as well as the only evidence of the value of the tangible property, was that contained in the tax list or schedule; and that certainly does not prove, or tend to prove that there was double taxation, since the actual value of the capital stock is shown to exceed that of the tangible property more than $100,000.

The record affirmatively shows that there was authority in the board of equalization to act upon the list returned by the appellee, for there was such a list placed before it, and the statute vests it with jurisdiction over the subject. Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 6305-6308, 6357, 6358, 6359; Hyland v. Brazil B. Coal Co. supra.

The list showed that the capital stock was subject to taxation to the extent that it exceeded in value the tangible property; so that there was not, as in Hyland v. The Brazil, B. Coal Co. an attempt to subject property to taxation which was not taxable. Here there was jurisdiction, for here there was a list placed before the board of equalization as the law requires; that list disclosed property subject to taxation, and on that property, the capital stock, the Statute expressly makes it the duty of the board to place a value. It may well be doubted whether the courts can interfere at all in such a case as this; for the rule supported by the weight of authority is, that where there is jurisdiction and no principle of law is violated, the valuation of the board of equalization is conclusive. Cooley, Taxn. 747, 748; Small v. Lawrenceburgh (Ind.) (May 1, 1891). Pulaski County Comrs. v. Senn, 117 Ind. 413. There is here no evidence that the valuation of the board was erroneous; and certainly no reason for setting it aside, even if the courts had power to do so. If the board had placed a much greater value upon the capital stock than that fixed by the appellee in the schedule, its action could not, under the rule referred to, be disturbed, unless it was made to appear that some principle of law was violated; but the board did not increase the valuation; on the contrary, it placed the value of the capital stock at $80,000, and from this deducted the value of the tangible property, $27,880; thus leaving subject to taxation $32,170 as the value of the capital stock.

The trial court erred in finding for the ap-pellee upon the evidence adduced; for upon that evidence the law is with the appellants.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to award a new trial.

Coffey, Ch. J., did not take any part in the decision of this case.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

R. H. DEMING et al.

v.

MERCHANTS' COTTON-PRESS & STORAGE CO. et al., and Other Cases.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A cotton compress company which receives cotton for compression and storage under a contract, either express or implied from usage, to insure the same to its full value for the owners' benefit is liable to the latter for its full value in case it is destroyed by fire while, through the company's negligence, it remains uninsured, although the company is free from negligence in caring for it.
2. A carrier which by contract or by usage selects a compress company as its agent to receive cotton that is to be shipped over its road, and issues bills of lading therefor on presentation of the compress company's receipts, is in possession of the cotton when the bill of lading has been executed so as to be liable for its loss by fire.
3. The ordinary exemption clause in a bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability of the shipper's property by fire will not cover cotton while in the warehouse of a compress company which has received it as the agent of the carrier.

4. Carriers making a through contract for the shipment of merchandise, whether through an initial line agreeing to ship beyond its own road or through a transportation company having no line of its own, but simply authorized to ship over connecting lines, may insert therein a fire exemption clause, although no offer is made to assume the risk for additional compensation, since there is no common-law liability to make the through shipment.
5. If one, who delivers his cotton to a compress company under an agreement by the latter to procure insurance on it does not rely on the obligation so imposed, but procures other insurance thereon in solvent companies, he cannot, in case of the destruction of the cotton, recover from the compress company because of its failure to procure insurance.
6. Where a compress company fails to comply with its agreement to procure insurance on cotton which it has received as agent for a carrier, and the cotton is destroyed, covered only by insurance procured by its owner, if the owner's insurer pay the loss the amount may be recovered, for its benefit, from the carrier if he is unprotected by an exemption contract, or from the compress company if the cotton was de-

NOTE.—Common carrier may limit his responsibility by special agreement.

A common carrier is bound to transport for a reasonable remuneration, and if he offers to do so and at the same time offers to carry on condition that he shall assume no liability, and holds forth, as an inducement, a reduction of price, or some additional advantage which he does not give to those who employ him with a common-law liability, the conditions thus offered are reasonable. Peek's Case, 10 H. L. Cas. 473.

A contract exempting the carrier from liability for a loss by fire not due to negligence, and based upon a sufficient consideration, the shipper having the right to elect between a liability with or without the fire clause, is valid. Dillard v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Lea, 288; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 7 L. R. A. 162, 88 Tenn. 430.

The authorities are practically unanimous concerning a loss by fire under a bill of lading containing a fire clause, and they establish the identical relation of bailor or bailee. Hutchinson, Carr. 767, 768; Schouler, Balim. 44 439, 478, 578; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 904, and authorities cited; Momphils & C. R. Co. v. Reeves, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 176, 19 L. ed. 906; Clark v. Barnwell, 53 U. S. 12 How. 274, 13 L. ed. 935; Western Transp. Co. v. Downer, 73 U. S. 11 Wall. 129, 20 L. ed. 160; Wheeler, Carr. 254, 255.

Clauses similar to those considered in the principal case, when based upon a sufficient consideration, have, by the Supreme Court of the United States, been held to be valid, and to protect the company from liability for loss by fire, caused otherwise than by the negligence of the company or its agents. York Mfg. Co. v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 170; Dillard v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Lea, 288. In the case last cited the court said: "A lower rate of freight, or something equivalent, will be a sufficient consideration for the stipulation." Dillard v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Lea, 288.

It is now well settled that the common-law liability of carriers may be limited by special contract, even to the extent of denuding them of the character of insurers, except as against their own negligence, and the limitation may be embraced in the bill of lading. To be valid, it must be fairly obtained, and just and reasonable. Under the English Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854, such stipulations are called "conditions" and are upheld only when they are . . . just and reasonable." The same criterion is uniformly applied in this country, and no limitations of the carrier's common-law liability will afford protection unless "just and reasonable" in the eyes of the law. New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627; Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 398, 28 L. ed. 720; Marr v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 85 Tenn. 542.

The burden of proving the reasonableness of a condition lies upon the company. The most cogent evidence in favor of reasonableness is to show that the condition was not forced upon the customer, but that he had a fair alternative of getting rid of the condition, and yet agreed to it. Redman, Carr. 2d ed. p. 66, citing Lewis v. Great Western R. Co. 47 L. J. N. S. Q. B. 181.

stroyed through its negligence; but no recovery can be had because of the compress company's failure to procure insurance.

7. Any advancement of money by an insurer to the assured for the loss of property in possession of a bailee who had failed to comply with his agreement to procure insurance on it, which recognizes the insurer's liability for the loss, constitutes a payment so as to prevent a recovery for the bailee's failure to procure insurance, whether the advancement was a loan to be repaid upon recovery from the bailee, or was borrowed from a third person on the insurer's credit, or was provided for in the insurance contract.

8. The taking of an obligation by an insurer, in complying with its contract to, in case of loss, advance money to the assured pending the collection of the claim from the one primarily liable, for a return of the money, not if the insurer was not liable, but in case some other person should prove to be so, will be held to be a concession of liability on the part of the insurer.

9. The dates of the policies, and not the times of attachment of the risks, must govern in determining the priority of insurance under a clause in an open policy providing that insurance "prior in date to this policy" shall be first applied in payment of a loss.

10. Where a bailee's agent, under contract to procure insurance on the property, insures only part of it for the benefit of itself, its principal and the owners, and part of the owners insure their interests in a separate company for their own benefit, in case of loss, the first insurance will be applied to the risks covered by it alone, to wit: those of the bailee and owners uninsured by the other company and thus incidentally to the benefit of the agent, before contribution will be enforced in favor of the second insurer towards paying the loss of the owners insured by it.

11. Where, in attempting to remove a car loaded with merchandise, from the proximity of a burning building, a draw-bar breaks, in consequence of which the fire reaches and destroys the merchandise, the carrier is liable for its loss, notwithstanding a clause in the bill of lading exempting it from liability for loss by fire, unless it can show that the breakage was caused by a latent defect or other cause sufficient to excuse it.

12. No rights of a shipper growing out of a contract between the carrier and its agent that the latter shall procure insurance on the shipper's property while in its possession as such agent, can be adjusted, as between the shipper and agent, in case of the loss of the property by fire, unless the carrier has been sued and its liability for the loss established.

CROSS-APPEALS from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County in a suit brought to recover the value of certain cotton which was destroyed by fire while in the possession of the defendant storage company as agent for certain transportation companies. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Co., The Jackson Co., Tremont & Suffolk Mills, Dwight Mfg. Co., E. H. Coates & Co., Whitefield Mills, Union Mfg. Co., Hooper & Buffington Shove Mills, Providence Washington Ins. Co., and Lancaster Mills:

The limitation of the carrier's liability by contract is necessarily confined to the services contracted for, and the carriers who were parties to it.

Babcock v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 496, 497.

The bill of lading of defendants does not give the privilege of compressing, or embrace the peril of a fire except transportation fire perils.

See Robinson v. Merchants Despatch Transp. Co. 45 Iowa, 470.

Exemptions must be clearly and unambiguously expressed.

Hutchinson, Carr. §§ 275, 276.

It cannot be ruled that a peril entirely distinct from the transportation perils is to be interpolated into contracts for transportation unless they are to be read in the light of a local usage known and assented to. The contract should be construed very strictly, and where it in terms embraces only a portion of the risks of transportation, responsibility in other respects should be held as at common law.

2 Redfield, Carr. p. 82; Merchants Bank v. Union R. & Transp. Co. 69 N. Y. 873; Western Union R. Co. v. Wagner, 65 Ill. 197; Liverpool & G. W. S. S. Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 441, 32 L. ed. 792.

In New York a carrier may stipulate against a liability for a loss by negligence. A consideration of the adjudged cases in that State will lead to the conclusion that a loss by fire in a press is not within the conditions of the contracts expressed in the general bill of lading.

Holsapple v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 278; Magnin v. Dinmore, 56 N. Y. 168.

When the particular dangers or risks against which the carrier has specially guarded himself are preceded by general or more comprehensive words of exemption, the former are to be construed to embrace only occurrences ejusdem generis with those subsequently enumerated, unless there be clear intent to the contrary.

Hutchinson, Carr. § 275; St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. v. Smuck, 49 Ind. 802; Barter v. Wheeler, 49 N. H. 9.

If there was an established custom by which it was generally understood by carriers and shippers that when there was a general exception against a loss by fire in a bill of lading it included as well the peril of a fire at or in a press, as it did those attending transportation, it would not be binding on those appellants to whom it was not known.

Lawson, Carr. § 125; Grisson v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 3 L. R. A. 273, 87 Tenn. 358.

The rule "the expression of the one is the exclusion of the other," limits the "fire clause" of the Blue Line bill of lading to fires "in transit," i. e., those which occur while cotton is being transported and to fires at stations, i. e., at the depots or station houses of the railways.

Lawson, Carr. § 151.

Under the circumstances the condition limiting the carrier's liability for loss by fire in a press is not valid, nor supported by any consideration.

Is a condition valid that the carrier shall not be liable for a loss by fire while the cotton is in a press, where it was lodged for compression by such carrier, for its benefit, when the costs, i. e., insurance, compression, warehousing, and loading on cars are charged as part of the freight in the tariff of the carrier, and collected from owners?

The defense relied on to sustain the reasonableness of this exception is, it is contained in a through contract. The argument is, that any such condition inserted in a through contract is reasonable because the carrier need not make one. The argument in support of it has no merit.

New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 637.

The shippers in this case could not have had a common-law contract if they had desired. The carrier cannot, by a valid stipulation, contract against liability for his or his servants' negligence; neither can he limit liability under circumstances that render the limitation unjust and unreasonable.

Ibid.; Merchants Dispatch Transp. Co. v. Bloch, 86 Tenn. 397.

It is not every special contract that is effective. To be valid it must be fairly obtained, founded upon a consideration, and be just and reasonable.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 7 L. R. A. 162, 86 Tenn. 430; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, supra; Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 338, 28 L. ed. 720; Marr v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 85 Tenn. 542; Merchants Dispatch Transp. Co. v. Bloch, supra.

The shipper should have the alternative of shipping under the common-law liability, or a less or restricted liability, at his option.

Rooth v. Northeastern R. Co. L. R. 2 Exch. 173.

The common-law and charter duty required the several carriers to carry and to have adequate facilities for the transportation of the cotton destroyed in the compress fire.

Scofield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 67.

The measure of carriers' duty to transport goods is determined, not by the line of carriers' railways, but by the public, and professed habits of such carriers. He is bound to carry goods from and to such places as his public profession has connected his trade with.

Browne, Carr. § 290.

Carrying beyond his own line, or guaranteeing a through rate of freight, may furnish an adequate consideration for limitations upon his common-law liability, but neither of those circumstances affects the conditions of limitation.

If it were otherwise, then the limitation would not be dependent upon its being just and reasonable, but on its being in a bill of lading granted by a carrier for transportation of goods beyond its own line.

It would consequently follow that a provision exempting carriers from liability for negligence would be valid if the contract was to transport the goods beyond carrier's line. That condition of limitation is not valid, because it is not a reasonable one.

The several carriers engaged in the traffic of cotton each had its own line; but in connection with other lines of an association of carriers, continuous lines were formed, for which carriers' agents solicited shipments and granted through bills of lading for one sum, that consignees paid, and the carriers divided among them; therefore as to third parties with whom they contracted, the several carriers in association are liable for a loss taking place on any part of the whole line.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 7 L. R. A. 162, 88 Tenn. 484, 485, the court spoke only "of a company standing before the public as a common carrier, and enjoying advantages and franchises as such," and applied to a carrier so circumstanced the rule "that he must be ready to do the business of a common carrier with the full measure of responsibility imposed by the common law."

In the present case the Blue Line is not such a common carrier. Where it appears that the goods had been destroyed by fire when in the actual custody and control of a person other than the carrier, the carrier need not prove affirmatively that he was not responsible for the fire.

Snodgrass, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the last term of this court two cases, Lancaster Mills v. Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Co. and Coates v. Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Co., were decided. The first of these is reported in full in opinion by Judge Lurton, 89 Tenn. 1. In that opinion, which fully states many of the facts now being considered, and not necessary to be restated here, it was mentioned that the case was "one of a series of suits [and the Coates Case was another] involving the liabilities of the Compress Company and various railroad companies for the loss of [about] 14,000 bales of cotton, valued at $700,000, burned on the night of November 17, 1887, while in press No. 4 of the defendant Compress Company at Memphis, Tenn." In the case now being considered are presented the 13 L. R. A.

questions undisposed of in those two cases, and nineteen others herewith consolidated, together with all other questions arising on bills then pending in the chancery court, and amended, and cross-bills subsequently filed against the Compress Company, and various railroad and transportation companies and insurance companies, to determine the several rights and liabilities of all such parties to complainants sustaining the loss, and inter se.

Obviously, it is impossible, within the limits to which an opinion must of necessity be confined, to take up seriatim and state the pleadings and facts of each particular case embraced in a record of 4,500 pages, nor is it necessary, for the determination of certain questions disposes of the suits in classes, many of them depending upon the same questions, and to be determined upon adjudication of certain general principles, applicable alike to these, and, in certain instances, to all the classes. Nor is it necessary to state in full the decree of the chancellor. The modifications of that decree (which was an entirety in all the cases now consolidated), indicated as a result of the principles now settled by this opinion, determine the proper decree to be drawn as a settlement of the questions raised in each particular case. It is sufficient to say that the skill and ability of the eminent counsel representing the different parties in the pleadings there, and assignments of error here, have so presented, and the forceful and far-reaching comprehension of the chancellor has so determined, the various questions involved, as to enable us to review them all as a series of general questions; and we proceed to present and discuss them in the most natural order in which they arise, incidentally noticing, of course, and applying, those already settled in the Lancaster Mills Case.

The principal question of primary liability of the Compress Company for loss on account of negligence was settled in the Lancaster Mills Case on evidence not materially supplemented in this record, on the verdict of the jury finding that the Company was not liable. The same result was reached in the several other cases now before us by decree not upon verdicts; and with this result we are entirely satisfied, and to this extent the decree is affirmed. Another question practically determined in that case was that the effect of the contracts of the Compress Company with the several railroads and transportation companies, and impliedly with all persons dealing with the Compress Company as depositors of cotton, was to make that Company liable to railroads and transportation lines who had such contracts, and to owners of cotton deposited with it for compression, not as an insurer, but upon its agreements, express and implied, to procure insurance in good and solvent companies, sufficient to cover any loss while such cotton was under the control of the Compress Company, and until loaded on cars for transportation. The inception of the liability thus assumed was in the contracts it made with carriers. One of these contracts is set forth in full in the Lancaster Mills Case, and the others stated to be, as in fact they are, in substance identical.

Another contract involved in this case we quote in full, for the purpose of more specific statement on points to be herein considered: "This agreement is made and entered into on this 24th May, 1887, between the Cairo & Vincennes Railroad Co., . . . termed the party of the first part, and the Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Company, termed the party of the second part, witnesseth: First. The party of the first part hereby agrees to give to the party of the second part all cotton to compress that they carry out of Memphis compressed. The party of the second part bind themselves to properly and promptly compress all of said cotton, and shall insure the same for the benefit of the first party; and the price to be paid therefor by said first party shall be at the rate of 12½ cts. per 100 pounds, bill of lading weights, for all cotton compressed, etc., on and prior to 31st Aug. 1887, and 10 cts. per 100 pounds, bill of lading weights, for all cotton so compressed, etc., thereafter during the term of this agreement. This compensation covers compressing and insurance, as well as the use of the second party's grounds, sheds, platforms, steamboat landing, and all services rendered by said second party in and about such cotton delivered it hereunder until the same is delivered either in cars or to steam-boats to the first party by the second party. Second. Such insurance shall be taken for the benefit of the first party, in good and solvent companies, so as to cover any loss while such cotton is under the second party's control, and until delivered to the first party. Third. The second party shall be liable for any loss arising from negligence or lack of care in any wise to such cotton while under its control, agreeing to be bound therefor as a bailee for hire, and for any such loss shall pay the first party all damages and costs, or the first party may retain any dues to the second party to cover such loss; this, however, not to be limited to the amount of such dues. Fourth. The first party hereby constitutes the second party its agent to receive such cotton for it, and sign receipts on which bills of lading may be issued, when cotton is delivered in their compresses on the ground located at its river landing. Fifth. So far as it can legally do so, the first party agrees to establish no other compress agency, nor employ any other compress to do its compressing of cotton, at Memphis, Tennessee, during the term of this contract. Sixth. All bills for compressing cotton shall be paid weekly. Seventh. This contract is to continue in force until the 31st of Aug. 1896, said rate of 12½ cts. per 100 pounds being for one year from the 1st day of September, 1886, and said rate of 10 cts. per 100 pounds for the remaining nine years; and this contract is to relate back to said 1st day of Sept., 1886, and is to cover as to its terms all compressing of cotton by the second party for the first party since that date."

The first of these contracts was made with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and when the facilities for warehousing and compression of the Merchants' Cotton-Press

& Storage Company were very limited. But the Company built other presses, enlarged its facilities, and extended its contracts until all the railroad and transportation companies doing business in Memphis, and having an initial carrier there, were included in the contractual arrangement under which it did business. It was originally contemplated that all cotton received into its various compresses should be "permitted" by the various carriers in the manner described in detail in the Lancaster Mills Case, but this contemplated method was not adhered to, and cotton was received from owners without permits; when so delivered the Compress Company receipting therefor, and agreeing, either in face of receipts or understood to do so as fully when such receipts were not executed, to cover all cotton delivered with insurance. Such we hold to have been the actual fact of their several special contracts, and the effect of their reception of cotton for compression, according to the understanding between themselves and owners. The usage as to all was in substantial accord with special agreements as to some of the patrons of the Company, as before explained; that is, to insure for carriers by contracts expressly made, and owners expressly made in the carrier contracts and dray receipts, contracts or usage. It therefore follows that the Compress Company, not being liable to any for negligence in suffering the cotton to be burned, is liable to all interested as carriers by express contracts made with them, or owners under such express contracts, and those evidenced as made with owners by dray receipts and usage, for the failure to procure insurance sufficient to cover any loss that occurred. The Compress Company had in fact procured insurance only to the amount of $301,750, while the entire loss was about $700,000. Before going to other questions involved, it is proper to consider here the relation which this Company occupied to the railroad and transportation companies with which it had contracts, and in what sense delivery of cotton to its compresses is to be taken as delivery to these carriers. For them it is argued, on the one hand, that, where cotton was delivered to the Compress Company, and its receipts executed therefor, and these given up to the railroad or transportation companies, and bills of lading by them issued for such cotton, there was no actual delivery to the carriers; and, on the other hand, that, if there was in such event a delivery to them, then the cotton was in their depots or stations, within the meaning of certain exemption clauses in their bills of lading, wherein, in various forms, they have stipulated against liability in cases of fire in their depots, stations, or places of transshipment. Both of these contentions are unsound. The carriers selected by contract, and by usage (as to those who had no contracts), the Compress Company as their agent, and agreed to be bound on delivery to it when they executed bills of lading. It was competent for them to do this, and they did it; and, while doing so, those who had contracts with the Compress Company, recognizing it as a special risk before the cotton came actually into their own depots or cars, stipulated with their agent (the said Compress Company) to carry insurance for their indemnity, as they also had the right to do, while those who had no such contract took this special carrier risk without it, as they also had the right to do. But the compresses of the Company did not thereby become depots, stations, or places of transshipment of the carriers, even of those who had none of their own in Memphis, because they contracted, where such carriers issued bills of lading, with reference to intended shipment over lines which did have, and the same rule applies to them as to initial lines, either alone or in association with others.

The compresses were not in fact depots or stations of the railroad or transportation companies, and in no contract entered into do they purport to be. Each road leading from Memphis had its own depot, and each transportation company not having any contract to use these lines which they did as agents, and hence their "depots" and "stations" are those meant in contemplation of the carrier contracts into which they entered. The presses were alone those constructively, as in fact, of the Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Company, and this Company reserved the right to charge storage on cotton after a stated time, and, in receipts given for cotton to be surrendered to the carriers, in lieu of which bills of lading were issued by them, it was stipulated that, "if held in press over fifteen days before bills of lading issue, or if sold while in press, 50 cts. per bale per month charges will be collected before delivery or shipment." The form is not given as of all receipts, though it would seem it was so, nor is it deemed very material. It is only one of the evidences (about which, perhaps, the well-understood fact on this point called for none) that nobody contracted for or understood the Compress Company to be a depot or station or place of deposit of any company other than the corporation which owned it. The carriers which had contracts with the Compress Company contracted only that the Compress Company should represent them as agents, and receive in its warehouse or press, and hold until actual delivery to them, while those who had no contracts with the Compress Company had, of course, no agreement to use the Compress Company's warehouse or press as a depot. Therefore no exemptions not in terms embracing a loss by fire in warehouse for compression or other cotton-press include this loss. General clauses of exemption from loss by fire will be construed to relate alone to loss in depots, stations, on the cars, or in places of transshipment of the carrier after actual custody of the cotton, and held inoperative to excuse from liability for this loss. These limitations upon the common-law liability of a common carrier are not favored. They are to be strictly construed, and limited to the general risk of the carrier after actual custody of the cotton, unless the terms thereof expressly extend to a special risk. Where, therefore, a carrier has effected an arrangement with a Compress Company to act as the carrier's agent, and receive cotton in the agent's press, and accepts delivery there by the shipper, instead of at the carrier's own depot, and upon such delivery issues the ordinary carrier bill of lading, stipulating for exemption from loss by fire, it will not be construed to relate to fire in the cotton-press. Such a clause will not cover a special risk like this.

The Kanawha Despatch is therefore the only carrier entitled to exemption on account of its carrier contracts. The bills of lading of the Kanawha Despatch, so far as material to this question, read as follows: "It is further mutually agreed that no carrier shall be liable for loss or damage of any article or property whatever by fire or other casualty, in or at any cotton-press, or during transportation to or from press, or while in transit, while in depots or on wharves awaiting shipment, transshipment, or delivery, or fire from any cause, on land or water." The Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Company, which the chancellor held not liable, and the Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company, the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati & Indianapolis Railway Company, the Cairo, Vincennes & Chicago Line, and the Blue Line, which he held liable, are all liable under the principle settled.

The bill of lading of the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Company, so far as material to this question, is as follows: "Neither of said carriers shall be liable for leakage of any kinds of liquids, nor for losses by the bursting of casks or barrels of liquid, arising from expansion or other unavoidable causes; breakage of any kind of glass, carboys of acid, or articles packed in glass, stoves and stove furniture, casting machinery, carriages, furniture, musical instruments of any kind, packages of eggs; or loss or damage of hay, hemp, cotton; or the evaporation or leakage of liquids of any description; leakage of grain in bulk; or for damages to personal property of any kind, occasioned from delays from any cause or change of weather; or damage by fire; or loss or damage on sea or rivers."

The bill of lading of the Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company on this point is as follows: "That this company shall not be liable . . . for loss or damage by wet, dirt, fire, or loss of weight, or for condition of baling on hay, hemp, or cotton; nor for loss or damage of any kind on any article whose bulk requires it to be carried in open cars; nor damage of perishable property of any kind, occasioned by delays from any cause or change of weather; nor for loss or damage on any article of property whatever, by fire or casualty while in transit, or while in depots, or places of transshipment, or at depots or landings at point of delivery; nor for loss or damage by fire, collision, or the dangers of navigation, while on seas, rivers, lakes, or canals."

The bill of lading of the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati & Indianapolis Railway Company, after acknowledging in the usual form the receipt of the goods, proceeds: "Which they agree to deliver at Cleveland, Ohio, station, with as reasonable dispatch as the general business will permit, subject to the conditions mentioned below, in like good order (the dangers incident to railroad transportation, loss or damage by fire while at depots or stations, loss or damage of combustible articles by fire while in transit, and unavoidable accidents excepted), upon the payment of charges. . . . It is agreed, and is a part of the consideration of this contract, that neither this nor any company or carrier to whom the same shall be delivered, in the course of transportation to the place of final destination, is to be responsible for loss or damage to goods occasioned by providential causes, or by fire from any cause whatever, while in transit or at stations."

The bill of lading of the Calro, Vincennes & Chicago Line, as to this question, is as follows: "That the C., V. & C. Line, and the forwarding lines with which it connects, and which receive said property, shall not be liable for leakage of oils, or any other kinds of liquids, breakage of any kind of glass, earthen, or queen's ware, carboys of acid, or articles packed in glass, stoves, stove furniture, castings, machinery, carriages, furniture, musical instruments of any kind, packages of eggs, or for rust of iron and iron articles, or for loss or damage by wet, dirt, fire, or for loss of weight, or for condition of bailing on hay, hemp, or cotton, or for loss or damage of any kind on any article whose bulk requires it to be carried in open cars; nor for loss or damage on any article of property whatever by fire or other casualty, while in transit, or while in depots or other places of transshipment, or at depots or landings at points of delivery; nor for loss or damage by fire, collision, or the dangers of navigation while on seas, rivers, lakes, or canals."

Like clause in the bill of lading of the Blue Line reads: "It is agreed and is a part of the consideration of this contract, that the Company will not be responsible for leakage of liquids, breakage of glass or queen's ware, the injury or breakage of looking-glasses, glass show-cases, picture frames, stove castings, or hollow ware; nor for the injury to the hidden contents of packages; nor for the loss of weight or otherwise of grain and coffee in bags, or rice in tierces; nor for the decay of perishable articles; nor for damage arising to any article carried from the effects of heat or cold; nor for the loss of nuts in bags, or lemons or oranges in boxes, unless covered with canvas; or loss or damage to goods occasioned by providential causes, or by fire from any cause whatever, while in transit or stations; nor will the companies be responsible for damage on tobacco, unless it is proved to have occurred during the time of its transit over this line, and notice must be given within thirty hours after the arrival of same."

Settling thus the effect of the exemption clauses in the several bills of lading, we reach the main question made against them all, and that is that they are void, because (1) without consideration, and (2) unreasonable.

Taking up these divisions of the question in order, we consider that of consideration first. And here we observe that again the 18 L. R. A.

pleadings have been so amended as to meet the difficulty suggested in the Lancaster Mills Case, that there was an omission of allegation in the pleadings there that the clause was without consideration, imposed by duress, or unreasonable. In that case it was held that such a stipulation in a bill of lading, wherein a through rate was granted for carriage over lines of more than one carrier, will be presumed to be upon a sufficient consideration, and reasonable. It is now alleged and insisted that the carrier has charged and received compensation additional to that usually taken for transportation, with restricted risk, and that, in effect, the shipper has been made to pay the insurance premium. It is true that for effecting insurance of the special risk of the compress holding, and agreement to procure carriage beyond the line of particular carriers, the charge was slightly greater, but there were additional benefits conferred which justified it, and this was no more than just consideration therefor.

The argument that the stipulation for exemption is unreasonable is based, not alone upon the idea that one line of road may not stipulate for such exemption in consideration of its procuring carriage beyond its own line, but it is said that here the various carriers were in combination, forming a continuous line from Memphis to points of distribution; or transportation companies sued as carriers having no line leading from Memphis were in association with initial lines there, and contracting as a continuous line to carry from Memphis to such destination, as the Kanawha Despatch, or transportation companies having no lines and no initial carriers in Memphis were contracting as through lines to carry from Memphis to points of destination, as the Blue Line, which, without a road, contracted to carry from ocean to ocean. It is argued that the effect of such agreement as was made by the several lines and transportation companies is the same as though made by a carrier owning the line from Memphis to destination point. That such a carrier could not have stipulated for exemption from fire loss, unless it had been ready and willing to have made the shipment under its common-law liability, which included such loss, and that the evidence shows that none of the companies or associations sued were prepared or willing to so ship. The evidence does show that none of them would have issued bills of lading such as these, omitting the fire clause, but that all the initial carriers and lines leading from Memphis would have done so over their own lines, but had no arrangement authorizing them to do more.

The question thus presented is the most serious in the case. If complainant be right in assuming that these lines or companies shipping by special contract over and beyond any one initial carrier's line, stand upon the same footing as would a carrier owning the entire line over which the shipment was made, then it follows, from the fact that they were not ready and willing to execute a contract for shipment under common-law liability, the stipulation for exemption against fire loss would be void, for it is well settled in this State that such a clause is only valid when it was optional with the shipper to ship upon or without such agreement. The option need not be in fact offered to the shipper. It is sufficient if it would have been given had he demanded it. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Manchester Mills, 88 Tenn. 638.

Before determining this question it is necessary to notice here a division of it arising upon differences in the character of carrier lines assuming the obligations. These, though they are susceptible of more, may be, for the purpose of this statement, divided into two classes, one being that of an initial carrier having a line leading from Memphis to a given point, and a traffic arrangement or combination with connecting lines, whereby it is authorized to make (and make only) the contract in question as to shipment beyond its own line; the other being a transportation company having no initial carrier or line, but offering to make such special contract only, and not having power to execute any other, proposing to use initial and connecting roads for one continuous shipment. Respecting the character of these companies and liability assumed, we hold they are the same. Both but in fact proposed to use agencies which they did not profess to own, and contracts made with one are governed by the same rules of law as those which control the other. In the case of Merchants Despatch Transp. Co. v. Bloch, 86 Tenn. 392, a transportation company not owning or controlling any means of conveyance itself, but engaging on its own behalf, in the business of transporting goods through the agency and over the lines of other carriers of its own selection and employment, was held to be a common carrier, and subject to all the responsibilities attaching to that character, and that the carriers employed by such transportation company were its agents, and not the agents of the shipper or consignee. In this view each could make any contract which the other could lawfully make, and would be bound by the same agreements, and be exempted from the same responsibility, in like contracts.

This being true, the contract must be regarded as though made by one line for itself and as agent to make the special contract for others. The through bills of lading issued were for the performance of the service of transportation by several successive carriers, no one of which was under any common-law obligation to enter into any contract at all for through carriage over all. It is no longer doubted that each carrier in the connection could have made a contract for itself, whereby it limited its liability for loss by fire. York Mfg. Co. v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 170; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 360, 21 L. ed. 634; Dillard v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Lea, 288.

These were all cases in which the contract was for delivery at a point beyond the terminus of the line of the contracting carrier. It was presumed, in the first case cited, though there was no evidence to that effect, that the initial carrier had rates proportioned to the risk assumed from the nature of the 18 L. R. A.

goods carried, and that losses by fire must necessarily have affected the compensation demanded. But the court said: "Be this as it may, the consideration expressed was sufficient to support the entire contract made." Here it is proven that they had no charge for the entire route agreed upon with other carriers, and ready to be proposed to the shipper, without limitation of responsibility; but it is proven that they had such a rate on their own initial lines; and, in the absence of proof, it may be presumed that the connecting carriers each did have such a rate under the authority cited. But, be this as it may, as they were under no common-law liability to agree to ship at all beyond their own lines, they may make such a special contract, and, if otherwise reasonable (as in each of these cases it was) such contract is not void, but must be upheld.

Having determined, in the order in which they most naturally arise, the relation which the Compress Company occupied towards owners and carriers under its contracts and usage, with its liability for failure to procure insurance, and its non-liability for negligence, we are brought to the questions which arise upon the insurance contracts effected by it, and to others arising upon insurance contracts effected by owners, and to those of contribution between the several insurers. The $301,750 of insurance procured by the Compress Company was distributed in forty-four companies. In all policies procured the Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Company was named as the assured, and in each of them the risk was set forth on a printed slip, pasted in the body of the policy, reading: "On all cotton in bales received by them [it] as agents [agent] for the benefit of railroads, transportation lines, or owners in the boundaries of the Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Company's West Navy-Yard Compress. . . . The liability of the insurers is to begin on the receipt of said cotton on the premises of the assured as herein described, for compressing, and is to cease and terminate when removed from the platforms of the Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Company for transportation." The greater part of the cotton in the compress was covered by marine policies of insurance in favor of special owners. They aggregated about $700,000. The amount of cotton destroyed was about 14,000 bales, of the value of $700,000. Of this amount there was $52,472.26 worth for which no bills of lading had been issued, and upon which there was no other insurance. The other cotton destroyed was covered by marine policies, and the amounts due the several parties thereunder have been paid or advanced to them by the several companies issuing these policies. In respect to all these companies except those represented and claiming through Deming & Co. in their suit the chancellor held there could be no recovery against the Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Company, because of a breach of its contract to fully cover by insurance; the theory upon which this holding was made being that announced in the Lancaster Mills Case, that an owner not relying upon the obligation of the Compress Company to carry insurance, and having for himself effected other insurance in good and solvent companies, would not be heard to say that he had been damaged by the failure of the Compress Company to do for him that which he had done for himself. This proposition was not actually decided in that case, the necessity for it being obviated by the fact of payment. The owner, therefore, not only having insured in solvent companies, but having in fact received payment from them, could not complain that he had been injured by the failure of the Compress Company to cover his cotton with other insurance. Not having been injured by such failure, he acquired no right, and, of course, his insurer could obtain none on this account. But the proposition was law, and the chancellor might properly have adjudged additionally, as we now do, that the transactions by which the marine insurance companies advanced money in full of the several losses, subject to be repaid only upon the contingency that the assured should recover from bailee or carrier primarily liable for negligence, or, in the latter case, for loss without exemption in bill of lading, were for all purposes of these suits payments, and that thereafter neither the assured nor their insurers had any right, original or by subrogation, against either Compress Company or carrier, unless the Compress Company was primarily liable for negligence, or the carrier was primarily liable for the fire loss, unprotected by bill of lading exemptions. And this is true as to the arrangement effected by Deming & Co., which the chancellor held was not a payment upon the particular facts now to be stated. After the loss, and when the insurance company was fully informed concerning the circumstances thereof, the president of the Phoenix Insurance Company procured, for and through Deming, of banks, the full amount of insurance of Deming & Company, and an amount additional sufficient to purchase claims of co-plaintiffs in that suit. This borrowing was done in the name of Deming, but it was absolutely secured by an actual deposit of the insurance company, and with the understanding that Deming was only to pay it out of the recovery against the carrier; or, to put it differently, that the insurance company was to pay it if Deming & Company failed to recover in this case. Then, if no recovery could be had against the carrier, it was a payment. This is its legal effect. It concedes liability fixed by the loss, and that the policies extended to and covered it. As to the questions that it now attempts to make, that its policies did not cover this risk, and that it was not in fact liable, the company is concluded by the arrangement and understanding with Deming. These companies all stand on the same footing. But, having paid the assured, they are entitled to be subrogated to his right against parties primarily liable,—that is, against the Compress Company, if the loss was occasioned by its negligence; and against any carrier primarily liable for the loss,—that is, one not protected by valid exemption from liability on account of loss by fire.

We have elsewhere shown what carriers were primarily liable, and this is all we need say in this connection.

Another question was made and determined by the chancellor against the liability of the Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of London, for 305 bales of cotton, on account of "shore risk" clause, whereby its risk of fire "on shore," prior to shipment, was to cover a period not exceeding ten days. This money had been advanced to the assured by the insurance company, but the chancellor held it not to be a payment, because of the following agreement contained in its policy, to this effect: "It is understood and agreed, between Warren Manufacturing Company and the Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of London, that when said Warren Manufacturing Company shall present to Marine Insurance Company, Limited, proof that any cotton shipped, or purchased for shipment, by said Warren Manufacturing Company, has been lost, damaged, or destroyed while in the custody or control of any carrier, or while any carrier or other bailee was liable to said Warren Manufacturing Company therefor, said Marine Insurance Company, Limited, shall advance to said Warren Manufacturing Company, or to the holder of the certificate issued by said Warren Manufacturing Company, against such shipment, an amount equivalent to the insured value of the cotton so lost, damaged, or destroyed, pending the collection of the claim against the carrier or other bailee, said Warren Manufacturing Company agreeing to refund said advance immediately upon collection of said claim. It is further understood and agreed that, upon the first advice of such loss, said Warren Manufacturing Company shall notify said Marine Insurance Company, Limited, and shall select as their representative to deal with the carrier, or other bailee, such person or persons as the said Marine Insurance Company, Limited, may designate. Warranted that this agreement to advance and the policy of insurance to which it applies, shall not in any way inure to the benefit of any carrier or other bailee. This agreement to be binding so long as policy No. 502, issued by said Marine Insurance Company, Limited, to said Warren Manufacturing Company shall remain in force." It was held that the 305 bales were not covered by the policy, and that advancement of the amount of its insurance did not, in legal effect, amount to payment, or estop the company to deny its liability, or insist that the policy did not cover the loss, and that, by reason of said agreement, the company had the right to advance it, and still contest the liability.

The reasoning of the learned chancellor on this point can be best presented by quoting it. It is as follows: "The owners of cotton holding the policies of the Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of London, were not insured by those policies to the extent of all cottons that remained in the compress exceeding ten days before the fire, and to this extent the complainants will take decree against the compress company for breach of its liability to insure, and for shares of insurance actually taken by it. Under the terms of the agreements attached to the policies of this company, and forming parts thereof, the advances of money to the assured cannot be regarded either as payments of the losses or as evidences of admissions of liability on the policies. These agreements expressly provide that, when proofs of loss merely are presented, the insurance company shall advance 'an amount equivalent to the insured value of the cotton so lost or destroyed, pending the collection of the claim against the carrier or other bailee, the insured agreeing to refund said advance immediately upon collection of said claim.' Here was an advance actually made under a valid stipulation of the policy, and not a payment in the guise of an advance, made under a new arrangement after the loss, independent of an obligation of the company to make it. Why was the advance made? Clearly, because the contract imposed the obligation to make it. Why was it received at that time by the assured? Clearly, because at that time he was not under the contract entitled to anything more. Without elaboration, I think it is entirely clear that this feature of these policies distinguishes them, in respect of the point under consideration, from all the others where the loans or advances were made without stipulation in the policies to that effect, and without obligation on the part of the company, under post nati arrangements, which bear unmistakable signs of cloaking the real purposes of the parties."

The agreement on which the money, after loss, was advanced, was as follows: "Whereas by certain contract or contracts of insurance made and concluded on or about the 5th day of November, the Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of London, insured Messrs. Warren Manufacturing Company and their assigns against loss or damage to certain cotton therein described, and the said assured warranted that the said insurance should not in any way inure to the benefit of any bailee of said cotton, and the said assurer undertook that, in case of loss or damage to any of said cotton while in the custody or control of any bailee, that it would lend to assured, or to their assigns, an amount equivalent to the insured value of the cotton so lost or damaged, pending the collection of the claim for the loss or damage from the bailee or bailees liable therefor; and whereas, certain cotton claimed by the said assured to be so insured has been damaged or destroyed while in the custody or control of the bailees thereof, to wit, a loss by fire amounting in its insured value to the sum of twenty-five thousand one hundred and three and thirty-seven one hundredths dollars: Now, therefore, this agreement witnesseth that the undersigned, the above-named assured, have this day borrowed from the above named, the Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of London, the sum of money last above written, upon the express condition that the said sum shall be by them returned to the said the Marine Insurance Company, Limited, upon the collection of the claim for the loss or damage to the cotton from the bailee or bailees liable therefor, and payment thereof to the undersigned. Dated December 29th, 1887. [Signed] Warren Manufacturing Company. John Waterman, Treasurer."

It will be seen that the chancellor reached this conclusion, and took this case out of the rule herein announced, respecting payment, by the assumption that this advance was agreed to be made at all events in the policy, and that, the subsequent advance having been made in pursuance of the original contract, it was not payment or concession of liability, because the policy covered the loss sustained. In this conclusion we do not concur. The original agreement, properly construed, only required an advance in case the loss was at a time and under such circumstances as made the company liable therefor; and, when the amount to cover a loss was advanced only to be returned upon collection from the bailee or bailees liable therefor, it was a concession that the loss was covered by the policy, and but reserved the right of the insurance company to recover of the bailee through the owner. If the bailee was not liable to the owner, there was to be no return, and there could be no subrogation. There was nothing in the policy, properly construed, which required this advance, whether the policy covered the loss or not. There was nothing to prevent the insurance company requiring, as a condition of advancement, that the assured should guarantee a return, if for any reason the insurance company turned out not to be liable, or, at least, agree to return the money in that event. It chose to advance without taking any guaranty or agreement for restitution, if it should thereafter appear that the insurance company was not liable for the loss, but took, instead, an obligation to return it, not if it were not liable, but if someone else, the bailee, should be made so. This must be held, in legal effect, to concede that the loss was covered by the policy, and that the insurance company was liable therefor, and to reserve only the right of subrogation to assured's claim against the bailee for negligence, and carrier unprotected by fire clause, and hence primarily liable,—a right existing without such contract. This advance was therefore a payment. If the insurance company could not have been held to make it, it has chosen voluntarily to do so and thus put the owner in a situation in which he cannot be damaged by reason of failure of the compress company to insure for him. Not being able to establish this, he has no right to a decree against the Compress Company, and, of course, his insurer has none. The only thing not conceded by the payment was the right which payment gave of subrogation to owner's right against one primarily liable for negligence or loss by fire without exemption.

There is still another special question which arises in the marine insurance policies, proper to be disposed of here before coming to the last insurance question we will present,—that of contribution. The question indicated is the construction of what is known as the "American clause" contained in some of the marine policies. It would be a useless increase of the volume of this statement to quote that clause from all of the said policies. They are all in substantially one form. We quote two of them, to wit: (1) That of the Phenix Insurance Company, held by R. H. Deming & Co.: "Provided, always, and it is herein further agreed, that if the said assured shall have made any other assurance upon the premises aforesaid, prior in date to this policy, then the said Phenix Insurance Company shall be answerable only for so much as the amount of such prior assurance may be deficient towards fully covering the premises hereby assured; and the said Phenix Insurance Company shall return the premium upon so much of the sum by them assured as they shall be by such prior assurance exonerated from. And, in case of any insurance upon the premises, subsequent in date to this policy, the said Phenix Insurance Company shall, nevertheless, be answerable for the full extent of the sum by them subscribed hereto, without right to claim contribution from such subsequent assurers, and shall accordingly be entitled to retain the premium by them received, in the same manner as if no subsequent assurance had been made." (2) That of the British & Foreign Marine Insurance, Limited, of Liverpool, is as follows: "Provided, always, and it is hereby further agreed, that if the said assured shall have made any other assurance upon the premises aforesaid, prior in day of date to this policy, then the said assurers shall be answerable only for so much as the amount of such prior assurance may be deficient towards fully covering the premises hereby assured; and the said assurers shall return the premium upon so much of the sum by them assured as they shall be, by such prior assurance, exonerated from; and in case of any insurance upon the said premises, subsequent in day of date to this policy, the said assurers shall, nevertheless, be answerable for the full extent of the sum by them subscribed hereto, without right to claim contribution from such subsequent assurers, and shall accordingly be entitled to retain the premium by them received, in the same manner as if no such subsequent assurance had been made. Other insurance upon the premises aforesaid, of date the same day of this policy, shall be deemed simultaneous herewith; and the said assurers shall not be liable for more than a ratable contribution, in the proportion of the sum by them insured to the aggregate of such simultaneous insurance."

Under the terms of this, the American clause, as contained in the various marine policies, it was held by the chancellor that the question as to whether the fire insurance preceded, was contemporaneous with, or was subsequent to, the marine insurance, was to be determined, not by the dates of the respective policies, but by the date of the attaching of the risk under each, and, holding that the risk attached contemporaneously under each, it was held that the principle of contribution must govern. To fully understand the chancellor's view, and reasons therefor, it is proper to quote his admirable statement in full on this point. It is as follows: "I am of the opinion that, under the American clauses of the marine open policies, there was no insurance until the cotton was brought within their terms, and became the subject of insurance. An open policy does not, ex vi termini, insure property until the property is brought within its terms. Hence there is no insurance until then. The rule making the date of the policy the date of the insurance applies to valued policies, but not to open policies. Here confessedly, under this rule, the risks under the marine open policies and the fire open policies were concurrent, and the American clauses do not operate."

The proposition of fact upon which this is based is denied, and it is insisted that there was a period of time, however brief, after purchase before deposit in the compress when the cotton was covered alone by the marine policy, and such seems to be the fact. But, waiving this, we hold that the date of the policy, and not of the attaching of the risk, must govern. It is so agreed in express terms, and no reason is perceived why such an agreement might not be made in contemplation of open policies. It is true that ordinarily the date of a contract is not material, but this is not true when it is specially made so in terms,—where it is, among other things, an object contracted about. The insurer, for whose advantage in one sense it is, may well contract to assume an entire liability, and retain an entire premium against contemplated additional insurance as well as existing insurance. No case has been found adjudging the contrary, and, although none has been produced in which the question was in terms raised and disposed of, several have been cited where, upon the facts, it arose and was taken for granted, as we decide it, neither counsel nor court disputing its correctness, and where it was necessarily applied in effecting the result. American Ins. Co. v. Griswold, 14 Wend. 399; Whiting v. Independent Mut. Insurance Co. 15 Md. 297.

That the actual date controls is assumed and taken for granted in previous cases. Lee v. Massachusetts F. & M. Ins. Co. 6 Mass. 208; M Kim v. Phenix Ins. Co. 2 Wash. C. C. 95; Columbian Ins. Co. v. Catlett, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 383, 6 L. ed. 664; Seamans v. Loring, 1 Mason, 146. While in others it has been held, if policies bear same date, evidence might be received to show actual time of execution of each. Opinion by Judge Story, Potter v. Marine Ins. Co. 2 Mason, 476.

This last contingency was provided for in one of the policies quoted, which made other insurance of the same day as that policy, "simultaneous" therewith, a strong evidential fact to show that the date of the contract was regarded as controlling, and that it is now construed as then understood. It will be seen further on that the purpose of the clause was to alter the common-law rule of contribution, as announced in a case to be cited, and to make the policies liable successively in the order of their respective dates. If it be now determined that the date does not control, but the date of the attaching of the risk under open policies determines, the rule of contribution, which the clause was intended to avoid, would in all its force be reinstated. We think it clear that it can have no such construction as would defeat the purpose for which it was originated. In view of the origin and purpose of this clause, this construction is all the more manifestly correct. Its object, as deduced from its effect, seems to have been to meet a modification or change made in the law of insurance as it had been understood to exist before in England, by a decision of Lord Mansfield in Newby v. Reed, 1 W. Bl. 416. It is thus stated by Chancellor Walworth in the case hereinbefore cited of American Ins. Co. v. Griswold: "By the continental law of Europe, and the law of English insurance as it existed previous to the decision of Lord Mansfield in Newby v. Reed, supra, if there were several policies of different dates upon the same subject, and the amount of insurable interest was insufficient to cover the whole amount insured in both policies, so as to constitute a case of double insurance, the second policy only attached upon or covered so much of the insurable interest as was not covered by the first policy; and the second underwriter was only entitled to retain the premium pro tanto, where the commencement and termination of the risk and the perils insured against were the same. 3 Kent, Com. 281; Vanderl. Com. p. 655, b. 4, chap. 16, § 7; Miller, Ins. 366. By this ancient English rule and the continental law the second underwriter was, as he ought to be, merely substituted in the place of the assured, as to the uninsured interest of the latter, which was not covered by the first policy; so that the rule of apportionment between the first and second sets of insurers, where both policies, when taken together, were sufficient to cover the whole insurable interest, was precisely the same as it would have been between the underwriters in the first policy and the assured, if the second insurance had not been made. If the object of the American clause was to restore this ancient rule of apportionment between the underwriters in successive policies, as it originally existed in the Mercantile Law of England as well as the rest of Europe, it is hardly possible to do it in more appropriate and explicit language than is used in the last paragraph of this clause. That language is that, in case of an insurance subsequent in date to the first policy, the underwriters in the first policy 'shall nevertheless be answerable for the full extent of the sum by them subscribed, without the right to claim contribution from such subsequent assurers, and shall accordingly be entitled to retain the premium by them received in the same manner as if no such subsequent assurance had been made:' that is, that they are to have no right to claim a contribution from the subsequent assurers, and are to be answerable to the assured in the same manner as if the subsequent insurance had not been made, as well as to retain the premium in the same manner. It appears to be impossible, therefore, under this policy, that the circumstance of there being subsequent policies underwritten by others could make any difference as to the apportionment of the loss as between the underwriter in the first policy and the assured, or those who represented the insurable interest of the goods on board at the time of the loss not covered by that policy." Id. pp. 481, 482.

We have presented the quotation, with the argument and statement of the purpose for which it is made, and do not deem it necessary to add more on that question.

We come now to the question of contribution between the insurers or co-insurers, the fire and marine companies. The nominal assured in the fire policies was the Compress Company; the designated beneficiaries were the railroad companies, transportation lines, and owners. The two former (the Compress Company and carrier risks) were not included in the marine policies. Nevertheless it is insisted that the owners' risk covered in the marine policies was the same as owners' risk covered in the fire policies, and that contribution must therefore be enforced between these companies. The insuperable objection to this, so far as the Compress Company and carriers are involved, is that as to their risks they are not covered by the marine policies, while they are covered by the fire policies. It follows, therefore, that, so far as the Compress Company or the carriers may be held liable, the fire companies must respond to that liability, and there can be no contribution as to owners' insurance until that liability is extinguished. If this were not true, the very purpose for which the fire policies were procured—that of indemnity to the assured—would fail. The object of all such insurance is indemnity, and no equity of contribution can defeat it. Indemnity is the prime object of insurance. Every other rule is subordinate, and in no case will contribution be enforced so as to deny indemnity and equity to all the assured.

In application of this rule the Compress Company insists that the fire insurance must be so appropriated as to leave no party included among the assured in these policies unprotected. Recognizing that the effort to protect its own interest had been made without specification, except that it was assured, and that carriers' and owners' interest specially insured must be taken into consideration, and be provided with full indemnity before it is affected, and to prevent its being injuriously affected, it insists that it has the right to have the fire insurance fund so applied as to indemnify carriers and uninsured owners, and thus protect itself as one of the assured, which it insists it is in this sense and to this effect, because the object of being an assured was to derive any benefit properly or in any contingency occurring in consequence of insuring these special interests; that being thus insured, then it, as assured, is a beneficiary to any extent which such insurance so applied makes it, when their protection and its own is secured by such application. It does not insist that it can in any event take a benefit under these policies over an owner, but it claims the right to have the fire insurance appropriated to uninsured owners because the others are not damaged; and, if they are, then the compress company is liable to them under its contract, express or implied, to procure insurance, and the money it receives in such appropriation would have been at last appropriated to owners when needed for their indemnity. It is insisted, however, in this contingency which has now arisen, where certain owners are damaged by the loss, and others not, that equity requires the appropriation in the carriers' favor to the loss of the otherwise uninsured owner; that such appropriation cannot injure an assured owner, for he gets his full insurance from that source, and, if it fails, the Compress Company is liable, and the protection it receives in the appropriation claimed goes to his benefit; that this result cannot be defeated in favor of contribution, by the intervention of owners' insurer claiming subrogation. He is not entitled to subrogation to the owner's claim against the Compress Company for failure to procure insurance. This right would only exist as to that procured, nothing else preventing; but here it must not be construed to extend to that, and thus defeat the application of the policies procured to indemnity of the assured. The claim of the Compress Company is not that it escapes liability to the owner for default in not procuring insurance, or that it is entitled to thus escape it, but it is that, to the extent the Compress Company did take out such insurance, the insurance can and must be applied before any contribution is invoked, so as to protect the Compress Company to that extent, and that is done by applying this insurance to the carrier liability and to cover loss of the otherwise uninsured owner.

In this view we concur, disagreeing with the chancellor, who held all owners entitled primarily to participate, and their insurers to do so by subrogation. This was one of the questions not before the court in the Lancaster Mills Case. There it was said, while taken out for the benefit of carriers (meaning contracting carriers), the cotton itself was insured, and this we again repeat here. But the question of contribution and subrogation now arising did not arise in that case; what was then said was not in that view. Leaving, therefore, that question, we return to the question of contribution among others.

The rule of contribution among co-insurers is one which equity has evolved out of conditions of contemporaneous liability for the same loss. Like all others of such origin, it is the application of common sense and natural justice to situations, and the solution of difficulties not provided for by fixed rules of law. Its object is to do justice, and it will not be, under any circumstances, a correct application of it if the result is injustice to any of the assured affected by the application. If the property which was the subject matter of insurance was the same, interest the same, and risks identical, the contribution consequent is obviously that which would be proper as between co-sureties for the same obligation. But here the fire policies were on two interests and risks (that of contracting carriers, and of the Compress Company, as shown), not covered by the marine policies, and the fire insurance fund must therefore be first applied so as to protect these. If in such application it is exhausted in indemnifying the carriers held liable and uninsured owners, then there will remain no fund for contribution. If not, the marine insurers, not having the American clause, are entitled to have contribution, as the fire insurance was for all owners, including those covered by the marine policies (excluding, of course, Hall, who did not consent to procuring of fire insurance for him, but forbade it). To do equity, the fire insurance must be appropriated to cover carrier liability and otherwise uninsured owners. As it is insufficient for this purpose, it will result that there will be no contribution.

One of the claims involved in this record, that of Paton & Co. for twenty-nine bales of cotton, stands on different ground from that of others discussed. The bill of lading of the Kanawha Dispatch, held for this cotton, had a valid fire-clause exemption; but this, of course, did not operate to excuse the company from liability, if the loss was occasioned by negligence, and it is insisted the loss was so occasioned. There was no special allegation that the twenty-nine bales referred to were burned after they were loaded on the cars, but such was the fact, as proven upon general allegation of liability of the company for its loss. The evidence was proper under the general allegation, and, if it makes but a case of negligence, the Kanawha Dispatch is liable notwithstanding the fire clause exemption. The testimony of witness Wheaton, introduced by defendant, shows that this cotton was in the second section of a train made up to leave about 7 o'clock. That this section stood near the compress. The train should have been made up and pulled away from there from one half to three quarters of an hour before leaving time. He says leaving time was 7 o'clock or 7:30; "about 7." He was asked by counsel of the company to examine his (witness') office records, and see if he can find the schedule then in force, and give it to said counsel, and answered, "I will do so." Whether he did or not does not appear. If so, counsel did not file it. It may be therefore fairly presumed that the starting time was not later than 7. He was asked by complainants' counsel if the leaving time was 7 o'clock, and if that custom had been followed would not the compress track have then been cleared; and answered, "It would have been cleared of the loaded cars." It thus and elsewhere appears in his testimony that the cars were left where they burned later than ordinary. But, added to this, the witness shows that, while taking off the first section of the train, the "engine in starting broke a draw-bar about the middle of the car of the first section. The key came out, and they had to throw that car on the main line, and go back and get the rear part of the train, and pull that out." That this breakage caused a delay of at least 7 to 10 minutes. In the meanwhile, before reaching the second section, it had taken fire, and in that condition was removed. Even after this, two cars attached to this one, containing the twenty-nine bales of cotton, were put out with buckets of water. This one could not be, and was lost. Upon the facts the chancellor found this issue in favor of defendant.

It is insisted here, in support of the finding, that neither the delay nor the breakage of the train, but the fire, was the proximate cause of the loss. In this we do not concur. Granting that the slight delay would not of itself have made the company liable, here we have, in addition, the breaking of the train machinery when the effort is made to remove the cotton, but for which it might have been saved notwithstanding the fire. This, we think, was therefore the proximate cause of the loss. The proximate cause of an injury may, in general, be stated to be that act or omission which immediately causes or fails to prevent the injury; an act or omission occurring or concurring with another, which, had it not happened, the injury would not have been inflicted, notwithstanding the latter; illustrating by these facts: It is true that the fire destroyed the cotton, and in that sense caused the loss, but it appears that, notwithstanding the occurrence of the fire, the cotton would not have been burned by it had not the breaking of the train while it was being removed happened, so that but for this fact the cotton would have been saved. This must therefore be held to be the proximate cause of the loss, and, if it was the result of negligence, the carrier must answer for it. The complainant must show negligence. He proved a delay of the train caused by breaking of machinery. It then devolved upon the carrier to show that this resulted from a latent defect or other cause sufficient to excuse it. Failing to do this, the carrier was liable, and the liability is here adjudged, reversing the decree of the chancellor on this point.

There was a question decided by the chancellor as to appropriation of the share of insurance of a carrier not before the court, which it is necessary to notice, and we will do so in the summary of results of modifications of his decree, this being a most material one; for we disagree with the chancellor that this fund can be here disposed of under the principles settled. To indicate the modifications resulting, we add a more specific statement of loss and relations to it of various carriers. The figures given are from the briefs of counsel assumed to be accurate, without actual verification from the record. There were 14,009 bales of cotton in all in the compress when burned. Of this number, 2,124 bales were never sued for, the Compress Company or its insurers having paid for 1,088 bales to owners, and no suit was brought as to the remaining 1,086 of the 2,184. Of the remaining 11,885 bales, 2,226 were in the compress shed under permits and compress receipts, but covered by no bills of lading. The other 9,659 were in the compress shed, and under bills of lading of various railroad companies and transportation lines; but some have disappeared, leaving about 9,579 bales covered by bills of lading of cotton involved in these and suits heretofore heard, with 29 bales belonging to Paton & Co., covered by bills of lading of Kanawha Dispatch, and burnt on cars of Newport

News & Mississippi Valley Company, making, in all 9,608 bales now in suit. The following carriers had executed bills of lading for same, to wit:

Cairo, Vincennes & Chicago Line	5,087	bales cotton.
Kanawha Despatch (or Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company)	2,358	" "
Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company	477	" "
Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railroad	464	" "
Indiana, Bloomington & Western Railroad	455	" "
Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati & Indianapolis Railroad	410	" "
	9,608

The Kanawha Despatch is held not liable in all suits except that of Paton & Co. In the contribution therefore 2,329 bales are eliminated, so far as the carrier liability is concerned. There is consequently no recovery to be had against the Compress Company, through this carrier, by owners in favor of marine insurers. The recovery of marine insurers through owners depends upon the establishment of the primary liability of the carriers having contracts with the Compress Company, to cover cotton with insurance, and thus, by and in consequence of such recovery, reaching the Compress Company. It is indispensable, therefore, to that result that the carrier be sued, and judgment be rendered against it. The Cairo, Vincennes & Chicago Line is not sued, and therefore there can be no recovery in favor of the owners through that carrier against the Compress Company. This eliminates 5,082 bales, for which no recovery can be had against the Compress Company. The chancellor thought, by reason of declaring a liability without adjudging it against this Company not before the court, he could pass over it, and appropriate so much of the fire insurance fund as he might thus determine belonged to it. We are of opinion this cannot be done. There was no service on the Cairo, Vincennes & Chicago Company; no appearance entered by or for it; no attachment of property and publication; and hence it is not actually or constructively before the court for the appropriation of any property or fund in which it has an interest. No appropriation of any fund can be made to an extent which, under any holding in a suit against it, might result in showing that it is injured. It cannot be injured by the appropriation of that proportion of the fire insurance fund, which, as between itself and other carriers, would not belong to it under any ruling. Hence, in appropriating so much of that entire fund to the liability of other carriers as their proportion of the liability is to its share, no injustice can be done, and this is the extent to which we can go in this case. The Compress Company is entitled to hold that fund in trust for the absent carrier, to indemnify it (and to that extent to protect the Compress Company), in case the carrier is sued, and its liability fixed, and it sues the Compress Company.

In view of the fact that only contracting carriers (that is, those having contracts with the Compress Company to carry insurance), were enumerated as being entitled to participate in the insurance fund, it is deemed superfluous to say that non-contracting carriers—as the Blue Line—are not so entitled, and will be by decree excluded from such participation.

We are aware that, long as this opinion is, it is necessarily too brief in many particulars. The number of cases and the multitude of questions involved have made the whole presentation a matter of extended writing, even after elimination of many special questions, the result of the decision of certain general ones, but for the same reason have occasioned us to deal in too brief a manner with most, if not all, of them, to do justice to the able and elaborate arguments which have been addressed to us. But after all, it must be remembered that what is desired of a court is a solution of difficulties,—a correct decision of questions,—rather than elaborate statement or discussion of them, particularly when, from their number or variety, an opinion of much length must necessarily be short in particulars. It would have given us much pleasure to have, with each question, restated at length the various positions and arguments of counsel pro and con, and to have reviewed the many authorities collected with so much industry, and pressed upon us with so much force; but time is inadequate to the task, and we have been obliged to content ourselves with determining, upon due considerations, the application of the law as in our judgment it is best settled amid the views presented. If, in reflecting the judgment of the court, I have done it with reasonable accuracy and correctness, I have accomplished the purpose chiefly desired, and better than would have been done by elaboration of statement and inaccuracy of conclusion. The decree of the chancellor will be modified as herein indicated. The costs of both courts will be divided in the several suits in which they are respectively involved between the marine insurance companies and the Compress Company. Costs of special recovery, as that of Paton & Co. against defendant, held specially liable, and complainants cast in suits will pay costs thereof.

PORT OF PORTLAND et al., Repts.

(.....Or.....)

1. A corporation composed of the inhabitants of the territory situated around the mouth of a public navigable river, which is charged with the duty of maintaining therein a ship channel of sufficient width and depth, and empowered to levy taxes to raise the necessary funds, is created for municipal purposes within a constitutional provision permitting the creation of such corporations by special laws.

2. Placing the burden of maintaining a harbor upon those living in its immediate vicinity does not violate a constitutional requirement that all taxation shall be

NOTE.—Taxation, general and local, must be for public purpose.

Taxation may be either general or local; but, whether general or local, it must be for a public purpose and not a mere private purpose. McBean v. Chandler, 9 Heisk. 249; *Astor v. (July 8, 1891.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to test the validity of an Act creating defendant a municipal corporation. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Dolph, Bellinger, Mallory & Simon for appellant.

Mr. Ellis G. Hughes, for respondents:

The meaning of "municipal" is, in legal effect, the same as public, or governmental, as contradistinguished from private.

Worcester, Dict.; Webster, Dict.; Burrill, Law Dict.; Bouvier, Law Dict.

Kent does not even use the word "municipal" in his division of corporations into classes, but he does use the word "public" as its equivalent, which it in fact is.

Local district for such improvements is constitutional. Daily v. Swope, 47 Wis. 867; Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 209.

Where lands are improved by legislative action, on the ground of public utility, the cost of such improvements may, to a certain degree, be imposed on the parties who, in consequence of owning the lands in the vicinity, receive a peculiar advantage. Hanscom v. Omaha, 11 Neb. 37; Tide-Water Co. v. Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 527.

A statute delegating power to charge the property of individuals with the expenses of local improvements must be strictly pursued, and any substantial departure will vitiate the proceedings. Merritt v. Portchester, 71 N. Y. 300.

The Legislature may provide for the construction of a free bridge over a river, and require the expense to be borne by taxation of the city into which it leads. *Philadelphia v. Municipal taxation for local purposes.

A town, under its general authority to vote taxes for township purposes, cannot raise money for public improvements outside its territorial limits (Riley v. Rochester, 9 N. Y. 64; Denton v. Jackson, 2 Johns. Ch. 336, 1 L. ed. 400; North Hempstead v. Hempstead, 2 Wend. 136); but a town, if authorized specially by the Legislature, may do so on the ground of special local benefits. Talbot County Comrs. v. Queen Anne County Comrs. 50 Md. 245. So it is competent by legislation to provide a special water precinct in a city for waterworks, and levy a tax within the same. Brown v. Concord, 56 N. H. 375.

So it may be authorized to construct gas works for public purposes. Western Sav. Fund Soc. v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 175, 185.

Or it may be required to contract for corporate necessities with private corporations or persons. Nelson v. La Porte, 38 Ind. 258.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit involves the constitutionality of an Act of the Legislative Assembly of this State entitled "An Act to Establish and Incorporate the Port of Portland, and to Provide for the Improvement of the Willamette and Columbia Rivers in said Port and between Said Port and the Sea." Laws 1891, p. 791. This Act, in terms, creates a separate district, with defined boundaries, which embraces substantially what was at the time of the passage the Cities of Portland, East Portland, and Albina, and now the City of Portland, to be known as the "Port of Portland," and the inhabitants thereof are constituted and declared to be a corporation by the name and style of the "Port of Portland," and as such to have perpetual succession, and by said name to exercise and carry out all the corporate powers and objects by said Act conferred and declared, make all contracts, hold, receive, and dispose of real and personal property, such as may be necessary, requisite, or convenient in carrying out the objects of said corporation, as therein set out and expressed, and sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in all actions, suits, and proceedings brought by or against it. By said Act it is declared that the object, purpose, and occupation of such

The constitutional provision inhibiting the incorporation of towns and villages by special charter has no reference to quasi municipal corporations. Cathcart v. Comstock, 56 Wis. 580.

When a statute confers power upon a corporation, to be exercised for the public good, its exercise is not merely discretionary, but imperative. The words "power" and "authority" in such cases may be construed "duty" and "obligation." Alleghany Co. P. S. Comrs. v. Alleghany County, 20 Md. 449.

Special taxing district.

As distinct from its power of local assessment, the Legislature may create special taxing districts, which may include one or more subdivisions of the State or parts of such subdivisions without making such districts correspond with their territorial limits. 1 Deasy, Taxn. § 58.

It has power to impose a tax on such local district for the construction of local improvements, and to levy assessments for benefits conferred; but this power is in some States subject to the limitation that local burdens cannot be imposed without the consent of the taxpayers to be affected thereby. Id. § 59.

Works of public improvement which may be an advantage to the whole State, as a canal, may be constructed at the expense of the local district where it was likely to confer local benefits on the locality specially taxed. Thomas v. Leland, 24 Wend. 65; Revenue Comrs. v. State, 45 Ala. 399.

The interest of the district must be the true test, whether an object is or is not a proper object of district taxation, as in the case of the erection of city waterworks. Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh, 120.

Several towns may for a common purpose be united into a single district, and commissioners of the district may be invested with taxing powers for district purposes. People v. Salomon, 51 Ill. 87; West Chicago Park Comrs. v. Western U. Tele. Co. 103 Ill. 83.

Local taxes may be levied on different systems in different districts, even when they are for the benefit of the whole State. People v. Central Pac. R. Co. 43 Cal. 898; Bright v. McCullough, 27 Ind. 223; Merrick v. Amherst, 12 Allen, 500; Alleghany Co. P. S. Comrs. v. Alleghany County, 20 Md. 457.

corporation shall be to so improve the Willamette River at the Cities of Portland, East Portland, and Albina, and the Willamette and Columbia Rivers between said cities and the sea, as that there shall be made and permanently maintained therein a ship channel of good and sufficient width, and having a depth at all points at mean low water, both at said cities and between said cities and the sea, of not less than twenty-five feet. So far as is necessary, requisite, or convenient to carry out the said object, this corporation is given full control over said rivers at and between said cities and the sea, so far and to the full extent that this State can grant the same, and in carrying on said work is given the same power of eminent domain as exists under the laws of this State in favor of corporations organized for the construction and operation of railroads. For the purpose of providing funds necessary for such improvement said corporation is authorized from time to time to borrow money in such sums as may be found necessary, not exceeding the sum of $500,000, and to issue its promissory notes or bonds therefor; and is given power to assess, levy, and collect taxes upon all property, real and personal, within its boundaries, and which is by law taxable for state and county purposes, not exceeding the rate therein provided. The power and authority given to the corporation, the Port of Portland, is vested in and to be exercised by a board of commissioners named therein, and their successors in office, chosen as in said Act provided, who shall serve without salary or compensation, except for actual expenses incurred by any commissioners while engaged in the actual work of the corporation.

At the outset it is well to observe that every court approaches with hesitancy the question of declaring a law unconstitutional, and never exerts its power so to do while doubt exists. Every intendment must be given in favor of its validity. As was said by Lord, J., in Cline v. Greenwood, 10 Or. 241: "Before a statute is declared void in whole or in part its repugnancy to the Constitution ought to be clear and palpable, and free from doubt. Every intendment must be given in favor of its constitutionality. Able and learned judges have, with great unanimity, laid down and adhered to a rigid rule on this subject. Chief Justice Marshall in United States v. Peters, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 128, 3 L. ed. 57; Chief Justice Parsons in Kendall v. Kingston, 5 Mass. 584; Chief Justice Tilghman in Farmers & M. Bank v. Smith, 3 Serg. & R. 72; Chief Justice Shaw in Norwich v. Hampshire County Comrs. 13 Pick. 61, and Chief Justice Savage in Ex parte McCollum, 1 Cow. 564,—have with one voice declared that it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the Legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts be considered void. The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the people feel a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." Keeping these views in mind, we proceed to the examination of the question before us. It is first contended by plaintiff that the Act incorporating the defendant, the Port of Portland, is repugnant to section 2 of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides that "corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special laws, except for municipal purposes." Under this section there can be but one question: What is a corporation created for municipal purposes? No corporation can be created by special Act except for municipal purposes, but there is no limitation on the creation of corporations for municipal purposes by special Act. Any corporation for municipal purposes may therefore be thus created. If, then, the Port of Portland is a corporation created for municipal purposes, the Act creating it is not repugnant to this section of the Constitution. The whole question, therefore, turns upon the meaning of the phrase "municipal purposes," as used in the Constitution. The word "municipal" is defined by the lexicographers as belonging to a city, town, or place; having the right of local government; belonging to or affecting a particular State or separate community; local; particular; independent. It is usually applied to what belongs to a city, but has a more extensive meaning, and is in legal effect the same as public or governmental, as distinguished from private. Burrill, Dict. title Municipal. Thus we call municipal law not the law of a city only, but the law of the State. 1 Bl. Com. 44. Municipal is used in contradistinction to international. Thus we say an offense against the law of nations is an international offense, but one committed against a particular State or separate community is a municipal offense. And so are municipal affairs public affairs, and municipal purposes are public or governmental purposes, as contradistinguished from private purposes. A corporation, therefore, created for municipal purposes, is a corporation created for public or governmental purposes, with political powers to be exercised for the public good in the administration of civil government, whose members are citizens, not stockholders; an instrument of the government, with certain delegated powers, subject to the control of the Legislature, and its members, officers, or agents of the government for the administration or discharge of public duties. A city, or purely municipal corporation, is perhaps the highest type of a corporation created for municipal purposes, because it is a miniature government, having legislative, executive, and judicial powers; but there is another class of corporations, such as counties, school districts, road districts, etc., which, though varying in application and peculiar features are but so many agencies or instrumentalities of the State to promote the convenience of the public at large, and are, in the broadest use of the term, for municipal purposes. It would be a narrow and unwarranted construction of the language to say that "municipal purposes" means only city, town, or village purposes. The Constitution of this State evidently contemplates the creation of counties under the direct supervision of and by special Act of the Legislature, yet no direct power is given to create them, and the section under consideration contains a direct prohibition against doing so, unless the word "municipal" covers this class of corporations. We thus perceive that the word "municipal" not only applies to cities, towns, and villages, but has a broader and more general signification relating to the State or nation. And therefore the words "municipal corporations," as applied to incorporated cities or towns, and "municipal purposes," are not synonymous. The latter embrace, by the common speech of men before and since the days of Blackstone, state or national purposes. And therefore, while cities, towns, and villages are for municipal purposes, there are also other corporations for municipal purposes that are not of that class. It was in the broader and more general sense of the term that the words "municipal purposes" were used in the Constitution of this State. This is evident from section 9 of the same article of the Constitution, wherein it is provided that no county, city, town, or other municipal corporation, by a vote of its citizens or otherwise, shall become a stockholder in any joint-stock company, corporation, etc. Here is a direct interpretation from the Constitution itself. A municipal corporation is not necessarily a county, city, or town. Were it so, the added words, "or other municipal corporations," would be without meaning. Clearly a corporation for municipal purposes is one composed of citizens, as distinguished from stockholders; a public, as distinguished from a private, corporation.

In Curry v. Sioux City Dist. Twp., 62 Iowa, 104, it is said: "The word 'municipal,' as originally used, in its strictness applied to cities only. But the word now has a much more extended meaning, and, when applied to corporations, the words 'political,' 'municipal,' and 'public' are used interchangeably." In Horton v. Mobile School Comrs., 48 Ala. 598, an Act had been passed which repealed all prior laws upon the subject of taxation except those created for municipal purposes, and it was held that these are not words of technical import, and should be construed to apply to a corporation to carry on a public free school, and to raise funds for its support.

In People v. Salomon, 51 Ill. 37, under an Act of the Legislature providing for the location and maintenance of a park for the towns of South Chicago, Hyde Park, and Lake, those towns were erected into a park district; and the people of the towns affected by the Act having by a vote accepted its provisions, the board of park commissioners thereby created, and appointed by the governor, to whom was committed the entire control of the park, was held to be a municipal corporation, in whom it was competent for the Legislature to vest the power to assess and collect taxes within the park district so created for the special corporate purpose of its creation, and this was under a constitutional provision similar to ours. Mr. Chief Justice Breese, on page 52, says: "One of the counsel for respondent asks: Of what character is the corporation thus endowed with extraordinary, unheard-of, and unknown powers and privileges, and, after defining the several kinds of corporations, he asks: To which of these divisions of public corporations does the South Park Commissioners belong? The answer is ready and obvious. By the vote of the people within the jurisdiction of their action they became a corporate authority, quasi municipal; the object of their creation being of a municipal character, and of that alone. They became a public municipal corporation." So in People v. School Trustees, 78 Ill. 136, Mr. Justice Walker, in treating of the 18 L. R. A.

power and authority of school townships under the Constitution of that State to subscribe for the capital stock of railway companies, says: "These school townships were created and are continued for school purposes alone, and not for municipal purposes. They are only intended to establish schools, and loan and manage school funds of the township, and pay the teachers of schools taught in their jurisdiction. This was the purpose of their organization. They were not created to exercise any of the functions of government, and hence are not municipal in their nature or purpose; nor are they provided with the officers or the power to exercise the functions of government." The test of a corporation for municipal purposes, adopted by the court, seems to have been the right or power to exercise some of the functions of government, and this we apprehend is the true test. In the case of State v. Leffingwell, 54 Mo. 458, cited and relied on by counsel for plaintiff, the same principle is clearly recognized, under a constitutional provision similar to ours. In the first opinion there is a tendency to hold that nothing but a city, or some corporation connected therewith, and instituted for the purpose of carrying out some of the known objects of the municipality, is a corporation created for municipal purposes; but in the opinion on a motion for a rehearing, after citing the provisions of the Constitution, this language is used: "From these provisions it is manifest that the Legislature is prohibited from creating any sort of corporation by special Act except such as are for municipal purposes. A corporation for municipal purposes is either a municipality, such as a city or town, created expressly for local self-government, with delegated legislative powers; or it may be a subdivision of the State for governmental purposes, such as a county, a school or road district, etc. These subdivisions are sometimes called 'quasi corporations,' but they are nevertheless corporations within the meaning of the Constitution. It was therefore eminently proper in framing the Constitution that there should be no express or implied prohibition against creating such subdivisions or quasi corporations for municipal purposes. The phrase 'municipal purposes' was intended to embrace some of the functions of government, local or general; and no corporation, not exclusively designed for this end, can be properly denominated a corporation for municipal purposes." And again: "The aim of the Constitution was to prevent the creation of corporations by special legislation, except for a particular purpose. In framing this prohibition it was necessary to exclude the idea that quasi corporations or subdivisions of the State for municipal purposes were to be embraced among the inhibited Acts of the Legislature. No language could have expressed this more clearly than the phrase 'except for municipal purposes,' as used in the Constitution." We have not overlooked the cases of Low v. Mayssville, 5 Cal. 214, and San Francisco v. Spring Valley Water Works, 48 Cal. 493, cited by counsel for plaintiff, but we do not think they conflict with the doctrine we are attempting to announce. In the former the court held that a private corporation, organized to run steamboats, with one of its termini in the City of Marysville, was not a corporation created for municipal purposes, so that the Legislature could authorize the city to subscribe for its stock; and in the latter it was held that the Legislature could not confer on a private corporation by special Act the right or duty to supply the City of San Francisco with water. The purposes and powers of the Port of Portland are all public, political or governmental. It possesses none of the features of a private corporation. There is no stock to be subscribed. Its members are citizens, not stockholders. There is no acceptance necessary, and its powers and very existence are at the will of the Legislature. The sole object of the corporation is to so improve the Willamette and Columbia Rivers at the City of Portland, and between that point and the sea, as to create and maintain a ship channel of a specified depth; and for this purpose it is given full power over these rivers, so far as the State can grant the same. There is no power to take tolls, or make profit of any kind. No private interests of any kind are granted or acquired. The highway to be created or improved belongs to the public, and is open to the whole public, to be used at will, and with such means of navigation as taste, pleasure, or convenience may dictate. No one questions that the establishment and improvement of highways and the opening facilities for access to market are within the governmental powers of every State or nation, and that, among the most important of these highways, are to be classed navigable rivers. These things are necessarily done by law. The State may directly levy taxes to improve such highways, or it may apportion and impose the duty, or confer the power of assuming it, upon the municipal divisions of the State, or create a municipal division locally benefited for that express purpose. These municipal corporations or divisions exist only for the convenient administration of the government. Such organizations are instruments of the State to carry out its will. When they are authorized to levy a tax or appropriate its proceeds, the State is doing through them indirectly what it might do directly. The rivers placed under the control of this corporation are not only navigable but are the great convenient highway, not only of this State, but largely of the entire northwest. The only powers conferred upon the Port of Portland, except the necessary incidental powers of holding the property and making the contracts necessary to carry out the main purpose, are the control and improvement of this public highway, and the levy and collection of taxes therefor. The Port of Portland, and the commissioners who exercise its powers, are nothing more than the agents of the State, delegated to exercise one of its highest prerogatives—the taxing power—in carrying out one of its best known and recognized objects and most important duties—the improvement of a great and important public highway.

It is also contended that this Act is unconstitutional as being in violation of section 82, art. 1, of the Constitution, providing that "all taxation shall be equal and uniform." Counsel for plaintiff admits the general rule that a tax is not unconstitutional for lack of uniformity, when levied for local purposes, if it is equal and uniform throughout the taxing district; but his contention is that, to authorize the Legislature to lay a tax upon one district or subdivision of the State alone, the purpose for which it is laid must not only be public, but, as regards the people of such district or subdivision, it must also be local. This is admitted by counsel for respondent to be the correct rule, but he contends—and, we think, correctly—that the power of taxation here under consideration is not subject to objection under this rule. It is a fact of which this court will take judicial knowledge, that the Port of Portland, a district which is now the City of Portland, is the commercial metropolis of the State of Oregon, if not of the whole Pacific northwest. It is the center of trade and commerce for a vast section of country, simply because here the commerce of land and sea meet, and through this city the country trades with the world at large. It holds communication with the sea, the great highway of commerce, by the Willamette and Columbia Rivers, and can only retain its commercial supremacy by the maintenance in these rivers of a ship channel of sufficient depth to enable the largest sea-going vessels to find anchorage at its wharves. Its present prosperity is due to the fact that it is a center of trade and commerce, which it would not be were these rivers closed, and which in all probability it will not remain if the improvement contemplated is not made. It is not surrounded by any fertile farming districts, rich mines, or vast forests, to make it a local center, but depends entirely upon its trade and commerce. Counsel has well said; "That the maintenance of this great commercial center at this point is of advantage to the whole State is witnessed by the fact that it does its business here. That anything that will cheapen the handling of what the country exports and imports will be a benefit to all is a self-evident fact, and leaves no doubt of the public interest in this improvement. But the public might find other centers of trade, or channels of export and import, presumably not so advantageous, or it would now use them but still capable of use at need. But the center of trade and commerce, the Port of Portland, cannot go elsewhere. It must live or die here. In the public the interest is general,—the improvement and maintenance of an advantageous channel of trade. To the metropolitan district, center of trade and commerce, city, cities, or what you will, embraced in the Port of Portland, the interest is one of life and death." The people of the Port of Portland, therefore, will reap the principal benefit from the proposed expenditure, and it is not unconstitutional that they should bear the burden. As was said by Mr. Justice Strong in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Otos County, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 676, 21 L. ed. 381: "The Legislature has the undoubted power to apportion a public burden among all the taxpayers of the State, or among those of a particular section, if, in its judgment, those of a single section may reap the principal benefit from a proposed expenditure, as from the construction of a road, a bridge, an almshouse, or a hospital." It is not unjust, therefore that they should alone bear the burden. This subject has so often been discussed, and the principles we have asserted so thoroughly vindicated, that it seems to be needless to say more, or even to refer at large to the decisions.

It follows, therefore, that the Act incorporating the Port of Portland is constitutional and valid, and the decree of the court below must be affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

Re Mary Sternberg THOMAS.

(....Colo.....)

1. Women will be admitted to the bar on equal terms with men in the absence of a statutory or constitutional provision to the contrary.*
2. The use of the masculine pronoun exclusively in the statutes relating to applicants for admission to the bar and to licensed attorneys is not sufficient to show a legislative intent to exclude women from the bar.
3. Attorneys-at-law are not civil officers within the meaning of a constitutional provision that no person except a qualified elector shall be elected or appointed to any civil or military office.

(September 14, 1891.)

APPPLICATION by Mary Sternberg Thomas for admission to the bar. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Warner Mills, for petitioner:

Speaking of women as deputy clerks of county courts, the court said in Jeffries v. Harrington, 11 Colo. 194 (1887): "It was not the intention to declare such avenues of employment closed to women, and, until some clear expression to that effect has been made by constitutional or legislative provision, the courts should not declare against the employment of women in such positions." This principle is equally apt, on this occasion, as to the employment of women as attorneys, and their consequent admission to the bar.

Re Hall, 50 Conn. 181, 47 Am. Rep. 625; Foltz v. Hoge, 54 Cal. 28, 35.

Many of the premises for the arguments upon which the court in the case of Re Bradwell, 55 Ill. 585 (1869), founded their decision denying her application for admission to the bar are refuted in 1 History of Woman Suffrage.

It is assumed by the Supreme Court of Illinois, and this assumption is the bulwark of all the other adverse decisions on this subject, that there was no precedent at common law for the admission of women as attorneys.

Blackstone recounts that Anne, Countess of Pembroke, held the office of sheriff of Westmoreland, and exercised its duties in person. (See Co. Litt. p. 328.) The Scotch sheriff is properly a judge, and by the Statute 20 Geo. II., chap. 43, he must be a lawyer of three years' standing.

Eleanor, Queen of Henry III. of England, in the year 1253, was appointed lady-keeper of the great seal, or the supreme chancellor of England, and sat in the Aula Regia, or king's court.

Queen Elizabeth held the great seal at three several times during her remarkable reign. After the death of Lord-keeper Bacon she presided for two months in the Aula Regia.

Boone, Prof. of Pedagogy in Indiana University, published by Appletons in 1890, being vol. 11 of the "International Educational Series," edited by Wm. T. Harris, is this single sentence in a note to the text: "It is a fact of history that one Margaret Brent, attorney-at-law, was admitted to the Maryland bar in 1648."

See also 3 History of Woman Suffrage, pp. 815, 816; W. Hand Browne's "Maryland," pp. 686, 689; Series of Am. Commonwealths, edited by Horace E. Scudder, and published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. (1884).

The Colorado Constitution is favorable to this application.

The only section of the Constitution which could possibly stand in the way of this application is art. 7, § 6, which reads as follows: "No person except a qualified elector shall be elected or appointed to any civil or military office in this State."

In construing this section this court has decided, in Re House Bill No. 166, 9 Colo. 628, that a woman could not be elected or appointed a notary public, as that was a "civil office."

In Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 420, it was said that the right to vote and the right to hold office must not be confused; that citizenship and the requisite sex, age, and residence constituted the individual a legal voter, but other qualifications are essential to the efficient performance of the duties connected with almost every office.

In the case of Jeffries v. Harrington, 11 Colo. 193, it was held that the word "office" in this section of the Constitution did not include a deputy clerkship of the county court; and that such a clerkship could be held by a woman.

An attorney is not, in the strictest sense, a public officer.

Re Robinson, 131 Mass. 376, 41 Am. Rep. 239; White's Case, 6 Mod. 18; Bradley's Case, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 864, 378, 379, 19 L. ed. 214, 219; Cohen v. Wright, 22 Cal. 293.

The terms "office," and "office and public trust," as employed in the Constitution, have relation only to those persons and duties that are of a public nature.

*Admission of Women to the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Any woman who shall have been a member of the bar of the highest court of any State or Territory, or of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, for the space of three years, and shall have 13 L. R. A.

maintained a good standing before such court, and who shall be a person of good moral character, shall, on motion, and the production of such record, be admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States. Act of Congress approved February 15, 1879 (20 U. S. Stat. 292).

The prevailing practice in other States is favorable to this application.

(The statutes were subsequently changed and Miss Goodell was then admitted. 48 Wis. 693, 694.) Robinson's Case, 131 Mass. 376, 41 Am. Rep. 239.

The latest reported case upon the subject of the admission of women to the bar is in their favor, and is the Application of Mary Hall, 50 Conn. 131, 47 Am. Rep. 625, 21 Am. L. Reg. 728, note 635.

The notes to this case, as reported in the American Law Register, quotes largely from the opinions in the Bradwell, Lockwood, Goodell and Robinson Cases, and then concludes as follows: "Whatever may be the current of judicial opinion, there can be no question but that the tendency of modern legislation is strongly in favor of allowing women the privilege of admission to the bar. It is worthy of note that each one of the decisions above referred to was followed by a statute granting to women the privilege which the court had denied. See Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 13, § 1; Act of Congress Feb. 15, 1879, 20th Stat. 292; Wis. Rev. Stat. § 2586; Mass. Stat. 1882, chap. 139.

There are a great many instances where women have been admitted as a matter of course without any question.

See 2 History of Woman Suffrage p. 606; Chicago Legal News, Feb. 5, 1870.

Miss Charlotte E. Ray was admitted on graduating from Howard University, about 1873, in the District of Columbia.

See Chicago Legal News, May 23, 1874.

In Mrs. Lockwood's brief addressed to the Senate of the United States, March, 1873 (3 History of Woman Suffrage, p. 107), is this statement: "Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, North Carolina, Wyoming, Utah and the District of Columbia admit women to the bar." And writing in 1888, she says: "Most of the States in the Union have since recognized her right thereto, and notably the State of Pennsylvania, as in the case of Carrie B. Kilgore, who has recently been admitted to the supreme court of the State."

Mr. Joseph H. Maupin, Atty-Gen., amicus curiæ, filed no brief.

Helm, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Petitioner, Mrs. Mary S. Thomas, asks to have her name placed upon the roll of attorneys practicing before this and other courts of the State. She tenders credentials attesting the prescribed professional qualifications, and a compliance with all express requirements of the Statute and rules of court regulating access to the legal profession. The question is therefore squarely presented, Are women entitled to admission to the bar of this State on equal terms with men? By ancient and universal usage, women have been denied the right to practice before the English courts. The two or three exceptions cited in petitioner's brief, such as that of Anne, Countess of Pembroke, are not well authenticated. During the early history of this country a like exclusion from the profession generally prevailed, though a few instances are recorded, as in the case of Margaret Brent, also mentioned in petitioner's brief, where they were permitted to appear specially in particular proceedings. In the District of Columbia, and in Massachusetts, Illinois, and Wisconsin, within a period comparatively recent, such applications have been rejected, the courts promulgating learned opinions in connection therewith. Fifteen years ago the Supreme Court of the United States also denied the right. The case was not reported, but the chief justice, in orally epitomizing the reasons for adverse action, declared that the court had concluded to adhere to the uniform custom since its organization, of licensing men only, till "a change is required by statute or a more extended practice in the highest courts of the States." Re Lockwood, 9 Ct. Cl. 346; Ex parte Robinson, 181 Mass. 376, citing the above ruling of the United States Supreme Court; Re Bradwell, 55 Ill. 585; Ex parte Goodell, 39 Wis. 282.

The written opinions mentioned marshal all objections to conferring this privilege upon women, dwelling with especial force and clearness upon those existing outside of constitutional and statutory provisions. They ably discuss questions of impropriety and inexpediency based upon the laws of nature, the bearing of historical customs and usages, and the impediments growing out of woman's legal status at the common law. With all deference to those learned courts, we decline to imitate their example in the latter regard. We shall not indulge in speculation concerning the natural aptitude and physical ability of women to perform the duties of the profession, nor shall we dwell upon considerations of propriety or expediency in the premises. These are matters as to which wide differences of opinion exist; and we conceive that they have little, if any, bearing upon similar applications now presented in this State, however pertinent they may have been in the Commonwealths referred to when the above rulings were made. We shall likewise decline to give controlling weight to historic custom or usage in England, in the American colonies, and in the republic during its infancy. Reasoning, predicated upon the latter ground, possesses the inherent weakness of ignoring, to a greater or less extent, the marvelous changes throughout the country during the last fifty years in the legal status of woman. It is a significant circumstance, indicating the trend of popular sentiment on the subject, that each of the cases above referred to was speedily followed by a statute providing for the admission of women to the profession. The Supreme Court of the United States, and the courts of the District of Columbia, Massachusetts, Illinois, and Wisconsin, no longer adhere to the rule of discrimination on the ground of sex. Women are now licensed without question to practice in these courts as well as in those of several other States upon the same conditions as men, save only that the Act of Congress requires three years' membership of the bar of the highest court in some State or Territory as a condition precedent to their appearance before the Supreme Court of the United States. In this Commonwealth, women of sufficient age, married or single, may make contracts, form partnerships, inherit, acquire, and dispose of property, in all respects substantially the same as men. The policy of our legislative and judicial action has tended constantly towards conferring upon them the same property rights and business status as are enjoyed by men. They may undoubtedly pursue all vocations and enterprises of a business character. They may also become ministers, physicians, or educators, and, if any limitation in regard to the learned professions exists, such limitation applies solely to the bar. The privilege of practicing this profession and sharing in its emoluments is alone questioned. Hence we contend with none of the difficulties encountered by the courts above mentioned arising from the disabilities of women, especially married women, at the common law. Applications like the one before us may therefore be regarded with the judicial favor usually extended when equality of rights is involved, unless some restrictive provision be found in our Statutes or Constitution.

Turning to the Act regulating the licensing of attorneys, and defining their duties, liabilities, etc., we find nothing that, in our judgment, fairly shows a legislative intent to bestow this privilege upon men exclusively. The substantive phrases used throughout the Act, when speaking of applicants, cover both sexes. They are "no person" and "any person;" as, "no person shall be permitted to practice; . . ." "no person whose name is not subscribed; . . ." "any person producing a license from any court of record; . . ." "if any person not licensed as aforesaid shall receive any money. . . ." The pronouns employed with reference both to applicants and licensed attorneys are, it is true, masculine; but this fact, standing alone, is a matter of very little significance. The masculine pronoun is constantly used in legal and secular literature to designate both sexes; besides, it is expressly provided by law here, as in other States, that, unless the language contains something inconsistent therewith, this rule may be followed in construing statutes: "Every word importing the masculine gender only may extend to and be applied to females as well as males." Mills, Ann. Stat. § 4185. There is no language in the Act under consideration inconsistent with the application to its construction of this statutory guide. We are not unmindful of the rule that a statute is to be interpreted in the light of other statutes constituting a part of the same legislative system. But, as already suggested, the uniform and unmistakable policy of our legislation, as shown in numerous provisions, has been to extend the legal rights of women, and enlarge their sphere of occupation and usefulness. The proposition, however, is advanced, with plausibility and force, that section 6, art. 7, of the Constitution, indirectly, but clearly, forbids licensing women to practice law. This section reads: "No person except a qualified elector shall be elected or appointed to any civil or military office in the State." It is argued that attorneys are civil officers, and that since women are not electors they cannot become attorneys. Women may participate in school elections, and hold certain offices connected with the public schools, but they are not such electors as this section of the Constitution contemplates. The constitutional term "qualified elector" is here "used in its broadest sense, meaning a person qualified to vote generally." Re House Bill No. 166, 9 Colo. 628. The limitation declared by this provision is plain, and, if attorneys at law are civil officers within its meaning, the objection must be sustained.

The phrase "civil office," as thus employed, is frequently used interchangeable with the term "public trust." It undoubtedly relates to public offices; that is, to those offices which involve an election or appointment by or on behalf of the general public, and the performance of duties essentially public in their nature. See Cohen v. Wright, 22 Cal. 293; also Weeks, Attorneys, § 39, citing cases from Alabama, Virginia, New York, and South Carolina. Attorneys at law are constantly spoken of as "officers of the court." The designation is not inaccurate. Their special researches and general legal knowledge enable them to aid the courts, and thus to contribute somewhat towards the due administration of justice. The office is therefore an important one, and the attorney incidentally performs a quasi public duty. But admission to the profession is purely a private matter, and is secured solely for the advancement of private interest. By virtue of such admission, attorneys are not required to perform specific public acts, nor are specified duties devolved upon them in behalf of the general public. The duties they assume and the labor they perform are usually in pursuance of personal contracts with private litigants. Admission to the bar is an essential prerequisite to the filling of certain offices, such as prosecuting attorney and judges of supreme, district, and other courts. But these public trusts, and the functions connected therewith, devolve only upon members of the profession by virtue of an independent election or appointment. Until thus designated, they can no more enter into offices where the functions are of a public nature than can unlicensed persons wholly ignorant of the law. Our conclusion is that attorneys at law are not, per se, civil officers, within the meaning of the constitutional phrase under consideration. See authorities last above cited.

The major premise of the argument in support of a constitutional inhibition thus proves upon examination to be untrue, and of course the conclusion falls. That instrument, so far as we are aware, contains nothing inconsistent with the admission of women to the bar. If there were anything in the rules or usages of the court involving this inconsistency, we would feel that a modification of such rules or usages should now be made. We have no disposition to postpone falling into line with the Supreme Court of the United States and other enlightened tribunals throughout the country, that have finally, voluntarily, or in obedience to statutory injunction, discarded the criterion of sex, and opened the door of the profession to women as well as men.

The prayer of the petitioner will be granted.
It is ordered that her name be placed upon the roll of attorneys.

A. J. VEASEY, Appt.,
v.

Francis BRIGMAN.

(....Ala....)

A judgment by default in an action against

A. J. Veasey is supported by a return of service of summons on "Jack Veasey, the defendant."

(June 25, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a default judgment of the Circuit Court for Covington County which the court refused to set aside up-

NOTE.—The doctrine of idem sonans.

The law does not treat every slight and trivial variance, such as the omission of a letter, as fatal. The variance should be a substantial and material one, such as would render the instrument offered in evidence a different and distinct instrument from the one described in the petition, to authorize the court to exclude it from the jury on the ground of variance. The rule of idem sonans, when strictly adhered to, is considered too rigid, and has been much relaxed in modern practice. Stevens v. Stebbins, 4 Ill. 25.

It is claimed that mere identity of sound is a surer method of designating the names of persons than that of depending upon mere identity in the orthography. Ahtol v. Benditto, 2 Taunt. 401; Myer v. Fegaly, 89 Pa. 429.

If the sound of a name idem sonans be not affected by a misspelling which occurs, such error is immaterial, and any two names being alike in original derivation and used interchangeably, though different in sound, do not, by the use of either, constitute a material variance. 82 Rolle, Abr. 135; Bacon, Abr. title Misnomer.

The doctrine of idem sonans should not be too rigidly enforced. The principal question in all cases should ask as to the materiality of the variance. Belton v. Fisher, 44 Ill. 52.

And this is always a question of fact, to be determined by the jury. In the case of foreign names, courts are reluctant to pronounce that a variance which in most instances is a simple misspelling, or the result of a mispronunciation shall affect vested rights honestly acquired. In an early case the Supreme Court of Illinois has held, where material variance was claimed in the names of a conveyance that Michael Allen named in a deed as grantor was, presumptively, Michael Allaine, grantee of the same property as, also, that Otolne Allaine was, presumptively, Antoine Allaine. Chiniquy v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 41 Ill. 148.

The misspelling of a defendant's name in a summons is no excuse for non-appearance to defend, especially where it appears that the name "Butler" was written Butler. Knowing there is a suit against himself, defendant is held bound to appear. Hermann v. Butler, 59 Ill. 225.

The rule is, that if the distinction in the pronunciation of the names is indistinguishable in ordinary conversation, the doctrine of idem sonans applies. Barnes v. People, 18 Ill. 52.

The position contended for in the principal case is sustained by a Maine decision which holds that, although the surname of a party defendant had been spelled in seven different ways in the course of a judicial proceeding, the names were all idem sonans and sufficiently identified the defendant. Millett v. Blake, 81 Me. 531.

on defendant's claim that he was not served with process. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. John D. Gardner for appellant.

Mr. W. D. Roberts for appellee.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following is the assignment of error on this appeal: "Comes the appellant in this cause, and assigns for error (1) the judgment of the court, it not appearing that the defendant, A. J. Veasey, was served or had notice of the bringing of the suit." The record shows a complaint filed by Francis Brigman against A. J. Veasey; a writ issued by the clerk of the court on May 19, 1890, commanding the sheriff to summon A. J. Veasey to appear and answer the complaint of Francis Brigman; that this writ was received by the sheriff, May 20, 1890, and bears the following indorsement:

"Executed this 20th day of August, A. D. 1890, by leaving a copy of the within summons and complaint with Jack Veasey, the defendant.

"M. C. Gault,
"Sheriff."

We suppose the objection to this service is rested on the fact that it purports to have been made on "Jack," not A. J. Veasey. It is untenable. Had only the surname been written in the return, had the service been "by leaving a copy, etc., with Veasey," it would have been good, the presumption being that the defendant was thereby intended (Snelgrove v. Mobile Branch Bank, 5 Ala. 295); and surely the fact that a given name is set out, the initial letter of which is the same as one of the initials by which the defendant is designated in the summons and complaint, can have no tendency to overturn this presumption, but rather to strengthen it. But the return goes further than this. It not only asserts that service was made upon Jack Veasey, thus raising the presumption that the person served was the person sued; but it affirms that "Jack Veasey" is the defendant in the cause, and designated therein by the name of "A. J. Veasey." We have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that service was upon A. J. Veasey, the defendant, and that upon his failure to appear judgment by default was properly entered against him.

Affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

MISSOURI PACIFIC R. CO., Appt.,

v.

J. M. CULLERS.

(.....Tex.....)

1. It seems that an Indian may resort to state courts for redress of wrongs under a constitutional provision guaranteeing to every person the right of redress for injuries done to him in his person, property or reputation.
2. An objection to the ability of plaintiff to maintain suit on an assigned claim, based on the disability of the assignor to sue in person or through another, is waived unless raised by plea in abatement or by special exception.

3. An action for injury to lands without the State by an act no part of which was performed within the State cannot be maintained in a Texas court.
4. Proof of actual, peaceable and exclusive possession of personal property is sufficient prima facie evidence of ownership to sustain a suit for damages for its destruction

NOTE.—Indians may enforce their rights in a court of justice.

In the early case of Jackson v. Reynolds, 14 Johns. 385, an Indian was denied any status in our courts except through the attorney of his tribe; but the reasons assigned for the holding are not applicable to the present status of the Indians. Jemmisson v. Kennedy, 55 Hun. 47.

An early Kansas case brought for the partition of real property by an Indian decides that the court had jurisdiction of the subject, and in effect accorded to the Indian a status in the courts. Swartzel v. Rogers, 3 Kan. 377.

In New York it appears that since the decision of the chancellor in Strong v. Waterman, 11 Paige, 607, 5 L. ed. 250, the tenure of the Indians to their reservation, and their right to prosecute and maintain actions for the enforcement and protection of their rights, appears to have been settled by an Act of the Legislature. Seneca Nation of Indians v. Tyler, 14 How. Pr. 109.

Therefore, an action brought by said Seneca Nation of Indians, in their own name, upon a promissory note, given and made payable to them, may be sustained; and it is not necessary that they should aver their authority to sue in the state courts. Ibid.

It is a general rule that all persons having a just cause of action may bring a suit therefor, except as herein mentioned; and no personal disability will deprive one of this right. 3 Bouvier, Inst. 138; Sinclair v. Sinclair, 18 Mees. & W. 640; Broom, Parties to Actions, 84; Barbour, Parties to Actions, chap. I, § 1; The Kansas Indians, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 737, 18 L. ed. 687.

Indians do not submit themselves to all the laws of a State because they seek its courts for the preservation of rights and the redress of wrongs. The Kansas Indians, supra.

An Indian may maintain an action in a state court to enforce his right to the enjoyment of property, real or personal. Lobdell v. Hall, 3 Nev. 507.

They may file a bill in equity, on behalf of themselves and the residue of the nation on the reservation, to restrain a trespass on their land. Strong v. Waterman, 11 Paige, 607, 5 L. ed. 250.

An Indian is liable to be sued in a state court. Jones v. Eisler, 3 Kan. 134; Murch v. Tomer, 21 Me. 585; Rubideaux v. Vallie, 12 Kan. 28.

If an Indian dies before the laws of a State are extended over the reservation, a state court may grant letters of administration on his estate, when they are so extended. Brashear v. Williams, 10 Ala. 930. But see, contra, Dole v. Irish, 2 Barb. 639; United States v. Shanks, 15 Minn. 339; Desty, Fed. Const. art. 1, § 8.

against a mere wrong-doer who shows no right to it.

5. The fact that buildings in the possession of one person, and because of the destruction of which he brings suit, were on the land of another, repels the presumption of ownership arising from possession, and plaintiff must affirmatively show that they were personal property and that he had the right to remove them from the soil.
6. Exclusive and peaceable possession of hay which had been severed from the soil is prima facie sufficient to support a recovery against a wrong-doer for its destruction, although it grew on the land belonging to the Choctaw Nation of Indians.
7. An Indian may lawfully own personal property and assign a claim for damages for its wrongful destruction so as to entitle the assignee to maintain a suit therefor in the Texas courts.
8. A railroad company is not relieved from liability for injuries caused by fire set out through its negligence by the facts that the fire had traveled over considerable space and had been revived by a strong wind after having apparently gone out before doing the damage which occurred the day after the fire started.
9. The presumption of negligence which arises upon proof that engines of a railroad company set out fire which destroyed property of the complaining party is rebutted by showing that the engines were provided with the best improved spark arresters, in good condition and properly operated.
10. To recover from a railroad company the value of property destroyed by fire alleged to have been negligently set out by the company, plaintiff must prove by a preponderance of evidence both that the company set out the fire and that it was negligent.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Grayson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain property alleged to have been destroyed by fire negligently set out by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. W. W. Wilkins and Brown & Bliss for appellee.

Marr, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"Appellee, J. M. Cullers, filed this suit against appellant in the District Court of Grayson County on March 4, 1887, and by amendment filed October 28, 1887, set up that on November 21, 1885, defendant negligently allowed sparks and fire to escape from its engine, which fire caught and destroyed the following property, to wit: One portable engine, valued at $500; one hay-press, valued at $400; one hay-press, valued at $250; one mower, valued at $85; one mower, valued at $70; one derrick and hay loader, valued at $50; six bundles hay wire, valued at $15; one sickle grinder, valued at $10; two dozen hay forks, valued at $6; one rubber belt, valued at $30; 4,500 bales of hay, valued at $1,600; one hay shed, valued at $200; one house and kitchen, valued at $200; and one stable, valued at $50; all of which property was located in the Indian Territory, and was reasonably worth, at the time and place of its destruction, in the aggregate, the sum of $3,666. That certain portions of the hay, machinery and fixtures were owned by appellee, G. T. Black, and H. C. Lavo, individually, but that it was used in the partnership business of the firm, consisting of appellee, Black, and Lavo, which said firm was engaged at the time in the hay business; and that the hay belonged to them jointly. Appellee and Lavo were citizens of the County of Grayson, Tex. Black was a citizen and member of the tribe of the Chickasaw Indians. Black and Lavo, for valuable considerations, had transferred their interest in the claim against the appellant for the destruction of said property to appellee, and had authorized him to sue therefor in his own name. The trial before a jury on September 19, 1888, resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for the sum of $4,519.78, of which amount appellee remitted the sum of $100 on November 12, 1888. From this judgment appellant has perfected its appeal to this court." Black transferred his claim to plaintiff to aid in the payment of the debts of the firm, which Cullers had partly paid and assumed the balance.

The assignments of error present several questions which require a decision thereof by this court. The first and second assignments, relating to the sufficiency of the evidence in law to support the verdict of the jury, and the fourth assignment, based upon the refusal of the court to allow the second instruction requested by the defendant, and dependent for support upon the nature of the evidence, will be postponed until we have determined the other questions presented by the appellant for our consideration. Summarized, the other points contended for by appellant's counsel are: That the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury as requested by appellant, to the following effect: First. That Black, being a member of an Indian tribe, and an Indian himself, cannot sue, nor, by assignment of whatever right of action he might have elsewhere, authorize or confer upon plaintiff the right to sue in the courts of this State, and therefore plaintiff cannot recover as to so much of the property destroyed as originally belonged to Black. Second. In refusing to charge that the court below had no jurisdiction of controversies arising in the Indian Territory between Indian citizens and citizens of the United States, the defendant being a citizen of Missouri; and that a citizen of an Indian nation cannot transfer his claims for such damages to a citizen of the State of Texas, so as to enable the latter to maintain the suit thereon in the courts of this State. Third. In refusing to charge that, in any event, the plaintiff could not recover damages for the destruction of "the houses, stables, and other real property situated on lands of the Choctaw Indians, and belonging to a member of that tribe;" and that nothing should be allowed "by reason of the burning of the dwelling-house and stable mentioned in the petition." Fourth. In refusing "to instruct the jury [as requested in the fifth instruction] that plaintiff, having shown no right to cut or put up the hay for the loss of which he sues, on the lands of the Choctaw Nation, is not entitled to recover anything by reason thereof."

The plaintiff, J. M. Cullers, as well as Lavo, is a citizen of Texas and of the United States, but Black is a citizen of the Chickasaw Nation, and the property destroyed was at the time in the territory of the Choctaw Nation. It will thus be seen that the plaintiff himself is under no disability to sue in our courts, unless it be that the fact that a part of his right to recover, being derived from the Indian, Black, imparts to him a partial disability to that extent. But it seems to us that even then the question would not be one of the personal disability of the plaintiff to sue, but would depend upon the right of Black to assign his claim. If he could do this, then undoubtedly plaintiff, as his assignee, could maintain the suit on the claim, whether Black could have done so originally or not. The plaintiff is entirely free from any disability which, under the law, would deny him a standing in the courts if he possesses otherwise a right of action. There is no question of "comity" in such case. Rorer, Interstate Law, p. 155. If, however, it were necessary for us to decide the question, we think we would have little difficulty in holding that an Indian, like Black, is a "person" within the meaning of our State Constitution and laws, and is thereby guaranteed the right of redress for injuries done to him "in his person, property, or reputation." If he is not a person, then what is he? Even the plea of an alien enemy has been denounced by our courts as an "odious plea," though it must be sustained if timely interposed. Bishop v. Jones, 28 Tex. 294. Every day alien citizens of friendly nations are allowed to sue in our courts nemine dissente. We should not hesitate to hold that an Indian—certainly a civilized Indian—is entitled to a redress of wrongs through our state courts. It is not a question of comity, but of right given by law, supposing the court otherwise to have jurisdiction of the controversy. Swaartzel v. Rogers, 3 Kan. 377; Wiley v. Keokuk, 6 Kan. 94; Wiley v. Man-a-to-wah, Id. 111; 10 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 440, note 5; Dicey, Parties, pp. 1, 2; Gho v. Jules, 1 Wash. T. 325; Cooley, Torts, p. 35.

The federal courts, by generally deciding that an Indian is neither "an alien" nor a "citizen" until naturalized or admitted to citizenship, necessarily deprived those courts of jurisdiction over controversies between Indians and citizens of one of the States of the Union, wherever the jurisdiction is dependent upon the status of the parties. This does not apply to the state courts. But in the present case there was no plea in abatement or special exception to the disability of the plaintiff supposed to result from a supposed disability affecting Black's right to sue himself in person or through another; therefore the question is waived anyhow by the pleadings of the defendant. It may be, however, that the right of Black to assign the claim, and thus invest plaintiff with the ownership thereof, as well as the right of the plaintiff to recover damages done to such of the property as defendant contends was real estate, and, if so, was not owned by any of the parties, is sufficiently raised and presented by the pleading of the general issue which, we think, throws on the plaintiff the burden of showing at least prima facie his right to the property destroyed or to the damages done thereto. Before determining this branch of the case, we deem it not inappropriate to here dispose of the question raised by the defendant and argued by counsel on both sides,—that so much of the action as seeks to recover damages for the destruction of the house and kitchen and stable is purely local, and not transitory, and therefore arose out of the jurisdiction of this State, and, as a consequence, will not, like a transitory action, follow the person of the wrong-doer, so as to allow the courts of another jurisdiction to entertain jurisdiction thereof. To all intents and purposes, so far as being sued is concerned, the appellant is a resident of this State and subject to its laws, and to the jurisdiction of its courts. Its road extends into and through the country in which it was sued, and it has an agent and representative there. The court below had "jurisdiction over the subject matter," and therefore, by express provisions of law, the defendant was amenable to the process of that court, and liable to be sued in that county. Sayles' Civil Stat. art. 1198, § 21b, and section 21. This is unquestionably correct as to so much of the cause of action as is of a transitory nature. Dicey, Parties, p. 67. But while this is true as to transitory actions, and therefore the court below undoubtedly had jurisdiction of so much of plaintiff's claim for damages as is of that nature, and would have had jurisdiction of the whole claim if it had been clearly shown that the action is transitory as to all of the items for which damages are claimed, still, upon the other hand, it must now be regarded as the settled law of this State, in harmony with the rule of the common law, that an action or remedy for injuries done to land situated beyond the territorial limits of this State, and when no part of the act resulting in the injury was committed or performed within the State, is purely local, and cannot be maintained in any court in this State, but the enforcement of the remedy in such cases must be had within the jurisdiction where the land is situate. Morris v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 78 Tex. 17.

The court below therefore should have charged the jury on the subject as requested by appellant, but with a proper qualification so as to leave to the jury whether any of the property destroyed was in fact real estate or not. The necessity of such a charge, and of the jury being allowed under appropriate instructions to determine the issue whether the buildings were a part of the land or not, will hereafter be more fully discussed in the several respects in which the question is presented.

We now recur to the other questions: first, Could there be any recovery for the destruction of the house, kitchen, and stable? and, secondly, Could any part of the claim for damages be assigned by Black?

First. The appellee contends that the house and stable were chattels, not real estate. If so, it would seem that Black's right to them is as strong as to the other property held by him. It is admitted that the ownership was proved, as alleged, in all of the property; and it is alleged that the house, kitchen, and stable, were "furnished by Black" and used in the partnership. It appears, however, that these buildings were on the lands of the Choctaw Nation. If, therefore, they were a part of the realty, it is very evident that plaintiff is not entitled to recover for their destruction either in his own right or in the right of Black or Lavo, since it is not pretended that any of the parties owned or held the title to the land. It will thus be seen that the solution of this particular question does not depend upon the citizenship of the parties, since, had the house and stable been "furnished" by the plaintiff himself, instead of Black to be used by the partners, the same issue would have been presented, of the right to recover for injuries to the land, which the plaintiff admits that he did not own, nor did Black. How, then, could he recover damages for such injury? If allowed to do so, the true owner could also recover, and thereby the defendant would be subjected to a double recovery for the same act. Before proceeding further, we desire to observe that if all of the property destroyed can be regarded as personal property, then we hold that the plaintiff established such prima facie right or title thereto as would entitle him to recover against a mere wrong-doer which showed no right to the property, if it is sufficiently proven that the defendant did destroy the property. The plaintiff proved that at the time the property was destroyed he and his partners had the actual, peaceable, and exclusive possession thereof, which, we think, was prima facie evidence of ownership or right to the property, sufficient to maintain the suit. Pacific Exp. Co. v. Dunn (Tex.) (Sup. Ct. present term); Cooley, Torts, pp. 436, 437, 445, 446; Weymouth v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 17 Wis. 550, 84 Am. Dec. 784; Angell, Lim. p. 385, note 4. But this does not eliminate the difficulty in his way to recover for the injuries (if any) to the land, because, as we have said, it is not claimed even that any of the parties owned the land; and as to that, therefore, the prima facie proof of ownership resulting from the possession is repelled. In arriving at their verdict and assessing the amount of damages the jury undoubtedly allowed for the loss of the house, kitchen, and stable. Can we hold that it is conclusively shown that these buildings were mere chattels, and no part of the land? If not, can we hold—would we be justified in holding—that the first paragraph of the charge of the court, allowing a recovery therefor by plaintiff, as well as its refusal to give the fourth special instruction asked by the defendant as above set forth, were harmless errors? We think not. The defendant, also, in this connection, assigns as error the first paragraph of the court's charge, and that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and the evidence in this particular. The court charged the jury to the effect that, under "the written transfers from Black and Lavo to the plaintiff, in connection with the undisputed evidence" in the case, he could recover for all of the property, if shown to have been destroyed by the negligence of the defendant, its servants or employes. Such was the legal effect of the charge, and it put the buildings upon the same footing as the other property destroyed. Under such circumstances, we think that the issue of ownership of those structures and the right of the plaintiff to recover therefor, as well as the right to maintain the suit in the courts of this State for an injury to the buildings, is duly raised and presented. Appellee attempts to obviate this, as we have said, by contending that the buildings were nothing more than chattels or personal property. He states all of the evidence (so far as we can discover) tending to support this contention as follows, together with the authorities cited by him, viz.: "The buildings and structures consisted of one hay shed, valued at $200; one house and kitchen, valued at $200; and one stable, valued at $50; all of which was located in the Indian Territory, near Cale's switch, on appellant's line of railway. They were called the 'hay camp,' and were used in the partnership business." Authorities: Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 2; 1 Washb. Real

Prop. p. 8; Ashmun v. Williams, 8 Pick. 402; Moody v. Aiken, 50 Tex. 65; Hutchins v. Masterson, 46 Tex. 554. It is not alleged that these structures were personal property in the petition, nor is any right to remove them from the soil alleged or proven. It is shown that Black "furnished" the house and kitchen and the stable to be used in the partnership. But where did he acquire a right to the buildings? When and how were they erected on the ground of another? Did he own the material, and himself erect the structures, or were they already standing on the ground, and thus taken possession of by him and "furnished" or appropriated by him to the use of the partnership, of which he was a member? If he erected them, was it done in such a manner that they were still portable, and removable as on wheels, and not fixed and attached to the soil, as a house or stable generally is? We find no sufficient answer, if any, in the evidence on the subject as given in the briefs of counsel, nor have we found any in the statement of facts. The fact that the buildings are spoken of, in connection with the other property, as "the camp," does not prove that they are no part of the land. It may tend to show that the parties intended only to use them temporarily while camped there and engaged in cutting hay, but yet if Black, in fact, erected the buildings with his own material, but did so in such manner as to affix and attach them to the soil without permission of the owner, they became, as he had no interest in the realty, a part of the land, and were lost to him. We think it will not be denied that a dwelling-house and kitchen would generally be regarded as a part of the realty. In any event, whether they were movable fixtures or not, in the present instance, was a mixed question of law and fact, and the issue was not submitted to the jury at all. Authorities supra. Besides, as we have said, it is not shown that Black, in fact, erected these buildings, and, if he did, he put them on the land of a stranger, without license to do so. Tiedeman, in the second section of his work on Real Property (cited by appellee), says: "Land is the soil of the earth, and includes everything erected upon its surface, or which is buried beneath it. Under the term 'land,' therefore, are included the buildings made so under the doctrine of accession. . . . The general rule of law is that a permanent annexation to the soil of a thing in itself personal makes it a part of the realty. The rule applies in some cases even where the thing annexed is the personal property of another. Thus, if a stranger erects a building upon the land of another, having no estate therein, the building becomes the property of the owner of the soil. [Certainly where he knew he did not own the land.] . . . But if such erection is in pursuance of a license granted by the owner of the soil, then the annexation will not make the building or structure a part of the realty." It seems, therefore, according to the weight of the evidence, that the structures, without further proof on the subject, would come under the operation of the general rule, and not the exception. We certainly cannot hold as a matter of law that there was no permanent annexation, and that the structures are movable fixtures; but, on the contrary, in the light of testimony on the subject, an opposite deduction is more reasonable. We therefore think that there was error in the first paragraph of the court's general charge, given as it was without any qualification, so as to leave to the jury the determination of this issue,—whether there had been any permanent annexation to the soil. The same may be said of the refusal to allow the fourth special instruction. In this connection we will dispose of the question as to the right of the plaintiff to recover for the hay. We think that there was no error in the court's refusal to allow the fifth instruction requested by the defendant, "that the plaintiff, having shown no right to cut or put up hay on land of the Choctaw Nation," cannot recover for its destruction. Plaintiff alleged that under the laws of that nation the members of his firm had the right to cut and put up hay on the land, and that they had complied with all the requirements of law in the premises. When destroyed, the grass had been severed from the soil, and reduced to the actual possession of the parties, ready for market. It was no longer any part of the land. Their exclusive and peaceable possession thereof was prima facie sufficient to support a recovery against a wrong-doer. Under such circumstances, and in the absence of proof that they did not have the right to put up the hay, a license to do so ought to be presumed. Abb. Tr. Ev. p. 623, § 4. This is different from the right to recover for an injury to the land itself, for it clearly appears that none of the parties owned the land, and the damage, therefore, in legal contemplation, could not be to them. They did not show even a possessory right to use and occupy the land itself, except temporarily, while engaged in making hay, and to the extent only that was necessary for that purpose. Had there been proof that Black had the legal authority to erect the buildings on the land, and if he did so under such circumstances as gave him the right to remove the same, then the exclusive actual possession of the buildings would likewise have been sufficient evidence of ownership, if it were necessary, under such circumstances, to rely upon that fact. 1 Civil Cas. Ct. App. §§ 517, 996; 2 Civil Cas. Ct. App. § 780. As to permanent annexations, etc., see Cooley, Torts, pp. 428-430, and note 1. But we have already sufficiently discussed the issue of fixtures vel non to indicate our views on that subject. At the risk of prolixity, however, we will make a few additional observations upon the matter of title in cases like the present, to prevent, if possible, a misapprehension of our views when construed in the light of some of the authorities which we have cited. Many of the decisions of most eminent courts as well as able text-writers announce the rule of law to be that in actions of trespass or trover or in kindred actions the wrong-doer cannot avail himself of a title to the property in a third party with which he is not connected. We do not doubt that the proof of such fact would not be allowed to completely justify the wrong-doer anywhere, or prevent the plaintiff from recovering for the injury done to his possession as such, or to defeat an existent right to the possession of the property, etc.; but, upon the other hand, we are equally clear that, if it is established that the plaintiff was not the owner of the property, and had no other interest therein than the bare possession thereof, then, where the measure of damages relied upon is the value of the property injured, destroyed, or converted, in such case the defendant would not be legally liable to compensate the plaintiff for the value of property which he did not own; and ought to be permitted to prove title in a third party, not only for the purpose of disproving the plaintiff's right, or rather, claim for damages, without an injury to himself, but also to avoid being compelled to respond in double damages for the same injury to the property. Vide Clapp v. Glidden, 39 Me. 448. Until such outstanding title or a title in the defendant is established, however, the possessory right of the plaintiff is sufficient to justify a full recovery; hence it is correctly said that the actual possession of property is prima facie proof of the ownership thereof, but it amounted to no more than this.

We now reach the consideration of the second question propounded above, viz.: Could Black transfer his claim for damages? The appellant contends that an Indian, being under the control and protection of the government of the United States, cannot own property, nor transfer any claim for damages done thereto, and that his only redress is through the agencies provided by the general government. Without stopping to consider the inconsistency of this contention, pointed out by appellee's counsel, we hold that the entire position is untenable, and that we do not doubt that an Indian (certainly a civilized one) is entitled to own personal effects or chattels, and to be protected in their enjoyment until deprived thereof by due course of law. Any other doctrine would be monstrous, and contrary to the civilization of the age. His possessory right to keep and enjoy the property cannot, as we think, in any event be denied, upon any sound legal principle. Can he be robbed or stripped naked in our streets by lawless hands, and yet have no recourse in the courts, upon the ground that he is without title, and legally incapable of acquiring title? At the time of the destruction of the property in question it appears that Black was off his own reservation, and was not occupying strictly tribal relations with his own nation, the Chickasaws, but was engaged in business, and in a co-partnership with white men, and on his own account. We have found no law of the United States or of this State that would prevent him, or, in fact, any Indian, from acquiring personal property, and of enjoying the fruits of his labor and industry, but the laws are quite to the contrary. While it may be true that there are some restrictions upon the right of Indians to make contracts, or to dispose of either real or personal property of certain kinds, under some circumstances, imposed by the laws of Congress (Rev. Stat. arts. 2116, 2127 et seq.) still we do not believe that they apply to the transfer made by Black to the plaintiff. None of his property, as such, was in fact transferred, but only a claim for its loss. That contract does not come within the purview of section 2103, Rev. Stat. U. S., which, among other things, requires certain character of agreements made with Indians to be approved by the secretary of the interior. They are for the most part contracts to render services for an Indian or tribe of Indians in the collection of claims against the general government. This Statute was construed by the Supreme Court of Indiana, and it was held that an Indian could assign or transfer even a portion of her annuity due from the general government in payment of her debts, and authorize the creditor to receive and apply the same to the extinguishment of the debt; and that agreements or transactions of this nature between an Indian and a citizen were not prohibited nor regulated by the laws of Congress. Godfrey v. Scott, 70 Ind. 259. The present controversy falls within the reasoning and principle of that case. We do not think that the laws of Congress, nor the provisions of any treaty of which we are advised, were intended to confine an Indian exclusively to the interior department for a redress of grievances, or would prevent him from assigning a right of action like the present. Unless restricted by some positive law, the right to property and dominion over it, inherent in every human being, would entirely embrace the right, if not the necessity, of transferring it or of using it in such manner as seems most advantageous to the owner. The mass of personal property would be of little benefit unless it could be sold, exchanged, or transferred by the owner; and Congress certainly did not intend to deny to an Indian like Black complete dominion over and full enjoyment of such of the property as was acquired by his own industry, and not as a pensioner of the United States. The Supreme Court of Washington Territory held that an Indian sustaining tribal relations could contract, sue, and be sued the same as an alien. Among other things, the court says, in speaking of the right of an Indian to acquire property and make contracts, that "he had the same right and power to contract with appellee as the appellee had to contract with him. Money and all other personal property, which he certainly had the right to get and hold, he had also the right to use immediately, and to promise in advance in all proper ways, in pursuit of his happiness." Gho v. Jules, 1 Wash. T. 325, q. v. for a discussion of the right of an Indian to acquire and use property, to sue and be sued, and the necessity of such rights, etc. The nature of Black's claim for damages done to property being such as is ordinarily assignable, we are of the opinion that the fact that Black is an Indian does not render the assignment illegal or inoperative, and therefore the court below did not err in refusing to instruct the jury as requested by appellant on this point. Having the right both to transfer the property and to sue in our courts, as we have seen, he could undoubtedly transfer the cause of action, when it is otherwise assignable under the law.

We return now to the first, second, and fourth assignments of error, adverted to in the outset. In regard to the fourth assignment, which relates to the refusal of the court to allow the second instruction requested by the defendant* it may be said that the first proposition thereof was applicable, and, if standing alone, should, perhaps, have been given, in order to call the attention of the jury pointedly to the issue; but it was mixed up and connected with other improper directions that should not have been allowed. It was not "wholly immaterial" whether the fire which had been raging on the previous day was "communicated by the engines of the defendant," and destroyed the hay camp, for there was some evidence to that effect. If that fire arose from the negligence of the defendant, and in fact destroyed plaintiff's property, we do not see why the defendant should not be held responsible for the consequences of that fire. Defendant offered proof tending to show that the fire which destroyed the camp was a prairie fire, not kindled by its engines. This was permissible, but the court had already charged the jury that, if the fire that destroyed the property was not caused by fire escaping from the defendant's engines, but resulted from some other cause, they would find for the defendant. The court was not, therefore, bound to reform and rectify the requested instruction into a presentable shape.

The first and second assignments present more serious questions, viz.: Does the evidence sustain the verdict finding that the engines of the defendant communicated the fire which destroyed the property, and that this was due to the negligence of the defendant? The only facts proved by the plaintiff to show the origin of the fire, or negligence upon the part of the defendant in this respect, are the following: A short time before the fire was discovered two freight trains belonging to the defendant, one following the other after a short interval, passed over the road, and near to the point where appellee claims the fire was started, and might, therefore, have set out the fire. Between three and four hours after the fire was first discovered, a witness (Lavo) for the plaintiff went over the recently burned district, and traced the course of the fire to where he says it "started." The place located by this witness and relied on by the plaintiff as the beginning point of the fire was at the foot of the railway embankment, and within 15 feet of the track, and south of the bayou. Here the witness testifies that he found "grass and brush still burning." On the next day another witness for plaintiff observed ashes at the same point. It was proved that the country was very dry, and that at and during the time of the fire a furious wind was blowing, which swept the flames and shocks of burning grass before it with rushing rapidity, and to great distances, defying every effort of the witness to protect the hay camp, which, though situated at some considerable distance from the railway, was quickly reached and consumed by the fire. The defendant introduced a great deal of testimony to disprove the facts relied on by the plaintiff, and at least completely repelled the presumption of negligence that would be indulged from the fact that its engines communicated the fire, even if it be conceded that the fire was thus caused. The defendant proved by a number of witnesses that these engines were provided with the best improved fire-arresters, in good condition, and properly operated. Nay, more than this, that its road track was down grade at this point, and that these trains (as was the habit) passed along by their own momentum, without the use of steam, or the working of the engines, and that in such case it is "impossible" for an engine to emit sparks and cinders, etc. These facts the plaintiff did not even attempt to disprove. There was also proof of the prevalence of "the prairie fire" which we have already mentioned. But it may be said, as it is argued by appellee's counsel, that there is a conflict of evidence as to the origin of the fire, and that the jury had the right to conclude that it was set out by the act of the defendant. If we concede this, still, where is the proof that the fire was kindled through the culpable negligence of the defendant? Both of these facts must be shown by a preponderance of the evidence, at least in the court a quo. Appellee answers that the defendant permitted combustible material to accumulate on its right of way. If so, that would be negligence, if that caused the fire. But the only proof of this is that "some grass and brush" (how much it is not shown) were found burning at the beginning point of the fire, as fixed by appellee, several hours after the fire. If in fact dry and combustible, how is it that the grass and brush burned so long and continued to burn at the same place in the face of so strong a wind as was then prevailing? Would not such material have been swept away as fast as it burned, or been extinguished in a short while? The process of incineration was entirely of too great duration to be compatible with the hypothesis that the material was dry and combustible, under the circumstances. It seems to us that this brush and grass must have been green and difficult to burn, or else the fire did not, in all probability, originate at this point. If it did not, then there is no proof of negligence. The evidence, in our opinion, fails to show an accumulation of dry and combustible material at this point or anywhere on the right of way. One wit-

*That instruction was as follows: "If you believe that the property in question was set on fire by the prairie fires which had been burning on the preceding day and night, and that this fire, after having apparently gone out, was revived by a strong wind on the day in question, and carried to the property, and caused its destruction instead, you should find for defendant. There is no competent evidence that such fire was communicated by defendant's engines, nor is it material for the jury to consider whether or not it was so caused under the circumstances. If this fire, and not one freshly set out by the engines which approached Cale switch just before the destruction of the hay, caused the damage, plaintiff is not entitled to recover." [Rep.]

ness testifies that the fire started at a point north of the bayou, but this does not appear to have been on the right of way; and, besides, on that side of the bayou the defendant had recently cleared and burned off its right of way. The law did not require nor permit the defendant to destroy or remove grass or other inflammable material not on its right of way. In view of the evidence as presented in the record, we are constrained, though not without some reluctance, to hold that it does not support the verdict of the jury to the extent required by law in such cases, particularly as to the issue of negligence. Vide, Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 69 Tex. 79; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Witte, 68 Tex. 295; Fort Worth & N. O. R. Co. v. Wallace, 74 Tex. 585; International & G. N. R. Co.

v. Timmermann, 61 Tex. 663; Texas P. R. Co. v. Levi, 59 Tex. 677.

Upon another trial additional evidence may be adduced, or at least fuller explanations of the circumstances relied upon may be made, on behalf of the plaintiff, and we forbear therefore from saying that the verdict is entirely without any evidence for its support. We have endeavored to dispose of all of the numerous questions presented because it is apparent that they will arise again upon another trial, and this has unavoidably protracted the opinion to an extent much beyond our desire.

For the errors indicated we think that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Adopted by Supreme Court, June 16, 1891.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

D. S. FORBES, Appt.,

v.

ESCAMBIA COUNTY BOARD OF HEALTH.

(..... Fla.)

*1. The Act of 1885, chap. 3603, providing for the creation of county boards of health, and constituting them corporations, must be construed in connection with the Acts of 1879, chap. 3162; 1881, chap. 3312, and 1883, chap. 3443, Laws Fla.,—as being in part materia, and having in view one object.

2. Under the Act of 1879, chap. 3162, as amended by the Act of 1883, chap. 3443, county boards of health have no authority to demand and collect from vessels coming into the jurisdiction of said boards fees for fumigation or disinfection, unless said vessels are subject to and have been put in quarantine.

3. Under the Act of 1885, chap. 3603, and the acts in part materia prior thereto, county boards of health have no authority, without an examination or inspection, to require vessels upon entering ports within the jurisdiction of said boards to deviate from their course six miles and go to a quarantine station for inspection and examination.

4. County boards of health are corporate bodies, invested by statute with functions of a public nature, to be exercised for the public benefit, and, in the absence of such remedy conferred by statute, are not liable in an action for tort for damages in the performance of an official duty.

(August 15, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Escambia County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's alleged illegal interference with plaintiff's vessel in compelling it to go into quarantine and pay the charges thereof. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. L. Campbell and J. Emmet Wolfe for appellant.

Mr. John C. Avery, for appellee:

If the Board of Health made an error in their construction of the law in so far as it authorized them to thoroughly protect the public health of the county, they were acting within the general scope of their jurisdiction and cannot be held responsible for an error in their comprehension of the limits of their power.

Mabry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In September, 1888, appellant, D. S. Forbes, commenced a suit against appellee in the Circuit Court of the First Judicial Circuit of Florida for Escambia County. A demurrer was sustained on the 22d day of October, 1888, to the original declaration filed by plaintiff below, and leave given to amend the declaration. On the 5th day of November, 1888, plaintiff below filed the following amended declaration: "D. S. Forbes, by his attorney, R. L. Campbell, sues the Board of Health of Escambia County, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, for that, on the 27th day of August, A. D. 1888, the British bark Tiber, whereof said plaintiff was and is master, did enter the Port of Pensacola, in said county and State, the Port of Cape Town being the last port from which said bark Tiber sailed on the voyage which ended at the Port of Pensacola on the day and year above mentioned; and plaintiff avers that, although no quarantine had, before the entry of said bark into the said Port of Pensacola, nor during the stay of said bark in said port, been declared by said defendant against said Port of Cape Town, and although no contagious, infectious, or pestilential disease existed upon said bark at the time of or after her coming into the said Port of Pensacola as aforesaid, and although no such disease had occurred or existed upon said bark during her voyage from said Port of Cape Town to said Port of Pensacola, nor within thirty days before her arrival at said Port of Pensacola, said defendant did compel said bark, immediately upon her entering the Bay of Pensacola, in which said Port of Pensacola is situated, to proceed directly to the quarantine station of said defendant, which said quarantine station is situated upon an arm of said Bay of Pensacola, and distant southeasterly six miles from the said Port of Pensacola, where vessels load and unload, thereby compelling said bark to deviate six miles from the course of vessels not subject to quarantine, proceeding to the usual place of loading and unloading cargo in said Port of Pensacola, and did compel said bark to make said deviation and proceed to said quarantine station as aforesaid, without any inspection or examination of said bark, her crew, or cargo, by any health inspector or city physician of said port, and without any report of such inspector or physician, or order of said defendant in respect to the sanitary condition of said bark, her crew or cargo, but solely and exclusively under the provisions of section 1 of a proclamation of said defendant made on the 23d day of April, A. D. 1888, which is as follows: 'That from and after the 15th day of May, A. D. 1888, and until the 15th day of November, A. D. 1888, no vessel which may have been, between those dates, at ports or places where yellow fever or other malignant disease had actually appeared, shall be permitted to discharge ballast or cargo or load cargo in said Bay of Pensacola; and that all other vessels arriving in said bay between said dates shall, immediately upon crossing the bar, proceed to the quarantine station hereinafter designated, to be inspected, and, if deemed necessary by the quarantine physician, discharge ballast, and be submitted to a cleansing and disinfecting process:—and not under any other proclamation or order or requirement of said defendant, or law of the State of Florida; and did, for a long space of time, to wit, twelve days, detain said bark, the reasonable damages for which detention is $78.94 per day, rating the same at the usual rate of demurrage per day for a vessel such as the said bark, which is 8 cents per day per registered ton, said bark being of the burden of 924 registered tons; and did also compel said bark to undergo fumigation, for which said defendant charged the plaintiff the sum of $46.20 for said fumigation and the materials used in effecting the same; and also did compel said bark, with her own crew and appliances, to discharge her ballast at said quarantine station, and did charge and compel the payment by said bark at the rate of thirty-five cents per ton for every ton of ballast so discharged, which amounted to 820 tons, making the aggregate charge for the discharging of said ballast of $112. And plaintiff further avers that he was compelled to pay said ballast and fumigation charges under pain of attachment and seizure of his vessel for the refusal of plaintiff to pay the same, and also of plaintiff being prevented from taking said bark from the said quarantine station to the loading ground for vessels in said Port of Pensacola, for the purpose of fulfilling the charter of said bark, for the fulfillment of which said bark came lawfully into the Port of Pensacola, 18 L. R. A.

as aforesaid. Wherefore plaintiff says that he is damaged in the sum of $2,000, and therefore he brings this suit," etc.

Defendant below demurred to the amended declaration on the ground that "the same is bad in substance, in this: that it fails to set forth any cause of action against defendant." This demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiff below declining to further amend, a final judgment was rendered against him on the 12th day of December, 1888, from which decision an appeal is prosecuted to this court.

The errors assigned here are: (1) in sustaining the appellee's demurrer to appellant's amended declaration; (2) in rendering final judgment against appellant upon said demurrer.

The sole question for us to deal with now is the sufficiency of the allegations of appellant's declaration to state a cause of action against appellee. The Board of Health of Escambia County is a creature of statutory law, and all its duties and powers are derived from this source. Before analyzing the declaration to see if its allegations are sufficient to constitute a cause of action, let us refer to the statutory provisions on the subject of county boards of health. The first enactment on this subject to which reference need be made is the Act of 1879 (chap. 3162, Laws Fla.) This Act constitutes the mayor, aldermen, and city physician, if there be one, of every incorporated city or town a board of health for said city or town; and when there is no incorporated city or town the board of county commissioners shall constitute a board of health for such county. The boards of health thus created are invested with power to declare quarantines on water or land, within their jurisdictions, against boats or vessels upon which any contagious, infectious, or pestilential disease existed or had existed during the voyage to said city, town, or district, or within thirty days next preceding the arrival of said boat or vessel within the jurisdiction of said boards, and against any country or locality infected with plague or other malignant or contagious disease. Said boards are authorized to make such rules for the regulation of quarantines as may be deemed necessary, not inconsistent with said act, and to prescribe penalties for their violation. They are also authorized to appoint one or more port inspectors, whose duty it shall be to board every boat or vessel approaching such city or town, and ascertain if the same is subject to perform quarantine; and, if such boat or vessel is subject to quarantine, the inspector visiting her shall order her thrown into quarantine at the place designated for such purpose, and immediately notify the board that such boat or vessel has been ordered into quarantine. This Act gave to the boards of health power to deal with infected persons, goods, vessels, or localities, and as to such matters they could only act by putting in operation a quarantine. The boards created by this Act have no power to act in regard to matters pertaining to public health otherwise than by establishing quarantines. To carry out this object such boards are authorized to establish quarantine grounds, appoint port inspectors and quarantine physicians, and to make rules regulating quarantines when declared. After a quarantine has been established by the board of health as provided by this Act, and due notice thereof given, all persons are bound to observe the regulations thereof. This Act (sec. 17) provides for the payment of the expenses of the quarantine boards and the officers and employes in and about quarantine, and also for the payment of certain fees by vessels undergoing inspection and in quarantine. This section has been amended by the Act of 1888 (chap. 8448, Laws Fla.). In 1881 the Legislature, by chapter 8312, Laws Fla., provided that the governor shall appoint for every incorporated city and town in this State containing 800 or more registered voters a board of health. Section 4 of this Act confers upon boards of health created by it power to act in regard to all matters pertaining to the public health and vital statistics, and to make such rules and regulations as they may deem necessary for its government and the protection of the public health. The 5th section gives to said boards in matters of quarantine the same powers as are conferred upon boards of health by the Act of 1879 (chap. 8162, Laws Fla.). This Act also provides that section 1 of chapter 8162, so far as it relates to cities and towns of less than 800 registered voters, is not repealed. The Act of 1885, chap. 8608, provides that the governor shall appoint for every county in the State a board of health, which shall be a corporation, with power to sue and be sued, contract and be contracted with, and to acquire and dispose of property, both real and personal. The sixth section of this Act provides that the county commissioners of each county are empowered to assess and levy a tax not to exceed in any year two mills on the dollar, to defray the expenses of said boards of health. The county boards of health created under this Act shall have full power to act in all matters pertaining to quarantine, public health, vital statistics, and the abatement of nuisances, to appoint and suitably compensate a port inspector and such other officers or agents as they may find necessary; and any person who shall interfere with, hinder, or oppose any such officer or agent of the Board in his or their discharge of duty shall be fined not exceeding $1,000. The 9th section of this Act provides that such boards of health may at any time establish such quarantines as in their judgment are expedient for the public welfare, and to provide rules and regulations for the same; and, after the same are established against any port or place, any person violating the same shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by fine or imprisonment. The tenth section enacts that every such board may adopt such rules and regulations as they may deem needful in the exercise of the powers and discharge of the duties created and imposed by this Act.

In Ex parte O'Donovan, 24 Fla. 281, it was held that "the Statute of 1885 (chap. 8608), providing for the appointment of county boards of health, and defining their powers, does not repeal the Act of 1879 (chap. 8162), providing a uniform system of quarantine in this State. These statutes are in pari materia, and to be construed together." It was also held in the case of Ferrari v. Escambia County Board of Health, 24 Fla. 390, that these Acts are on the same subject, and have in view one object, and should be construed together as one system.

The question arises under these Acts, Under what conditions can the County Board of Health of Escambia County detain vessels coming into the Port of Pensacola, and impose upon them the payment of fees for inspection, fumigation, and discharge of ballast? All the powers which this Board can exercise in this respect must be derived from the Statute. This board is a corporate body, the creature of statute, and is incapable of exercising any other powers than those conferred by the Act of Incorporation, or in any other manner than it authorizes. The Act of 1885, however, authorizes county boards of health to declare quarantines and to act in all matters pertaining to quarantines, and this must be taken to confer on such boards all the powers given by statute in reference to such matters. In Ex parte O'Donovan, supra, it was held that the authority to declare quarantine conferred by the Act of 1885, means quarantines as authorized by the Act of 1879. The latter Act (sec. 8) provides in reference to vessels that "any board of health may at any time during each year establish a quarantine, forbidding the approach to the city, town, or district over which said board of health has jurisdiction of any vessel or boat upon which any contagious, infectious, or pestilential disease has occurred or existed during the voyage to said city, town, or district, or within thirty days next preceding the arrival of said vessel or boat at said city, town, or district, and forbidding the landing of any persons or goods from such boat or vessel until such boat or vessel has performed quarantine in accordance with the provisions of this Act and with the rules and regulations of the board of health." Section 4 provides that "any board of health may at any time, upon information that any country or locality is infected with plague or other malignant, contagious, or infectious disease, establish quarantine against such country or locality, forbidding the approach to the town, city, or district over which the said board may have jurisdiction of any vessel or boat or persons from such infected country or locality, and forbidding the landing of such boats or vessels, or of any persons or goods therefrom, until such boat or vessel, person, and goods shall have performed quarantine in accordance with the provisions of this Act and with the rules and regulations of the board of health." The sixth section provides that the boards of health "may appoint one or more port inspectors, whose duty it shall be to board every boat or vessel approaching such city or town, and to ascertain if the said boat or vessel is subject to perform quarantine under the third or fourth sections of this Act; and, if such boat or vessel is subject to perform quarantine as aforesaid, the inspector so boarding said boat or vessel shall order the same, together with all persons and goods, thrown into quarantine at the place designated by the board of health. The said inspector shall immediately notify the board of health that the said boat or vessel has been ordered into quarantine." The quarantines mentioned in this Act are not self-existing. They are to be established by the boards of health when conditions give rise to them. The object of the Statute in providing for quarantines was to protect the people of the State from infectious, contagious, or malignant disease, and the boards of health, in order to accomplish this object, were authorized to establish and maintain quarantines against infected vessels, or vessels from infected places and infected localities. Before any vessel can be put in quarantine one must be established, and the vessel ascertained, by inspection, to be subject to perform quarantine. If the vessel is ascertained by inspection not to be subject to quarantine, she cannot be detained by the board of health, under the Act of 1879, for any purpose. If a vessel is not subject to quarantine,—that is, if she has not been found subject to perform quarantine on account of having on board, or existing within thirty days next preceding the arrival of said vessel at some town or city, “contagious, infectious, or pestilential disease,” or on account of her coming from some infected country or locality,—there is no authority to impose upon her any other charge than that for inspection. It is clear that all the authority the board of health has to collect fees from such vessels must be found in the Statute. The 17th section of the Act of 1879, as amended by the Act of 1888 (chap. 8443), provides that “all the officers and employes in and about quarantine shall be paid, and the expenses of quarantine board, by the city or town establishing such quarantine. Every vessel undergoing inspection by the port inspector, and every vessel in quarantine, which, in the opinion of the port physician, shall require and receive fumigation or other disinfection, shall pay therefor to the board of health such fee or fees as may be prescribed by said board of health, and if the master of any ship, boat, or vessel shall refuse to pay such fees, the board of health may detain said vessel in quarantine until the same are paid, or may sue for and recover the same from the owner of such ship or vessel.” The port inspector, as provided in the sixth section of the Act of 1879, is required to board the vessel as she approaches the city or town, and, if found subject to perform quarantine, she is thrown into quarantine. The Statute provides that every vessel undergoing inspection shall pay such fees therefor as may be prescribed by the board of health; and this, of course, becomes a charge, whether said vessel is ordered into quarantine or not. As will be seen, it further provides that every vessel in quarantine, which, in the opinion of the port inspector, shall require and receive fumigation or other disinfection, shall pay the fees therefor which the board shall prescribe. If the vessel is not subject to and has not been put in quarantine, there is no authority under this Act to make her pay for fumigation or disinfection fees. Counsel for appellee contends, however, that the defendant has power not only to establish quarantines, but to act in all matters pertaining to the public health, vital statistics, and the abatement of nuisances, and to make rules and regulations to govern such matters; that, under the power given to make rules to protect the public health, defendant had the right to require vessels entering the Port of Pensacola to go to a point called a “quarantine station” for inspection, and if in ballast, and deemed expedient, to discharge ballast, and undergo fumigation. It is true that county boards of health, in addition to the power to declare quarantines, have authority to act in all matters pertaining to public health, vital statistics, and the abatement of nuisances, and there is an express grant of power to such boards to adopt such rules and regulations as they may deem needful in the exercise of the powers conferred to protect the public health; but the power to act in matters pertaining to public health, and to make rules and regulations in reference thereto, does not include the authority to demand and collect fees or other money exactions from those who are made to undergo quarantine. Such a power as this must be expressly conferred in order to its rightful exercise. The Board of Health of Escambia County had a right to make such rules in reference to the deposit of ballast near the City of Pensacola as were deemed necessary to preserve the health of the inhabitants of that city. It would be competent, when deemed essential to preserve the public health, for such board to direct that all vessels coming into the Port of Pensacola and in ballast shall discharge the same a reasonable distance from the wharves and inhabitants of the city, and to enforce such rules by adequate penalties. When, however, fees, charges, or money exactions are attempted to be imposed on vessels coming into port, the authority to demand and collect the same must be pointed out in the Statute.

We are satisfied from a careful examination of the statutory provisions on the subject in force at the time the cause of action is alleged to have accrued in this case that no fees other than for inspection can be imposed on vessels coming into the jurisdiction of county boards of health, unless such vessels have been ascertained, by inspection, to be subject to quarantine, and have been put in quarantine.

Let us now turn our attention to the allegations of the declaration, and see if sufficient has been averred to make a case against defendant. It is alleged that defendant promulgated on the 28d day of May, 1888, the following order, viz.: “That from and after the 15th day of May, A. D. 1888, and until the 15th day of November, 1888, no vessel which may have been between those dates at ports or places where yellow fever or other malignant disease has actually appeared shall be permitted to discharge ballast or cargo or load cargo in said Bay of Pensacola; and that all other vessels arriving in said bay between said dates shall immediately upon crossing the bar proceed to the quarantine station hereinafter designated, to be inspected, and, if deemed necessary by the quarantine physician, discharge ballast, and be submitted to a cleansing and disinfecting process.” That on the 27th day of August, 1888, the bark Tiber entered the Port of Pensacola, in Escambia County, Fla., the Port of Cape Town being the last port from which said bark sailed on her voyage to the Port of Pensacola, and that no quarantine had been established against Cape Town by defendant before said bark entered the Port of Pensacola, or during her stay in said port, and that no contagious, infectious or pestilential disease existed upon said bark during her said voyage from Cape Town, nor within thirty days before her arrival at the Port of Pensacola, nor at the time of or after her coming into said port. Further, that upon entering said Bay of Pensacola said bark, without any inspection or examination of said vessel, her crew, or cargo by any health inspector or physician of said port, was compelled to proceed directly to the quarantine station of defendant, and thereby to deviate six miles from the course of vessels not subject to quarantine. That defendant proceeded against said bark solely and exclusively under the said proclamation dated 23d day of May, 1888, and did retain said bark twelve days, to her damage $78.94 per day; and did also compel said bark to undergo fumigation at a cost of $46.20, and with her own crew and appliances to discharge her ballast at said quarantine station, and pay the sum of $112 therefor, rating the same at thirty-five cents per ton for ballast discharged; and that plaintiff was compelled to pay said ballast and fumigation charges under pain of seizure of his vessel, and also of being prevented from taking said bark from said station to the loading grounds in the Port of Pensacola. All the allegations of the declaration that are well pleaded are admitted by the demurrer.

Admitting the allegations of this declaration to be true, the defendant had no authority to impose any fees on the Tiber for fumigation or unloading ballast. She was not subject to quarantine, as provided by statute; and the authority given defendant to act in matters of public health, and to make rules and regulations in reference thereto, did not extend to the right to collect such fees. When a quarantine has been established, and a vessel entering port is ascertained, by inspection, to be subject to perform quarantine, she may, in the opinion of the port physician, be required to undergo fumigation or disinfection, and in this event shall pay therefor such fees as may be prescribed by the board of health. The statute authorizes fees for inspection; and when a vessel is subject to quarantine, and in quarantine, she may be taxed by the board of health with the fees for fumigation or disinfection, and beyond these charges the county boards of health have no power to go in exacting money from vessels. In the case of Ferrari v. Escambia County Board of Health, supra, a regulation of said board, providing that "vessels in quarantine may be discharged at the crib therein by paying fifty cents per ton for so discharging," was sustained by a majority of the court. Judge Maxwell, in speaking for the majority of the court, said, in reference to this regulation: "That is legitimate, if such discharge is for the purpose of disinfecting the vessel; but not otherwise." He was speaking of a vessel subject to quarantine and in quarantine. The Statute authorizes fees only for inspection, fumigation, or disinfection, and if in disinfecting a vessel in quarantine the board of health would have to discharge her ballast in order to accomplish this object, the cost of the same might be included in the disinfecting fees; but we see no authority in the statute authorizing county boards of health to establish a place where vessels with their own crew and appliances shall discharge ballast, and impose charges on such vessels for so doing. The regulation under which appellant avers his vessel was detained and forced to pay fees requires vessels crossing the bar of Pensacola to proceed to the quarantine station to be inspected, and, if deemed necessary by the quarantine physician, to discharge ballast, and be submitted to a cleansing and disinfecting process. No fees or charges are mentioned in this regulation to be paid, nor is the location of the quarantine grounds, where vessels shall go on entering the bar for inspection, fixed. The declaration avers that defendant did compel the Tiber without an inspection to go six miles deviation out of her course to a quarantine station, and did compel her to pay for fumigation, and to pay for discharging her ballast with her own crew and appliances at said station. In Ex parte O'Donovan, supra, a regulation of the board of health that a vessel shall be detained until not only the inspection has been made, but also until the report and release of the vessel, was held unauthorized by the Statute. The Statute provides (Act 1879, chap. 3162, § 6) that the port inspector shall "board every boat or vessel approaching such city or town, and to ascertain if the said boat or vessel is subject to perform quarantine; . . . and, if such boat or vessel is subject to perform quarantine as aforesaid, the inspector so boarding said boat or vessel shall order the same, together with all persons and goods, thrown into quarantine at the place designated by the board." The declaration avers that plaintiff's vessel, without an inspection or examination, immediately upon entering the Port of Pensacola, was forced by defendant to go six miles out of her course to the quarantine station. Conceding this to be true, it was unauthorized by the Statute or any rules or regulations which defendant had authority to make. Our conclusion is that the detention of the Tiber, and the exaction from her of fees for fumigation and the discharge of her ballast by defendant in the manner and under the conditions alleged in the declaration, were without legal authority. This conclusion is based upon the statutory provisions in force on the subject at the time of the alleged cause of action.

Counsel for appellee further contends that, should the court find that the declaration presents a case in which the acts complained of were not authorized by the terms of the law, yet the board only committed an error of judgment, for which it cannot be held responsible in damages in an action in tort. It will be discovered upon an examination of the declaration that appellant's suit is not to recover back money illegally exacted, but the action is in tort, for illegally detaining the vessel, and compelling her to pay certain charges. Can the defendant, as a county board of health, be sued for damages in respect to the matters alleged in the declaration? The answer to this question, we admit, is not free from difficulty. The defendant is a body corporate, made so by statute, capable of suing and being sued, contracting and being contracted with and of acquiring and disposing of property, real and personal. A careful examination of the various statutory provisions in reference to the creation, duties, and powers of these corporate boards leaves no room to doubt that the functions conferred upon them are a part of the police power of the State, to be exercised exclusively for public purposes. The sole purpose of the Legislature in creating these corporate boards was to protect the inhabitants of the State from contagious or infectious disease, and to preserve the public health. Such powers and duties are of a public nature, and of the highest importance and value. Cooley, Torts, 382; Bryant v. St. Paul, 83 Minn. 359; Spring v. Hyde Park, 187 Mass. 554; Harrison v. Baltimore, 1 Gill, 264; Raymond v. Fish, 51 Conn. 80.

In determining the liability of public corporations a distinction has been drawn between the functions exercised by them as agencies of the State as a part of its governmental machinery for the public benefit and those denominated strictly corporate powers, conferred for the benefit and profit of the corporation. In the sphere of the former powers they are exempt from liability upon the theory that the corporation, to that extent, is performing a part of the functions of the state government, and the officers are public officers; but in the latter sphere they are held liable as private corporations for the acts of their agents. This distinction is recognized generally by the authorities, although its application in many of the adjudicated cases has not been free from confusion. Its application has been made most frequently in suits against municipal corporations. In the case of Hill v. Boston, 123 Mass. 844, which was a suit for damages for injuries received by a child at school by reason of a defective house, required by law to be furnished by the city, Judge Gray reviews the authorities on this subject. The conclusion reached in this well-considered case is "that a duty which is imposed upon an incorporated city, not by the terms of its charter, nor for the benefit of the corporation, pecuniary or otherwise, but upon the city as the representative and agent of the public, and for the public benefit, and by general law applicable to all cities and towns in the Commonwealth, is a duty owing to the public alone; and a breach thereof by a city is to be redressed by prosecution in behalf of the public, and will not support an action by an individual, even if he sustains special damage thereby." See also Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Walcott v. Swampscott, 1 Allen, 101; Buttrick v. Lowell, Id. 172; Richmond v. Long, 17 Gratt. 875; Hill v. Board of Aldermen, 72 N. C. 55; Bartholomew County Comrs. v. Wright, 22 Ind. 187; Hayes v. Oshkosh, 88 Wis. 314; Dargan v. Mobile, 31 Ala. 469; Murtaugh v. St. Louis, 44 Mo. 479; Condict v. Jersey City, 46 N. J. L. 157; Marmilian v. New York, 62 N. Y. 160; Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 778 et seq.

A public corporation, invested with powers for public purposes, may also have conferred upon it powers for private advantage and emolument. This has been held in many cases against municipal corporations. In Bailey v. New York, 8 Hill, 581, it is said in reference to these two powers blending in a public corporation: "But this distinction is quite clear and well-settled, and the process of separation practicable. To this end, regard should be had, not so much to the nature and character of the various powers conferred as to the object and purpose of the Legislature in conferring them. If granted for public purposes exclusively, they belong to the corporate body in its public, political character. But if the grant was for purposes of private advantage and emolument, though the public may derive a common benefit therefrom, the corporation, quoad hoc, is to be regarded as a private company."

The case of Jones v. New Haven, 34 Conn. 1, illustrates this distinction. The fact that these boards are created corporations with power to sue and be sued does not of itself authorize a suit against them for everything, but this must be taken to mean that such artificial bodies may be sued, like an individual, for all those matters and things for which they are legally liable. To determine the liability we must look to the principles of law applicable in such matters. Sussex County Board of Chosen Freeholders v. Strader, 18 N. J. L. 108; Finch v. Toledo Board of Education, 80 Ohio St. 87.

In the case of Ogg v. Lansing, 35 Iowa, 495, suit for damages was instituted against the city for the negligence of its officers or agents in executing sanitary regulations adopted to prevent the spread of small-pox. A statute of Iowa provided that the city council shall have power to establish a board of health, and to invest it with powers and duties necessary to secure the people of the city against contagious and malignant diseases. It was alleged in this case that the agents and employes of defendant requested and directed plaintiff to assist in taking a coffin, in which the corpse of a person who had died of small-pox was deposited, without giving him information of this fact, and without having cleansed the house in which the coffin was; and that plaintiff went to his home and soon thereafter had small-pox, and from him two of his children contracted the disease and died. On demurrer it was held that defendant was not liable.

In White v. Marshfield, 48 Vt. 20, suit was brought against the town for neglect and refusal of the selectmen to take care of and provide for plaintiff, as the Statute required, while he was infected with small-pox, by reason whereof the disease was communicated to the family of plaintiff, and three of his children died. The Statute provided that the selectmen of the town should perform certain duties to protect the inhabitants against infectious disease. On demurrer it was held that the action would not lie. In Richmond v. Long, 17 Gratt. 875, suit was instituted against the City of Richmond for the value of a slave, who, it was alleged, lost his life through the carelessness of the agents of the city. The declaration alleged that the slave was admitted into the hospital of the city to be cared for and treated for small-pox, in pursuance of the ordinance of the city, and that the city carelessly and negligently permitted him to escape from the hospital and go off at night whereby he lost his life. The ordinance of the city establishing the city hospital was adopted in pursuance of legislative authority for towns and counties in the State to provide against contagious disease. The liability of the city was denied in this case, and the judge who wrote the opinion said that if a recovery could be sustained he did not perceive why, by parity of reason, the State should not be held liable, through its public functionaries in civil actions at the suits of individuals, for losses or torts occurring in the management of its departments under its immediate control and supervision. In Maine a statute provided that the selectmen of any seaport town, when deemed necessary to protect the safety of the inhabitants thereof, may cause any vessel arriving there from any port or place to perform quarantine at such place and under such regulations as they may judge expedient; that said towns may select a health committee, or health officers, who may perform the duties and exercise the authority which selectmen may perform. Under the Statute the health authorities had no power to impress vessels coming into port, but could compel them to perform quarantine. One Mitchell sued the City of Rockland for damages sustained by him for the partial destruction of his vessel and her cargo by fire occasioned by the health officers of said city. This case was three times before the supreme court of that State, reported in 41 Me. 368, 45 Me. 496, and 53 Me. 118. In this case plaintiff's vessel came into port with a case of small-pox on board, and the health officers of the city took possession of the vessel, and it was claimed through their illegal and negligent acts the vessel caught on fire. It was decided finally in this case that neither a town nor its officers have any right to appropriate or interfere with private property except so far as that right is conferred by statute, and that health officers of the City of Rockland had no authority to take possession of plaintiff's vessel; also that neither the relation of master and servant nor principal and agent existed between a town and its health or police officers, nor is the town liable for their unlawful or negligent acts. Mitchell v. Rockland, 53 Me. 118.

The same doctrine was reaffirmed in that State in the case of Lynde v. Rockland, 66 Me. 309. Here the plaintiff alleged that his hotel in the city was taken possession of by the health officers of the city against his consent, and converted into a small-pox hospital for thirty days, thereby endangering the lives and health of plaintiff and his family, and destroyed the business, reputation, and character of the hotel for all time to come. It was decided in this case that no action can be maintained against a city or town for the unlawful acts of its health committee or other officers in taking possession of a house and using it for a small-pox hospital without the consent of the owner, and without legal authority. The action in this case was in tort. See also the case of Barbour v. Ellsworth, 87 Me. 294, sustaining the same doctrine. A case similar in its features is Spring v. Hyde Park, 137 Mass. 554. In this case the action was in assumption of contract, and it was held that under the Statute of Massachusetts, which provided how property could be impressed for use as a hospital, a board of health of a town, without pursuing the course pointed out by the Statute, has no authority to take possession of a dwelling house without the consent of the owner, and use the same as a hospital for a person found therein sick with a contagious disease, and the owner cannot maintain an action of contract against the city for the use and occupation of the house during the time it was so held by the board of health.

In the case of Aaron v. Broiles, 64 Tex. 816, it was held that the city council had the right, under legislative authority, to enact an ordinance providing for the removal from the city of persons afflicted with contagious disease, and that there was nothing judicial in the act removing persons under such an ordinance; but in doing so those to whom such a duty is given by the city must make every reasonable provision for the safety of the persons removed. The suit in this case, however, was not against the city or the board of health of the city, but the individuals who composed the Board of Health,—the mayor and marshal of the city. The plaintiff's case against the defendants was that they, acting under the ordinance of the city, took by force his child, four years old, sick at the time with small-pox, and its mother, and conveyed them to the country, in the rain and cold, at night, and failed to provide them any suitable place to stay, which caused the death of both of them. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to recover damages.

In the case of Southampton Bridge Co. v. Southampton Board of Health, 8 El. & Bl. 801, an action for damages was sustained against the defendant as a corporate body under allegations that "defendant, acting as such board of health, conducted itself so wrongfully, improperly, and negligently, and with want of due care in the construction, management, and direction of a certain sewer, that by means of the wrongful, improper, and negligent conduct of defendant as such board of health great quantities of filth and sewage matter were poured in and upon certain canals of which plaintiffs were proprietors." The Act incorporating the defendant as a local board of health authorized it to construct sewers. It was contended in this case that defendant could not, as a board of health, be held liable in an action for damages. Lord Campbell said that defendant's liability must be determined by a true interpretation of the Statute by which it was created. The decision against the defendant was placed upon the construction of the Statute. The Act creating the board of health provided that no action shall be maintained against the board unless previous notice thereof be given for one month, and that the defendant may tender amends, and plead such tender to the action. This language was held to give a right of action for damages against defendant.

Independent of the provision making county boards of health bodies corporate, with power to sue and be sued, there is nothing in the statutory provisions in reference to them giving the right of action in tort for damages, or indicating a purpose on the part of the Legislature to subject them to such suits. As we have already seen, the right alone to sue and be sued cannot be construed to give such remedy. These boards are created for public purposes in the exercise of the police power of the State, and they have no corporate interest in the execution of the powers given them. They cannot levy taxes, and under the Statute must invoke the taxing power of the county authorities for the means to defray their expenses. It is true, they can fix and collect fees for inspection, and, when vessels are subject to quarantine and in quarantine, can collect fees for fumigation when deemed necessary; but it is evident that such exactions were intended to meet the reasonable expenses in such matters.

In the case of Finch v. Toledo Board of Education, 30 Ohio St. 37, the liability of defendant in tort as a corporate body arose. The board of education of Toledo was a corporation, with power to sue and be sued, and derived its means of support from taxation by the City of Toledo and a portion of the public school fund. The suit was for damages for negligently digging wells or openings near school buildings, into one of which a child at school fell and was hurt. Judge Ashburn said, in delivering the opinion: "We have wholly failed to find any provision of the School Law, general or special, creating or implying the liability of defendant in this class of cases. No possible means appears in the School Laws by which defendant, if liable for a tort, could provide a fund out of which to satisfy a judgment against it." It was held in this case that, while defendant was a corporation with power to sue and be sued, yet it was a corporation for public purposes, and the nature, duties, and powers conferred upon it was a sufficient reason why it was not liable to be sued in tort. See also McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 482; Benton v. Boston City Hospital Trustees, 140 Mass. 18; Summers v. Daviess County Comrs. 108 Ind. 262, 1 West. Rep. 217; Sherbourne v. Yuba County, 21 Cal. 118; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 266.

There are cases of recovery in actions of tort against municipal corporations, but they proceed upon the ground that where the corporation acts in the exercise of powers or performance of duties not discretionary, governmental, or public in their nature; but ministerial, and for some corporate benefit, it incurs the common-law liability for its acts as an individual. Bailey v. New York, supra; Gibbs v. Liverpool Dock Trustees, 3 Hurlst. & N. 164; Jones v. New Haven, supra.

In the case before us the plaintiff avers that solely and exclusively under the proclamation of the board of health, and which is set out in the declaration, plaintiff's vessel was compelled to go to quarantine station, and discharge ballast, and pay fees. It is not charged that defendant acted maliciously or willfully, or otherwise, for aught that appears in the declaration, than in the discharge of a supposed public duty. An examination of the authorities and the principles governing such cases leads us to the conclusion that defendant was invested with public functions, and the duties it owed were to the public, and as such it comes within the sphere of public functionaries, exempt from liability in tort, unless such remedy has been provided by statute. As we have seen, no such remedy has been provided by statute, and the declaration shows that plaintiff is pursuing this course.

The judgment of the court below sustaining the demurrer is affirmed.

Michael SULLIVAN

v.

Edmund HALL, Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Absence of evidence to support a

NOTE.—Venue and jurat should appear in the affidavit.

The venue is an essential part of every affidavit. It is prima facie evidence of the place where it was taken. Belden v. Devoe, 12 Wend. 223, note; Manufacturers & M. Bank v. Cowden, 3 Hill, 461; Lane v. Morse, 6 How. Pr. 394.

A venue is essential to an affidavit but it may be supplied by amendment. Clement v. Foreback, 1 City Ct. Rep. 57.

Omission of venue in landlord's affidavit in summary proceedings is fatal. People v. De Camp, 12 Hun, 378.

When the landlord's affidavit omitted the venue, and it did not appear where it was, sworn to nor where the justice of the peace who appears to have taken it resides, it was held a fatal error. Cook v. Staats, 18 Barb. 407; Lane v. Morse, supra.

Jurisdiction frequently depended on the affidavit, and if it is lacking in an essential requisite all subsequent proceedings founded upon it are void unless the defect is waived. Where there is no appearance before the justice there can be no waiver of defects. People v. De Camp, supra.

The jurat, when the deposition is taken by a notary, acting out of his home county, should have attached to it the name of the county for which the notary was appointed and in which he resides, and 13 L. R. A.

justice's judgment cannot be presumed where no attempt to return the evidence was made but the return states that the judgment was rendered after listening to the testimony and after due deliberation.

2. The appearance as attorney in proceedings to enforce a logger's lien, on also a statement that his certificate is filed in the county in which the venue is laid and the act performed, though an omission to make such designation will not render the verification void. Produce Bank v. Baldwin, 49 How. Pr. 277; Estate of King, 2 Civ. Proc. Rep. 71; Snyder's Notaries' Manual, p. 57.

The jurat should be in proper form and be subscribed by the officer before whom it is made. If the jurat be all right in the original it is immaterial as to the copy served. Barker v. Cook, 40 Barb. 254; Livingston v. Cheetham, 2 Johns. 479; Union Furnace Co. v. Shepherd, 2 Hill, 414.

The case of Graham v. McCoun, 5 How. Pr. 353, seems to hold the contrary. Wait, Pr. p. 580.

Under the former practice before the adoption of the Code the New York court of errors held in Livingston v. Cheetham, supra, that the omission of the jurat and signature of the party to a copy of an affidavit on which a motion was made formed no objection to the service. The rule has been followed in similar cases since. Graham v. McCoun, supra.

A clerical omission on the part of the prothonotary to put his signature to the jurat, after swearing the defendant, does not vitiate the affidavit, the defendant appearing personally in court and declaring his willingness to be sworn again. Maples v. Hicks, Brighly, 56; Endlich, Affidavits of Defense, § 840.

behalf of the claimant, of the notary public who administered the oath in support of the lien is not unlawful.

3. The omission of venue from a notary public's jurat does not render it invalid where he is a state officer the record of whose appointment is required to be kept in the office of the secretary of state.

(May 8, 1891.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Clare County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce a logger's lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. W. Perry and Henry A. Chaney, for appellant:

The statement of lien in this case is a nullity; the law requires it to be sworn to (Act 1887, No. 229, § 2), and this involves an affidavit.

An affidavit is an oath in writing, sworn before, and attested by, him who has authority to administer the same.

1 Bacon, Abr. 64.

The jurat of affidavits should state when, where, and before whom they are sworn.

1 Tidd, Pr. 494.

The authority to administer the oath, and the fact that the oath was taken before the officer having such authority, are indispensable to a good affidavit. It is not enough that these conditions exist in fact, but they must appear affirmatively, though whether they appear from the venue, the body of the affidavit, the jurat, or the signature thereto, is immaterial.

Smart v. Love, 3 Mich. 590; Cross v. People, 10 Mich. 24; Re Teachout, 15 Mich. 846; Grisfian v. Forrest, 49 Mich. 811.

The party for whose information the lien is filed, and whose rights are put in jeopardy by it, ought surely to be able to see, by an inspection of the paper, where to look for the authority by which it was certified. Admitting that Wickham, as a notary for any county in Michigan, could act in any other, it would be intolerable that he whose interests are imperiled should have to search the records for every county in the State to settle the question of his authority.

A notary, in Michigan, is an inferior officer deriving all the power he has from positive statute.

How. Stat. (Mich.) § 631.

The jurisdiction of such an officer should appear affirmatively.

Id. § 632.

The mere signing of one's name cannot be the official signature contemplated. The authority to sign must be disclosed. The entry of a justice's judgment must be signed officially.

Howard v. People, 3 Mich. 207; Hollister v. Giddings, 24 Mich. 501.

So must the transcript of it.

Bigelow v. Booth, 39 Mich. 622.

Where an affidavit is made for an appeal from before a justice if taken before anyone but the justice himself, an official signature to the jurat is necessary.

People v. Simondson, 25 Mich. 118.

The certificate of acknowledgment to any sort of deed must be signed (Ryerson v. Eldred, 18 Mich. 12; Marston v. Bradshaw, 18 Mich. 81) and signed officially.

Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218; Wright v. 18 L. R. A.

Wilson, 17 Mich. 192. See also People v. Murphy, 56 Mich. 546; First Nat. Bank v. St. Joseph, 46 Mich. 526.

It is no idle form or mere technicality for which we contend, but such a general rule as will give certainty to official papers and reasonable security to all whose rights may be involved therein.

To say nothing of the affidavit's having no venue (Persinger v. Jubb, 52 Mich. 304); it is not even entitled.

Graham v. Elmore, Harr. Ch. 265; Whipple v. Williams, 11 Mich. 115; Arnold v. Nye, 11 Mich. 456.

And, what is also fatal, it is sworn to before a person who had no right to administer the oath.

Greenoault v. Farmers & M. Bank, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 498.

Because, as the record shows, he was the claimant's attorney; and an attorney cannot swear his own client.

Mr. W. A. Burritt for appellee.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by attachment in Justice Court under Act No. 229, Laws 1887, to enforce a lien upon certain logs of the defendant. On the trial plaintiff had judgment for $16 and costs of suit, and for a lien upon the logs. The cause was removed by certiorari to the Circuit Court for Clare County, where the judgment was affirmed. The cause comes to this court by writ of error. The errors complained of are set forth in the affidavit for the writ of certiorari to the justice, and are: "(1) that the notice of the lien was not properly sworn to as required by the Act; (2) because no testimony was given on the trial tending to prove any agreement with defendant or any authorized agent of his, or any contractor under defendant, with plaintiff that he should do any work on said logs, and no proof that defendant or any agent of his or contractor under him knew that plaintiff was doing work on said logs; (3) because no testimony was offered of any contract with defendant or his agent for any specific wages, and no proof of how much his labor was worth; (4) because said justice gave judgment in said cause for an attorney fee of five dollars; (5) because the person who claimed to be the attorney for plaintiff, and was so recognized by said justice, undertook to administer the oath to plaintiff of the notice claiming lien against the property attached; (6) because the evidence given at the hearing of said cause did not warrant any of the findings or judgment of the court; (7) because no evidence was given tending to prove the property mentioned in said writ of attachment and in plaintiff's declaration are the same." There is no force in the objections made that there was no evidence tending to show the plaintiff's claim. The evidence was not reduced to writing, and is not returned. The justice, in his return, states that the plaintiff was sworn in his own behalf, and, after listening to the testimony, and after due deliberation, he gave judgment for the plaintiff. Under these circumstances we cannot presume that there was no evidence tending to support the judgment. The writ of attachment contains a description of the property attached, and the declaration contained the same description, and there is therefore no force in the seventh assignment of error. It is not shown that the notary public who administered the oath to the plaintiff on the statement of claim of lien was the attorney for the plaintiff at that time. The lien was sworn to and filed in the office of the county clerk, as provided by statute. The notary public who administered the oath thereto afterwards appeared in justice court as attorney for the plaintiff. This is not in violation of section 637, How. Stat., and does not fall within the ruling of cases cited by defendant's counsel. The fourth assignment of error is not noticed in the brief of counsel, and will be treated as abandoned. The only remaining assignment of error is the first, which relates to the notice of lien. No objection is made to the statement except that the same does not show in what county the oath was administered. The claim of the lien is in the following form: "The statement of lien made under oath of Michael Sullivan in manufacturing, cutting, skidding, the following described property, to wit: One million feet of white pine, Norway pine, and hemlock saw-logs, marked as follows: [C] That the last day's work of said labor [C] was done on the 8th day of February, 1889, and said labor was performed in the County of Clare; and that said described property, or a portion of the same, is now situated in the County of Clare, State of Michigan; and that there is now due claimant for said work and labor over and above all legal set-offs the sum of $16, as near as may be, for which said sum a lien is claimed upon said described property. Michael Sullivan. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 9th day of February, 1889. Henry K. Wickham, Notary Public."

The statement of lien has no caption showing the county or State in which it was made. It follows the form laid down in the Statute, but, inasmuch as the notary public does not state in the jurat the county in which he acts as such officer, it is contended that no valid lien was filed authorizing the bringing the writ of attachment under this Statute. Section 682, How. Stat., provides that his certificate, when under his hand and seal, shall be presumptive evidence of the facts contained in it, except in certain specified cases. His right to that office comes from an appointment by the governor of this State, and his compliance with the requirements of the Statute in filing oath of office, bond, etc. Act No. 117, Pub. Acts 1887. By this same Statute the county clerk of the county in which the oath of office and bond is filed is required to transmit the name of such person to the state treasurer and secretary of state.

Thus it is that the fact whether one is a notary public may always be ascertained in the office of the state treasurer and secretary of state, as well as in the office of the county clerk in the county for which the appointment is made. Therefore the objection that the statement of lien contains no venue, and the party whose property is thus incumbered has no means of ascertaining whether the person who acts as notary public is such in fact, has no force. It is not true, as claimed, that the party who desires to ascertain the fact must go from one county clerk's office to another to get the desired information. An inquiry at the office of the secretary of state would at once show the fact, as it is a matter of record there. A notary public is in no sense a county officer. "The governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, may appoint one or more persons notaries public in each county, who shall hold their office," etc. Act No. 117, Pub. Acts 1887. While it is very proper that a notary public should sign himself as a notary public in and for the county from which he is appointed, yet his certificate would not be fatally defective if the designation of the county is omitted. He may act in any part of the State, and his official acts are not confined to the county where he resides. It is true that under the Amendatory Act of 1889 (Act 74, Pub. Acts 1889) no person is eligible to the office of notary public unless the person is a resident of the county of which he or she desires to be appointed, yet their official acts are not necessarily confined to that county. The office would undoubtedly become vacant by removal from that county, but it does not follow that for this reason the party is a county officer. The appointment has always been regarded as one of state matter, rather than that of county. It is a state appointment, and the omission of the venue would not be a fatal defect in the jurat. It cannot matter to the party to be affected by such certificate from what particular county the notary public was appointed. In legal phraseology "venue" means the county where a cause is to be tried, and originally a venue was employed to indicate the county from which the jury was to come. The necessity of stating a venue at all is reluctantly confessed by the authorities. Bean v. Ayers, 67 Me. 487; Briggs v. Nantucket Bank, 5 Mass. 95. In process or pleading, the objection under the strict rules of the common law, and perhaps under our Statute, to the want of venue might be taken advantage of by demurrer. It may also be true that a certificate made by a justice of the peace would be void if it omitted the venue, were no venue stated at all in the instrument. But the question here involved is not to be governed by the reasons which would be applicable in such cases. Claim is also made by appellant in his brief that the Act under which the lien is claimed is unconstitutional and void. That question was settled by this court in Cradock v. Dwight (filed at the present term of this court), and the cases there cited.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

The other Justices concurred.

v.

BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

(....Mass.....)

1. The rights of persons submitting bids for the erection of a building cannot be determined by the printed "notice to bidders" where it appears that the terms of the contract were orally fixed at a conference between the bidders and the persons requesting the bids, that the terms so fixed were not incorporated into the printed notice, and that both parties rested upon what was said and done at the conference.
2. A majority of a committee appointed by a corporation to contract for the erection of a building may, in the absence of the other members, lawfully act in letting the contract.
3. Silent acquiescence by directors of a corporation in acts of its building committee in procuring bids and letting the contract for the building with full knowledge of such acts will make the contract binding on the corporation, although the committee had in fact no authority to make it.
4. That acts of a committee were known and assented to by those who appointed it may be inferred from circumstances.

(September 2, 1891.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Holmes, J.) for the opinion of the full court of an action brought to recover damages for the breach by defendant of an alleged agreement to award the contract for erecting defendant's building to plaintiff in which a verdict had been directed in favor of defendant. Judgment for plaintiff.

The following questions were submitted to the jury:

First. "Did the committee on building purport to make a contract on behalf of the defendants by which they agreed to accept the lowest bid in case the building was built substantially in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted, without reserving the right to reject bids in that case?"

Answer. "Yes."

Second. "If such contract was made was it approved by the directors?"

Answer. "Yes."

Third. "If such contract was made, was it within the ostensible authority of the committee?"

Answer. "Yes."

Fourth. "Was the building as finally contracted for, a building substantially in accordance with the said plans and specifications?"

Answer. "Yes."

Fifth. "If the plaintiff is entitled to recover, what are his damages?"

Answer. "$14,500."

The further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert M. Morse, Jr., and Charles E. Hellier, for plaintiff:

Even if the plaintiff had incorporated the notice to bidders into the written offer made and signed by him, it would have been competent for the plaintiff to show a subsequent parol agreement modifying and controlling it.

S. 871, 33 L. ed. 157; Saveland v. Green, 40 Wis. 431; Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469.

Defendants actually held forth the committee as having "full powers and authority to procure plans and specifications for a building, and make the contracts for the erection and completion of the same," and the qualification upon their authority "subject to the approval of the directors," may fairly be understood as meaning "subject to the control of the directors."

Mr. Richard Stone, for defendant:

Plaintiff merely promised that he would submit a bid. That was not an acceptance of the offer. An offer to give a contract to the lowest bidder is not accepted by promising to submit a bid. An offer can only be accepted in the terms in which it is made. An acceptance, therefore, which modifies the offer in any particular, will go for nothing.

A party incurs no responsibility by a mere proposition that is not accepted.

It was clearly the intention of both parties that the whole of the contract should be in writing.

NOTE.—See note to Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb, ante, 383.

The circumstance that the parties intend a subsequent agreement to be made is strong evidence to show that they do not intend the previous negotiations to amount to an agreement.

The contract which the plaintiff alleges was made by the building committee was never approved by the directors as required by the vote of the stockholders under which the committee were appointed, and from which they derived their authority.

The approval required by the vote is the approval of the directors as a board.

This has been said to mean that it should be the vote of a majority of a quorum at a regular and legal meeting of the board.

1 Morse, Banks & Banking, 8d ed. § 124.

The assent of a majority of the directors, expressed by them individually, and not at a regular meeting of the board, is not sufficient to confer upon the cashier authority to do any act which he would not have authority to do unless it was conferred upon him by the directors.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was sufficient evidence to warrant the finding that the members of the committee on building, who were present at the conference of March 15, purported to make a contract on behalf of the defendants, by which they agreed to accept the lowest bid, in case the building was built substantially in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted, without reserving the right to reject bids in that case. The presiding justice, in his charge to the jury, called attention to the distinct difference in the testimony introduced on the one side and on the other. Five different buildings had been selected by the architects and the building committee of the defendants, to whom written notices had been sent, requesting bids for the defendant's proposed new building. To each of these a copy of the specifications was afterwards delivered, to which was attached a "notice to bidders," containing the terms of the bidding. After an examination of these documents, four of the selected builders declined to submit bids. A conference was thereupon invited and had, between the builders and the building committee, at which there was a full discussion, and certain changes from the terms of the "notice to bidders," and from the specifications, were agreed upon; and the builders agreed to submit bids. In respect to one particular, which has become material, the testimony is somewhat at variance as to what was the result of this conference. The "notice to bidders" contained the two following provisions: "The work to be let to the lowest and best bidder upon his executing to the Boston Chamber of Commerce a good and sufficient bond," etc. "The building committee of the Chamber of Commerce reserves the right to reject any and all bids." These provisions were the subject of discussion at the conference. All the witnesses agree that the words "and best" were to be struck out of the first clause. The plaintiff contends that the last clause was modified by an agreement that in case the building should be erected substantially in accordance with the plans and specifications then submitted, the contract should be given to the lowest bidder among the five selected builders. The defendant contends that the committee only agreed to give the contract to the lowest bidder among the builders, if any of their bids under the competition should be accepted; but that they did not surrender the right to reject all of the bids and open a new competition. The plaintiff offered testimony tending to support his view, which was met by testimony offered by the defendant tending to support the contrary view. This testimony was all submitted to the jury, under instructions to which no exception was taken; and their verdict sustained the view contended for by the plaintiff.

There can be no doubt that it was competent in law for the parties by an oral agreement to vary the terms of the "notice to bidders." This would be so even if that notice had expressed the terms of a concluded contract. Burtlett v. Stanchfield, 143 Mass. 394, 2 L. R. A. 625. But it was only a proposal which was never accepted as it originally stood; and it is not contended that there was anything in the nature of it to make it legally impossible for the final contract between the parties to be expressed and represented partly by the writing and partly by additions or changes orally agreed to.

The defendant, however, contends that an examination of the evidence shows clearly that both parties to the conference understood that the terms on which bids should be invited were to be expressed in writing, and that they were then and there undertaking to do no more than to settle the terms in which a future invitation should be expressed; so that the notice to bidders, subsequently sent, must be taken to embody all the terms upon which the bids were to be made. This proposition is controverted by the plaintiff, and it does not seem to us that it can be said to be clearly established. No witness testified that there was to be a new written or printed notice embodying the new terms, which had been settled upon. No one of the builders testified that he accepted the new notice as having the effect contended for by the defendant. On the other hand, the plaintiff testified that he did not think he read it, but did not remember. The specifications attracted his chief attention. Mr. Woodbury testified that he did not remember whether there was any change in the notice to bidders. The several bidders apparently proceeded with their estimates without waiting for any new statement of terms, and when it came, no one of them appears to have treated it as embodying all the terms of a new proposal for bids. Indeed it plainly did not do so. One of the terms upon which there was no dispute was that the bids should be opened in the presence of all the bidders. There was a reason for insisting on this stipulation. The original notice to bidders provided for a delivery of the bids signed and sealed to the architect; but there was a distrust of the fairness of the architects. Mr. Lothrop, in his letter of March 12, declining to submit a bid under that notice, mentioned as one objection that the proposals should be opened in the presence of the bidders. At the conference this letter was read, and this stipulation, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, and of Mr. Lothrop, was expressly agreed to, and no witness said anything to the contrary. All agreed that the letter was read and its objections commented on, one by one. Nor does it appear that the terms of the new notice were fixed by the committee. The plaintiff asserts that it was prepared by one of the architects, who was not present at the conference. So far as it appears, the jury might properly find that both the committee and the builders rested upon what had been said and done at the conference.

The defendant further contends that the building committee were joint agents of the defendant, and that the four members who were present at the conference of March 15 could not execute the power which was delegated to the whole committee consisting of five members, jointly. It does not clearly appear that this was taken at the trial and it is not noticed in the charge of the presiding judge; but we have considered it. Where special agents are appointed to act jointly in the execution of a particular power, it has often been held that the action of all is necessary, in order to execute the power properly. This rule, however, is subject to many qualifications or exceptions. It is well understood that public agents may usually act by a majority. So also it has been settled that a majority of the directors of a corporation constitute a quorum, and a majority of the quorum may act. Sargent v. Webster, 13 Met. 497, 504; Edgerly v. Emerson, 23 N. H. 555; Wells v. Railway White Rubber Co. 19 N. J. Eq. 402. Generally speaking, a committee of a corporation is subject to the same rules as the directors. State v. Jersey City, 27 N. J. L. 493; Junkins v. Doughty Falls U. School Dist. 39 Me. 220. It would be very inconvenient in practice if a committee of this character, whose duties involve many acts in carrying out the general purpose of their appointment, could do nothing if a single member should be absent. There is sufficient precedent for holding that a majority may act, and such is the better rule. Kupfer v. Augusta South Parish, 12 18 L. R. A.

Mass. 185; Damon v. Granby, 2 Pick. 345; Hayward v. Pilgrim Soc. 21 Pick. 275, 277; Haven v. Lowell, 5 Met. 35, 42; Weymouth & B. Fire Dist. v. Norfolk County Comrs. 108 Mass. 142.

Moreover, there was evidence from which the jury might infer the assent of Mr. Speare, the absent member of the committee, to what was done by his associates. He went away temporarily, to New Orleans, leaving the business in their hands. But on his return it expressly appears that he had a conference with them, or with some of them, and that they undertook to tell him what had been done. He denies, to be sure, that what they told him was in accordance with what the plaintiff contends and what the jury have found to be the fact. The significant fact, however, that they undertook to tell him the result of the conference in respect to the right of the committee to reject any and all bids is testified to by Mr. Speare. He says: "They told me they had expressly reserved that" if, in point of fact, the reservation of this right was accomplished with the qualification that they would accept the lowest bid in case they should build substantially in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted, the jury might think it a natural inference that at that time, before any controversy had arisen as to accepting the plaintiff's bid, Mr. Speare's associates told him all that had been agreed to on this head, though Mr. Speare had forgotten a part of it at the time of testifying. Mr. Lothrop's testimony tends to support such an inference. He said: "Before the meeting I stated to Mr. Blaney and Mr. Speare that in my opinion the right to reject any and all bids passed (ceased?) after they had selected five from the many mechanics who had been recommended; and I was assured by them that if any one of these parties whom they had selected, and whom they supposed to be responsible, should be the lowest bidder, his bid would be accepted, and it was on that condition that I estimated, and I should not have figured on any other." He further testified that in a private conversation, perhaps a different one before that meeting, Mr. Speare said he would not consent to give up the right to reject all bids. It is further to be observed that the chief reason assigned by the members of the committee who were present at the conference, why they did not wish to give up the right to reject any and all bids, was that they were not willing to be bound absolutely; that the cost of the building might be too much for their means, so that a substantial change of plan might be necessary, or possibly the erection of the building given up entirely; that the lowest bid might be entirely above the views of the committee, so that they were unwilling to accept it unconditionally. Mr. Speare himself testified that he gave to Mr. Lothrop two reasons why the committee would not give up the right to reject all bids. The first was, that the lowest bid might be a sum which the directors would not think advisable to spend to erect a building. The second was, that it was the directors who would be the final arbitrators whether the committee should award the contract, and therefore the committee would have no right to give up the right to reject any and all bids. Mr. Lothrop, on the other hand, testified very explicitly and in detail, that while Mr. Speare in conversation had mentioned the names of the committee to him, he (Mr. Lothrop), did not know then, nor at the time of testifying, whether the action of the committee must be approved by any other board or body. Looking at all the testimony, if the objection now urged had been distinctly presented as a question of fact at the trial, it must have been left to the jury to determine whether Mr. Speare assented to the terms of the contract, by which (as found by the jury) his four associates purported to agree to accept the lowest bidder, in case the building should be built substantially in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted. Their finding that the contract was approved by the directors must have involved the finding that it was approved by Mr. Speare. And this finding might well be reached without implying any intentional misstatement on his part.

The remaining questions are, whether there was sufficient evidence to warrant the second and third findings, or either of them, that such contract, if made by the committee, was approved by the directors, and was within the ostensible authority of the committee. If either of these was supported by the evidence, it is enough for the plaintiff's purposes, and most, if not all, of the evidence relating to the second finding bears also upon the third. The plaintiff contends that it was within the ostensible authority of the committee to fix the terms upon which it would receive bids, and to make the agreement which is embodied in the first finding of the jury, without any reference to an approval by the directors. He urges that this was within the ordinary province of a building committee; and that, in this instance, the directors knew that there was to be a competition for bids, that this competition was to be limited to five selected builders, and that the committee would fix the terms of it; that the directors were well aware that the committee were going on to attend to all these matters, that a vote had already been passed by the directors authorizing the committee to make leases in the new building, that they also knew that the architects had been selected, that the plans were hanging up in the office, that the erection of the new building was the most important subject which the board of directors or the Chamber of Commerce had under consideration during this period; that it was a subject of constant talk; that no director ever objected to the committee's undertaking to fix the terms of the competition among the builders, or questioned its powers to do so, till after a letter from the plaintiff's attorney threatening an action at law. There was testimony in support of these various propositions. So far as appears, no one of the bidders doubted the power of the committee to act in the matter. The committee assumed to make changes in the terms of the competition at its own will. There is nothing to show any suggestion to any of the bidders in respect to the need of consulting the directors, except in Mr. Speare's testimony already referred to, of his conversation with Mr. Lothrop. The notice to bidders held out the building committee as having the power to act in the premises. No mention of the directors was made in it. The board of directors had regular monthly meetings. Mr. Speare was president of the board, and was upon the building committee. He testified: "It was known to the directors, in a general way, that specifications, notice to bidders, and other details preliminary to obtaining bids and making the contract were being attended to by the committee and the architects." "Was it not the understanding of the directors that there was to be a competition? Yes, sir. How was that known to them? Simply in a general way; I presume at a meeting of the directors I told them." He added, later, that the board of directors knew that the committee was trying to get bids and that no effort was made to inform bidders that they could not safely deal with the committee. According to the strict letter of the original vote, the committee could not even procure plans and specifications, except subject to the approval of the directors. It was allowed, however, not only to procure plans and specifications, but to employ the architects, without formally consulting the directors.

Without dwelling further upon the details of evidence, the jury might properly find that the committee itself believed that it was authorized to go on as it did without consulting the directors as to the details, and that the directors were aware in a general way of what the committee was doing. It seems to us that the jury, as a result of the whole testimony, might properly come to the conclusion that the contract was within the ostensible authority of the committee, and that the bidders had a right to assume that the defendant would be bound by the contract of the committee as to the terms of the bidding.

The doctrine as to the ostensible authority is thus stated in Bronson v. Chappell, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 681, 683, 20 L. ed. 436: "Where one without objection suffers another to do acts which proceed upon the ground of authority from him, or by his conduct adopts and sanctions such acts after they are done, he will be bound, although no previous authority exists, in all respects as if the requisite power had been given in the most formal manner." Circumstances may warrant an inference that acts of a committee openly done and extending over a considerable period of time were known and assented to by those who appointed the committee. The directors represented the corporation, and if the directors knew, and by silence acquiesced in the acts of the committee, that is enough. The vote of the stockholders would show what in the first instance was the actual authority of the committee, but the course of the directors might be considered in determining its ostensible authority. A secret or unknown limitation of authority imposed by the stockholders would not control an apparent authority from the directors, since the business was within the scope of the general authority of directors. This was clearly left to the jury by the presiding judge in terms to which the defendant did not except, and which appear to be unexceptionable. The decisions cited by the plaintiff afford various illustrations of the application of the rule of law as to apparent authority in an agent. The rule itself is not open to doubt. Fay v. Noble, 12 Cush. 1, 17, 18; Lester v. Webb, 1 Allen, 84; Ayer v. R. W. Bell Mfg. Co. 147 Mass. 46, 6 New Eng. Rep. 329; Southern L. Ins. Co. v. McCain, 96 U. S. 84, 24 L. ed. 653; Mahoney Min. Co. v. Anglo-Californian Bank, 104 U. S. 192, 26

L. ed. 707. See also Case v. Citizens Bank of Louisiana, 100 U. S. 446, 454, 25 L. ed. 695, 698.

The defendant does not now insist that the evidence did not warrant the fourth finding of the jury.

The result is, that there should be—

Judgment for the plaintiff on the finding.

DELAWARE CHANCERY COURT.

William G. BRYAN et al.

v.

Rebecca P. MILBY.

(6 Del. Ch.)

No obligatory trust is created by a will giving all of testator's estate to his wife with a request that if she does not require the whole of it as a support, she will, at her death, will the remainder to certain other persons named.

BILL filed in Kent County by the children of Charles A. Bryan to establish a trust in certain money alleged to have been loaned to defendant by Mary R. Bryan, deceased, and to recover such money for the benefit of complainants, the alleged cestuis que trustent. Bill dismissed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. J. Alexander Fulton, for complainants:

Precatory words in a will create a trust. But the objects of the bounty must be sufficiently described, and the property sufficiently defined.

2 Bouv. L. Dict. 364.

Words of recommendation, request, entreaty, wish or expectation, addressed to a devisee or legatee, make him a trustee for the person or persons in whose favor such expressions are used, provided the testator has pointed out, with sufficient certainty and clearness, both the subject matter and the object or objects of the intended trust.

NOTE.—Will—Precatory words, effect of.

Where a testator devises property absolutely and recommends devisee at his death to leave it in trust to certain of his descendants, and if there be none such then living then to a certain college, no trust is created in favor of the college. Re Whitcomb's Estate, 86 Cal. 265.

Where property is given absolutely and without restriction, a trust is not to be lightly imposed upon mere words of recommendation and confidence. Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 314, 32 L. ed. 144; Hees v. Singler, 114 Mass. 59.

A clause in a will declaring that testator "desires" that a certain disposition should be made of all that remains on his wife's death of the real and personal property given her by previous clauses of the will is merely precatory, and will not prevent her from taking the fee-simple title of the land and the absolute property in the subject of the bequest. Bills v. Bills, 8 L. R. A. 606, 80 Iowa, 269.

Precatory words expressive of desire, recommendation, and confidence are not sufficient to convert a devise or bequest into a trust. Hopkins v. Glunt, 2 Cent. Rep. 64, 111 Pa. 287.

After an unqualified devise by a testator of his property, no precatory words addressed to his devisee can defeat the estate previously granted. Ibid.

Where a testator devised real estate to his widow in fee simple, the words: "I only make this request of her, and only as a request, . . . viz., that in the event she should marry again she will see that the interests of our children in said property are protected,"—the widow takes an absolute estate in the land, and does not hold it in trust for herself and children. Sale v. Thornberry, 86 Ky. 266.

Provision giving the whole estate to certain persons, "assuming that they will not fail to do for another son as their fraternal regard may require," does not create a trust and is not an incumbrance on real estate. Rose v. Porter, 1 New Eng. Rep. 750, 141 Mass. 309.

When create a trust.

Precatory words are frequently sufficient to create a trust by implication. Jones v. Jones, 18 West. Rep. 527, 124 Ill. 254.

They will be held to import a trust when they are so used as to exclude all option or discretion in the party who is to act, when the subject is uncertain. Maught v. Getzendanner, 3 Cent. Rep. 866, 65 Md. 527.

Words of recommendation, request, entreaty, wish or expectation will impose a binding duty upon the devisee, by way of trust, provided the testator has pointed out with clearness and certainty both the subject matter and the object of the trust. Noe v. Kern, 12 West. Rep. 234, 93 Mo. 367.

The words "wish" and "desire" used as expressing a desire for an act to be done by some person named, may be held to be precatory; but when used to express the intention of the testator, they are mandatory. Taylor v. Martin (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 139.

Where the donee of property is "desired" or "requested" by the testator to dispose of that property in favor of others, those words are imperative and their use will create a trust. Riker v. Leo, 115 N. Y. 99. See 1 Wms. Exrs. 88; Vandyok v. Van Beuren, 1 Cal. 84.

In a will devising a farm to testator's son for his support, thereby indicating that a life estate is intended, and then declaring that if the son should have family the testator desires the estate to go to the use of his children, the word "desire" is mandatory. Oyster v. Knull, 137 Pa. 448.

If a testator should desire his wife, at or before her death, to give certain personal estate among such of his relatives as she should think most deserving and approve of, such request would be held to be a legacy among such relatives. Wheeler v. Lester, 1 Bradf. 238; McLachlan v. McLachlan, 9 Paige, 534, 4 L. ed. 805.

Precatory words in will. See notes to Slaterry v. Wason (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 398; Knox's App. (Pa.) 6 L. R. A. 353.

Trust created by. Ibid.

1 Jarman, Wills, 2d Am. ed. 1849, p. 332. Little & Brown's ed. 1881, p. 335. See also 2 Story, Eq. 2d ed. § 108.

It is plain from the will that the intent of the testator was to provide for the support of his widow during life, and that whatever remained at her death should go to the children of his brother Charles.

In the construction of wills the intention of the testator is the first object of inquiry, and when found it must be fully carried out, and control the disposition of the estate.

Precatory words, when used in a will, are imperative, and must be so regarded.

Where the object and the subject can be discovered from the will itself, or the will and surrounding circumstances, or where the court, by the exercise of its usual powers and functions, can ascertain the subject of the gift and the persons to be benefited, the trust shall not fail because of uncertainty.

Blackburn*, 104 Ill. 227; Bull v. Bull, 8 Conn. 48; Hall v. Otis, 71 Me. 326.

This is a Virginia case. The testator was domiciled there at the time of his death. The will was proved there. The estate was there. The rule in such cases is that the law of the testator's domicile shall direct the court of distribution.

Wms. Exrs. 366.

The rule above contended for is the one adopted and acted upon in Virginia.

Harrison v. Harrison, 2 Gratt. 1.

That the gift over was subject to accretion or diminution is immaterial.

Pierson v. Garnet, 2 Bro. Ch. 38; Horwood v. West, 1 Sim. & Stu. 387; Knight v. Knight, 3 Beav. 148.

Mr. Nathaniel B. Smithers, Sr., for defendant:

Wherever a bequest is made in terms importing an absolute gift, precatory words will never be construed as creating a trust, if either they ought not upon the whole will to be considered as imperative, or if the subject matter of the request be uncertain, or if the objects intended to be benefited be not clearly ascertained. If in any gift there is manifest an intention to give to the devisee a right or power to dispose of the property so given, and by using such right to leave more or less or nothing upon which such trust would operate, then such precatory words will never be construed as imperative.

This principle is found in Lewin on Trusts, 184; and Harding v. Glynn, 1 Atk. 469, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 4th Am. ed. 1079-1082, 1086, 1087, and it is sustained by the adjudicated cases.

Wynne v. Hawkins, 1 Bro. Ch. 179; Pierson v. Garnet, 2 Bro. Ch. 328; Sprange v. Barnard, 2 Bro. Ch. 585; Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. Jr. 383; Pushman v. Filliter, 3 Ves. Jr. 7; Heneage v. Andover, 10 Price, 230; Horwood v. West, 1 Sim. & Stu. 387; Knight v. Knight, 3

Beav. 171; Cowman v. Harrison, 10 Hare, 234; Parnall v. Parnall, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 96; Mussoorie Bank v. Raynor, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 321.

In the decisions of the chancery judges of England for more than a century there is an unbroken assent to the proposition that, when in a will there has been an absolute gift and a subsequent bequest over of an unused residue, it is void, and where the disposition over has been attempted to be made by the agency of a precatory trust it is equally void, and that this always occurs when the terms of the first bequest show that the person to whom it was given had the right to spend the property out of which the gift over, whether direct or precatory, was to arise.

The only change which has been made in England is the modification of the doctrine of the earlier cases in regard to the presumption with which the judges approached the subject of construction. It was at first held that words of desire and confidence had at least a quasi technical meaning and force and prima facie imported a trust unless controlled by other expressions. This was unsatisfactory to many of the ablest judges.

See Wright v. Atkyns, 1 Ves. & B. 313; Salé v. Moore, 1 Sim. 534; Heneage v. Andover, 10 Price, 230.

As the result of this extensive and increasing dissatisfaction the current of judicial sentiment has changed and in modern decisions the leaning of the court has been distinctly against the establishment of precatory trusts.

See Mussoorie Bank v. Raynor, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 321.

Such being the doctrine of the English courts, it will be found that the American decisions are in harmony with them.

See Howard v. Carusi, 109 U. S. 735, 27 L. ed. 1069; Coates' App. 2 Pa. 129; McKonkey's App. 13 Pa. 253; Pennock's Estate, 20 Pa. 268.

The cestus que trust could not have filed a bill alleging that the widow was extravagantly wasting the fund and asking that it be impounded and an allowance made to her.

Wynne v. Hawkins, 1 Bro. Ch. 179; Pushman v. Filliter, 3 Ves. Jr. 7; Sprange v. Barnard, 2 Bro. Ch. 585; Mussoorie Bank v. Raynor, supra.

Even under the ancient stringent rule which made the use of precatory words presumptive evidence of the intention to create a trust, the will of William A. Bryan imposed upon his widow no obligatory trust as to the bequest to her,—and much more, under the modern canon of interpretation, by which words of desire, request, or expectation are deprived of their former technical signification and are construed according to their ordinary meaning, such bequest will be held to have been an absolute gift.

With this conclusion the law of Virginia, the domicile of the testator, is in harmony.

May v. Joyner, 20 Gratt. 692; Carr v. Eftinger, 78 Va. 197; Cole v. Cole, 79 Va. 251.

Saulsbury, Ch., delivered the following opinion:

An agreement between the solicitors for the plaintiffs and defendant respectively was filed in this cause before the argument thereof began, which is in the following words: "It is agreed by the solicitors for the complainants and defendants respectively, in order to save costs and expenses consequent upon taking testimony, that as if upon demurrer to so much of the complainant's bill as alleges that by the bill of William A. Bryan, the gift to his widow, Mary R. Bryan, was upon an obligatory trust in favor of the complainants, it shall be first argued whether any such trust was by the said will created; and if it shall be finally determined that such trust was thereby created, then the parties shall be at liberty further to proceed in the cause and take testimony in support of their respective allegations of facts and go on to hearing."

The only question for me to decide, therefore, is, Was the gift to his widow, Mary R. Bryan, by William A. Bryan upon an obligatory trust in favor of the complainants?

That gift was as follows: "I give and devise to my wife, Mary R. Bryan, all of my estate both real and personal. And I do hereby authorize and direct my executrix hereinafter named, to sell my real estate as soon as it can be sold to advantage and to invest the money in good stocks and bonds. And I do request my wife if she should not require the whole of my estate as a support, that she will will at her death the remainder to the children of my brother, Charles A. Bryan, of Cecil County, Maryland. I do hereby constitute and appoint my wife, Mary R. Bryan, sole executrix to this my last will and testament, with the request to the court in which she may qualify that no security may be required of her and no appraisal be made of my estate."

This is the first case, so far as I know, in respect to what is called precatory trusts, which has come before the courts of Delaware for decision. I am not therefore embarrassed by authority here upon the subject.

The tendency of modern decisions, however, is, not to extend the rule or practice, which from words of doubtful meaning deduces or implies a trust.

In the case of Musoorie Bank v. Raynor, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 321, a man gave his widow the whole of his real and personal property, feeling confident "that she will act justly to our children, in dividing the same when no longer required by her. The privy council, in deciding in favor of the widow, expressed the opinion that "the current of decisions now prevalent for many years in the court of chancery shows that the doctrine of precatory trusts is not to be extended."

Lindley, L. J., in a subsequent case, after quoting from the judgment in the case of Musoorie Bank v. Raynor, supra, remarked: "I am very glad to say that the current has changed, and that beneficiaries are not to be made trustees unless intended to be so by the testator." But I am not going to enter into any extended argument in respect to the principles involved in the case.

The principles have been fully and ably discussed by the solicitors representing the parties plaintiff and defendant. Their arguments were marked by extraordinary research and ability.

I content myself therefore by simply saying that there is no precatory trust in the will of William A. Bryan in favor of the plaintiffs.

The subject of the gift claimed as precatory was not certain. The testator, William A. Bryan, gave and devised to his wife, Mary R. Bryan, all of his estate, both real and personal, after the payment of his debts, and only requested his wife if she should not require the whole of his estate, that she should will at her death, not the property devised to her, but the remainder, to the children of his brother, Charles A. Bryan of Cecil County, Maryland.

There might be, or there might not be, any remainder of his estate which could be enjoyed after his wife's death by any person whomsoever. A necessary ingredient or characteristic, therefore, in a precatory devise or gift is wanting in this case. There was nothing that this court could have ordered impounded if application for that purpose had been made to it.

I must therefore decide, and I do so decide, that the gift to Mrs. Bryan was absolute and unconditional, and not upon an obligatory trust in favor of the complainants.

The bill of the complainants is therefore dismissed with costs.

* A judgment was recovered against A in the State of Illinois, in the year 1879, and

*Head note by MAXWELL, J.

A soon afterwards removed to this State, and has resided herein continually ever since. In 1888, the judgment was revived in Illinois, without personal service upon A in that State, or an appearance by him in the action, and suit was thereupon brought on the revived judgment in Nebraska. Held, that the alleged revivor of the judgment in Illinois did not affect the running of the Statute of Limitations in this State, as the court had no jurisdiction over the defendant

NOTE.—The doctrine of the principal case illustrated.

The doctrine of the principal case has been sustained and recognized from a very early period. In the case of Bank of the United States v. Donnelly, 38 U. S. 8 Pet. 372, 8 L. ed. 978, the court held that "remedies are to be governed by the laws of the country where the suit is brought." The nature, validity, etc., of the contract may be admitted to be the same in both States; but the mode by which the remedy is to be pursued, and the time within which to be brought, may essentially differ. The laws of the State where the action is brought must govern the limitation of the suit.

The same principle is established by the court in Pearsall v. Dwight, 2 Mass. 84, and Byrne v. Crowninshield, 17 Mass. 55, where it is shown that the encroachment upon the lex fori is inconsistent and could make no order to affect him personally.

(July 2, 1891.)

ERROR to the District Court for Fillmore County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel payment of a judgment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Billings & Billings, for plaintiff in error:

By the common law of our county the Statute of Limitations commences to run at the time of the judgment of revivor.

Littleton, § 805.

Lord Coke observes in commenting upon this passage in Littleton, 290, b: "So by the writ it appeareth that the defendant is to be warned to plead any matter in bar of execution and therefore albeit it be a judicial writ."

Every writ whereunto the defendant may plead, be it original or judicial, is in law an action.

Pulleney v. Townson, 2 W. Bl. 1226; Kirkland v. Krebe, 84 Md. 98.

It is hardly to be supposed that the law intended to allow the plaintiff to revive his judgment by scire facias and not permit it to be used as evidence of indebtedness in an action of debt upon it in any other State. If a judgment is good for anything it is certainly good as an evidence of indebtedness.

See U. S. Const. art. 4; Packer v. Thompson, 25 Neb. 688.

In an action based on a judgment of revivor from another State the Statute of Limitations begins to run from the date of such revivor and not from the date of the original judgment.

Fagan v. Bently, 32 Ga. 534.

A court that has authority to render a judgment in the first instance certainly retains the power where no appeal has been taken to keep such judgment alive until it is satisfied.

Dennis v. Omaha Nat. Bank, 19 Neb. 677; Mitchell & R. Furniture Co. v. Sampson, 40 Fed. Rep. 805; Wegman v. Childs, 41 N. Y. 159; Uthshofer v. Stewart, 71 Pa. 170; Woodward v. Baker, 10 Or. 491.

This can do the defendant no injustice because he was charged with the knowledge that the court which rendered the original judgment would have power to keep it alive until paid because such was the law at that time.

Elaesser v. Haines, 52 N. J. L. 10.

Mr. F. B. Donisthorpe, for defendant in error:

A judgment rendered in the State of Illinois becoming dormant may be revived by service by publication, whereby it will become of full force and effect against the defendant in that State; but not in this State, unless personal service of notice of the proceedings had to revive said judgment be had upon said defendant.

Tessier v. Englehardt, 18 Neb. 177.

The judgment, as revived, is simply a continuation of the vitality of the original judgment with all its incidents from the time of its rendition. And not, as plaintiff in error would have it, a new judgment.

Eaton v. Hasty, 6 Neb. 424.

The defendant having resided in this State for eight years after the original judgment against him was rendered, and before the commencement of this action on said judgment revived, our Statute of Limitations prevents such action from being maintained in this State.

Neb. Code Civ. Proc. § 10; Marr v. Kuipatrick, 25 Neb. 107.

Maxwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In January, 1879, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant in the State of Illinois, the defendant being personally served with summons. Soon after the recovery of the judgment the defendant removed to this State, and has continued to reside here to the present time. On the 12th of October, 1888, the judgment in Illinois was revived in that State without jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. In December following this action was brought in the District Court of Fillmore County, upon the judgment so alleged to have been revived. On the trial of the cause the court found as follows: "That on the 7th day of January, 1879, plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant in the Circuit Court of Livingston County, Ill., on personal service, said court being a court of general jurisdiction, for the sum of $180.65, and $49.25 costs of suit, together with interest at six per cent per annum, in an action then pending in said court between said parties. That on the 12th day of November, 1888, said plaintiff obtained a judgment of revivor in said court as by the law of said State provided, which said law is as follows, viz.: Sec. 27. Scire Facias. It shall not be necessary to file a declaration in any scire facias to revive a judgment, or foreclose a mortgage, in any court of record in this State; and in any such case of scire facias to revive a judgment, where the plaintiff in the judgment sought to be revived, or his attorney, shall file an affidavit in the office of the clerk of court, out of which the writ issues, showing that the defendant in the scire facias resides or has gone out of the State, or is concealed within the State, so that process cannot be served on him, and stating the place of residence of such de-with the necessity and convenience of every State in controlling remedies in its own courts.

Though the Statute of Limitations of the State where the parties resided, and where the debt was contracted, had barred the remedy, yet, when resort was made to the courts of another State, the statutes of the latter must govern that remedy. M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 312, 10 L. ed. 177.

It has been held by the Supreme Court of Arkansas that the Statute of Limitations is not a bar to the revival of a judgment by writ of scire facias. 13 L. R. A.

Montgomery v. Brittin, 23 Ark. 322; Brearly v. Peay, Id. 172.

Code doctrine regarding the revival of judgments.

A judgment in a civil action may be revived by filing a petition in the action alleging the time the judgment was rendered, that it remains unsatisfied in whole or in part, stating the amount it is claimed the judgment should be revived for; which petition shall be verified, as complaints are required to be by the Act. Colo. Code, § 241; N.Y. Code Civ. Proc. 428.

defendant, if known, or that on due inquiry his place of residence cannot be ascertained, then, in such case, notice to the defendant may be given by publication and mail in the same manner as is provided by statute for notice in like cases in chancery." Chap. 110, Rev. Stat. Ill. 1888. "Sec. 25. Revival of Judgment by Scire Facias. Judgments in any court of record in this State may be revived by scire facias, or an action of debt may be brought thereon, within twenty years next after date of such judgment, and not after." Chap. 83, Id. "Notice by Publication, etc. Sec. 12. Whenever any complainant or his attorney shall file in the office of the clerk of the court in which his suit is pending an affidavit showing that any defendant resides or hath gone out of this State, or on due inquiry cannot be found, or is concealed within this State, so that process cannot be served upon him, and stating the place or residence of such defendant, if known, or that upon diligent inquiry his place of residence cannot be ascertained, the clerk shall cause publication to be made in some newspaper printed in his county, and, if there be no newspaper published in his county, then in the nearest newspaper published in this State, containing notice of the pendency of such suit, the names of the parties thereto, the title of the court, and the time and place of the return of summons in the case; and he shall also, within ten days of the first publication of such notice, send a copy thereof by mail, addressed to such defendant whose place of residence is stated in such affidavit. The certificate of the clerk that he has sent such notice in pursuance of this section shall be evidence." Chap. 22, Id. "That no personal service of notice was had of said proceedings upon said defendant who then and now and for eight years last past has continually been a resident of Fillmore County, Neb., and he had no notice or knowledge in any manner of said proceedings. It is therefore considered by the court that said cause of action did not accrue within five years next before the commencement of this action, and is therefore barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that the plaintiff's cause of action be and the same is hereby dismissed."

In Packer v. Thompson, 25 Neb. 688, the plaintiff in error had removed from Iowa to this State after a judgment had been recovered against him in that State. Eight years afterwards he returned to Iowa on a visit, when he was personally served with a conditional order of revivor, and the action afterwards revived. An action was thereupon brought on the revived judgment in this State, and the action was sustained. That case, however, differs materially from this. The judgment rendered in Illinois had no extraterritorial force. If it was sought to collect it in this State by due course of law, an action must be brought thereon, and service had upon the defendant, and a defense such as payment, release, the Statute of Limitations, etc., is available. An action upon a foreign judgment must be brought within five years, or it will be barred; and the judgment of a sister State is, within the meaning of the Statute of Limitations, a foreign judgment. Neither did the alleged revivor, there being neither an appearance by nor service on the defendant, remove the bar of the Statute, as the writ could have no effect beyond the limits of the State where issued. The bar of the Statute of Limitations, therefore, was not removed by the attempted revivor, and the action is barred.

The judgment is right, and is affirmed.

The other Judges concur.

v.

Charles H. P. COLLIS et al.

(....Fed. Rep.....)

1. The assent of executors to a specific legacy is presumed where the legatees are in possession under it.

2. He who accepts a benefit under a will must adopt the whole contents of the instrument renouncing every right inconsistent with it.

3. An execution under a judgment against executors as such cannot be levied on land of which a life tenant under the will had taken possession with the executors' assent before the judgment was rendered.

(June, 1891.)

SUIT to enjoin the sale of certain property under an execution. Injunction granted.

NOTE.—The doctrine of elections as applied to wills.

It is a familiar principle of equity jurisprudence that one who is the recipient of a beneficial interest under a will is assumed to have ratified the other recitals of the instrument and the courts will not allow him to set up a cause of action of his own, however well founded, which has a tendency to defeat or in any way impair the full operation of the will. Collins v. Woods, 68 Ill. 226; Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 337; Thellusson v. Woodford, 13 Ves. Jr. 20; Hyde v. Baldwin, 17 Pick. 303; Brown v. Ricketts, 3 Johns. Ch. 553, 1 L. ed. 714; Cox v. Rogers, 77 Pa. 160; Churchman v. Ireland, 1 Russ. & M. 250; Wise v. Rhodes, 84 Pa. 402. 13 L. R. A.

It is an exceedingly stubborn principle that no one shall be permitted to claim under, and adverse to, a will. If the testator assumes to dispose of property belonging to a devisee or legatee, the latter, accepting the benefit, must also make good the testator's attempted disposition." White v. Brokaw, 14 Ohio St. 339. See also Havens v. Sackett, 15 N. Y. 365; Ditch v. Sennott, 5 West. Rep. 162, 117 Ill. 362.

In 1 Jarman, Wills, 386, the doctrine of election is stated thus: "That he who accepts a benefit under deed or will must adopt the whole contents of the instrument, conforming to all its provisions, and renouncing every right inconsistent with it." See also Havens v. Sackett, supra.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. W. Montgomery for plaintiff.

Messrs. Charlton & Mackall for defendants.

Speer, J., delivered the following opinion:

This case depends upon the following statement of facts: One Anderson was the assignee, under the laws of New York, of the estate of DeLeon, and committed a devastavit thereon. William Schley, late of this district, was the surety upon the assignee's bond, and after the death of Schley, who died testate, Collis, who had been substituted as assignee of this New York estate, brought suit there on the bond of the defaulting assignee and obtained judgment for the sum of $7,000. The record of the proceedings there was brought to this district, and suit instituted in the circuit court, at common law, against the executors of William Schley, to wit: Thomas M. Norwood and J. W. Schley on their testator's obligation as surety for Anderson, assignee, and a verdict and judgment was rendered against them, as executors. The execution was issued upon that judgment, and levied upon a certain estate known as "Richmond Hill," near Augusta, claimed by the complainant in the bill now before the court, which was duly advertised for sale. This complainant is Philip A. Schley. He was the brother of William Schley and he claims an estate for life in Richmond Hill by virtue of the following item of the will of William Schley:

"Item 5th.—I direct that my old home known as Richmond Hill in Richmond County, Georgia, shall be held by my executors as trustees for, and during the lives of my sister Mary Ann Haines, and my brother Philip A. Schley, and during the life of the survivors of them. My purpose being to give them a home as long as they live."

He insists that the estate cannot be lawfully sold for the debts of William Schley, sued to judgment, after the specific legacy made by the clause of the will above quoted was assented to by the executors, and after the property had long been in his possession. He had been in possession of this property long anterior to the death of William Schley; and continuously since then. It is in dispute whether he was there by the express assent of the executors, or as a tenant by sufferance, but in the view the court has of the law that fact is not important to be settled at this time. The rule as announced by the Supreme Court of Georgia in Parker v. Chambers, 24 Ga. 527, may be deduced from the following extract from that decision:

"The objection that no evidence was submitted to the jury to prove the assent of the executor to the legacy to Chloe Parker and her children cannot be sustained. The executor allowed the property to remain in the possession of the tenant for life, and that was an assent to the entire legacy. It was in her possession at the death of the testator, and remained there, with the assent of the executor of course.

In Jordan v. Thornton, 7 Ga. 520, the court observes: "It was further claimed before the court below that there was no assent to the legacy by the executor proven, and therefore the plaintiff had no right of action. The court held that assent might be implied from possession; and as there was some evidence of possession, both in the tenant for life and in the plaintiffs after her death, he left that question to the jury. And this view of the case we affirm. Assent to a legacy is necessary to enable a legatee to sue at law for his legacy. It is not necessary to show an express assent; it may be implied from facts and circumstances. The assent, it is true, must be clear and unambiguous. The possession of the property willed does make out a clear case of assent by implication, — citing 2 Wms. Executors, p. 986; Mathews, Presumptions, 287; 3 Preston, Abstr. 2d ed. 145; Richardson v. Gifford, 1 Ad. & El. 52, and other authorities.

For the purposes of this investigation therefore the court concludes that the assent to this specific legacy was made by the executors.

And moreover these executors may not be heard to deny this. It is in evidence that one of the executors took a benefit under the will. He thereby received certain property and mortgaged it for his purposes. That mortgage is in evidence, and it concludes the executor, because it contains recitals which show that the executor relied for his title to the mortgaged property upon the will itself; and the authorities seem to be plain and conclusive, that he who accepts a benefit under a will must adopt the whole contents of the instrument, conforming to all its provisions and renouncing every right inconsistent with it. Hainer v. Legion of Honor, 78 Iowa, 245; Eichelberger's Estate, 135 Pa. 160; Scholl's App. (Pa.) 17 Atl. Rep. 206; Vanzant v. Bigham, 76 Ga. 759; Talisferro v. Day, 82 Va. 79.

All these decisions are comparatively recent, and quite a number of others might be cited in support of that proposition. Indeed the statute law of this State seems to recognize the doctrine without qualification. Ga. Code, pars. 2456-3162.

This rule would seem especially applicable

When a person accepts a legacy, it is an election to stand by the provisions of the will. Fulton v. Moore, 25 Pa. 468; Pennsylvania L. Ins. Co. v. Stokes, 61 Pa. 136.

Courts of equity adopt the rational exposition of the will, that there is an implied condition that he who accepts a benefit under the instrument shall adopt the whole, conforming to all its provisions, and renouncing every right inconsistent with it. Story, Eq. § 1077.

In Wilbanks v. Wilbanks, 18 Ill. 19, where a testator devised property belonging to his son to a third person, and in the same will made a devise to the son, it was held that the son must either relinquish his claim to his own property or to the legacy,—that the son might elect which he would take, but he would be concluded by his election. This decision was based on the rule established by the authorities, that a devisee could not at the same time take under a will and contrary to it. The doctrine of election again arose in Brown v. Pitney, 39 Ill. 468, and after referring to the authorities bearing upon the question, it was held "that the beneficiary under a will cannot insist that the provisions in his favor shall be executed and those to his prejudice annulled,—he must accept the instrument in its entirety or not at all."

where the legatee is also an executor, who qualifies solemnly as such, to execute the will, and therefore the entire will.

It is clear, therefore, that there was an assent to this specific legacy, and it is equally clear that the assent was distinctly and definitely made with all of its legal effectiveness before the date of judgment, upon which the plaintiff at common law, and defendant here, relies for the enforcement of his rights, and that J. W. Schley, the executor, taking a benefit under the will, may not be heard to deny this. It will follow, therefore, that if the plaintiff in the execution seeks to subject this specific legacy, assented to, as we have seen by the executor, to the payment of his debt, he must adopt a proceeding other than that to which he has resorted. The case of Baker County v. Moreland, 20 Ga. 146, is we think sufficient authority for this proposition. The court, Justice McDonald delivering the opinion, in that case, makes this announcement: "This is a proceeding at law to subject to the payment of a judgment against the administrator obtained in 1854, a negro man who had been distributed in 1848 to the claimant who was one of the heirs-at-law of defendant's estate. If the legal lien of the judgment upon the property had not attached before the distribution it is not subject thereto, unless there was fraud in the distribution. If the suit on which the judgment was rendered, was pending at the time of the distribution, the question whether the distribution was made to delay and hinder the creditor in the collection of his debt ought to have been submitted to the jury. But the record discloses no such fact.

There is no legal reason why the legal title of the claimant to the property which had passed to him without fraud nearly six years before should be disturbed by the judgment. This property is unquestionably liable, ratably, to pay the plaintiff's judgment, if the administrator has not assets or is not solvent; but it must be subjected by a different kind of proceeding before a tribunal that can bring all the heirs of the estate before it, and compel those who are solvent to contribute, ratably to the payment. If some are solvent, those who are able to pay may be compelled to contribute to the extent of the assets, if necessary, received by them."

It follows, therefore, we think conclusively, that the plaintiff here has no right to single out this specific legacy and fasten his entire debt upon that. The judgment should have been under the pleading "de bonis testatoris." Wms. Exrs. 1888, 1889; Ga. Code, 3578.

Specific legacies are favorites of the law. When no specific provision is made for the payment of the testator's debts in the will, the personal estate is primarily liable. If that is insufficient a lapsed devise may be applied thereto, and if debts still remain specific devises must contribute pro rata. Morse v. Hayden, 82 Me. 227; Ruston v. Ruston, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 245, 1 L. ed. 366.

It appears that this property was returned for taxes by the plaintiff for seventeen or eighteen years, and it appears that the executors were absolutely silent about it, although they were obliged to make an inventory of the real property lying outside of the County of Chatham, in which their executorship was located. We have the testimony of the ordinary of Chatham County that they made no return whatever to this property, and these facts are all material. On the final trial of this case an interesting question will arise also, upon the proposition of plaintiffs that this creditor could not now subject a specific legacy to the payment of his debt because of an alleged collusion on his part with the executors. He is seeking to enforce the judgment, not against the executors, and there is some evidence which seems to indicate it was understood that the executors would be relieved from the lien of this judgment. We are not prepared to say how important the question is at this time, but if it be true that the executors have been relieved from liability upon this judgment, it may become quite important to the rights of the plaintiff in execution, who is the defendant in this bill. The judgment was taken against the executors as such, and that is conclusive of assets. This is so held in Demere v. Seranton, 8 Ga. 47.

The general estate, as we have seen, would be first liable to pay the debts, and if the executors have permitted a devastavit as to the general estate of William Schley, which would be in the first instance liable for this debt, it would be perhaps quite important to determine whether their individual estate would not be liable rather than a specific legacy which they had assented to.

There are several other questions which have been presented in argument, but the court has indicated enough to justify in its opinion the conclusion that this is a case which should be inquired into more carefully upon sworn testimony, taken in the usual manner in equity and upon fuller consideration. It is not one of those cases which should be disposed of on a preliminary hearing.

We think, therefore, that the injunction restraining the sale under execution should be made permanent, and the case proceed as usual in equity.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hudson County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiffs' building, which were alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence in making excavations on his adjoining property. Reversed.

Statement by Scudder, J.:

The plaintiffs, Helena Schultz and Valentine Schultz, were the owners of a lot of land in Bayonne, Hudson County, upon which there was a building erected on brick piers set from three feet to three feet and a half in the ground. The defendant, who owned the adjoining land, excavated to the depth of seven feet, within three or four inches of the plaintiffs' building, and erected a house thereon. The excavation by the defendant, within the line of his own land, caused the building of the plaintiffs to sink, and it was weakened, cracked, and injured. There was judgment of nonsuit, and exceptions, on which errors are assigned.

Mr. W. W. Anderson for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. De Witt Van Buskirk for defendant in error.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The declaration is framed on the idea that the plaintiffs' land, dwelling-house, and building were entitled to support by the adjacent land of the defendant, and that by wrongfully digging away and removing such support the damage complained of was caused, whereby a right of action accrued. A demurrer was filed to this declaration, but it appears to have been waived, and the cause was tried on a plea of the general issue and proofs. With this form of pleading, leaving the declaration unaltered, there is difficulty in holding the case in court to determine the exact cause of controversy between these parties. But as the court at the circuit heard and decided the cause as if the pleadings were amended to present the issue, and the question is important, it will be considered as it was there tried and decided. It is almost unnecessary to say that the juxtaposition of lands gives no right of support to buildings erected thereon, unless conferred by grant, conveyance, or statute. As this is a case of recent erection of the building alleged to have been injured, the question of prescription, or lapse of time sufficient to infer a grant or conveyance, does not arise, nor has such right ever been conceded in our courts. The principle of the lateral support of lands and buildings was settled in this State by the case of McGuire v. Grant, 25 N. J. L. 356 (1856). As to land in its natural condition, there is a right to such support from the adjoining land; as to buildings on or near the boundary line, injured by excavating on the adjoining land, there is no right of action, in the absence of improper motive, or of carelessness in the execution of Wyatt v. Harrison, 3 Barn. & Ad. 871; Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. 117.

A landowner has no right to require the adjacent owner to desist or refrain from improving his own, for his benefit or security. Bellows v. Sackett, 15 Barb. 101. See Partridge v. Scott, 3 Mees. & W. 220; Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 352.

For an excavation causing an injury to the soil in its natural state an action would lie; but without proof of a right, by grant or prescription, in the plaintiff, or of actual negligence on the part of the defendant, no action would lie for an injury to buildings by excavating adjoining land not previously built upon. Gilmore v. Dricoll, 122 Mass. 207. See Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 159; Richart v. Scott, 7 Watts, 460; Richardson v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. 25 Vt. 465; Beard v. Murphy, 37 Vt. 99; Shrieve v. Stokes, 8 B. Mon. 453; Charles v. Rankin, 22 Mo. 593; McGuire v. Grant, 25 N. J. L. 352; Massey v. Goyder, 4 Car. & P. 161; Humphries v. Brogden, 12 Q. B. 739; Gayford v. Nicholls, 9 Exch. 702.

The opinion of a witness whether ordinary care or diligence is used in digging or excavating an adjoining lot is not proper testimony. Rogers v. Rhoadback, 5 N. Y. Legal Obs. 385.

All which can be claimed is that the adjacent owner shall not so dig upon his land as that that of his neighbor shall fall into his pit. If the weight of buildings of late erected by his neighbor on the land cause it to slide, when of its own weight it would not, there is no claim for redress. Marvin v. Brewster Iron Min. Co. 55 N. Y. 556.

A land proprietor has a right to assume that the soil of which he is the owner shall be allowed to stand in its natural state; and any interference with that right constitutes an actionable wrong without reference to the question of negligence. Richardson v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. supra; Wild v. Ministerley, 2 Rolle, Abr. 565; Foley v. Wyeth, 2 Allen, 181; Humphries v. Brogden, Hay v. Cohoes Co., and McGuire v. Grant, supra.

Where the complainant has himself erected weighty structures upon his own property, and an abutting owner in attempting to do likewise causes damage and loss, the complaint is remediless as he has directly contributed to the cause of the injury. To recover he must aver and prove negligence and want of skill on the part of the adjoining owner. Washb. Easem. § 444; Charles v. Rankin, 22 Mo. 593; Lasala v. Holbrook, 4 Paige, 169, 3 L. ed. 390; Elliot v. Northeastern R. Co. 10 H. L. Cas. 338; Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. 92; Beard v. Murphy, 37 Vt. 99.

A man in digging upon his own land is to have regard to the position of his neighbor's land, and the probable consequences to his neighbor, if he digs too near his line; and if he disturbs the natural state of the soil, he shall answer in damages; but he is answerable only for the natural and necessary consequences of his act, and not for the value of a house put upon or near the line of his neighbor. Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 220.

The injury usually consists in depriving the owner of a part of the soil to which his right was absolute. No degree of care in the excavation by the pit-owner would justify the transfer of a portion of another man's land to his own. Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 162.

The right of lateral support extends only to the soil in its natural condition. Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 336.

It must be regarded as an incident to the land, naturally attached to the soil. Farrand v. Marshall, 19 Barb. 383.

Such right does not extend where the owner, by building or otherwise, has increased the lateral pressure upon the adjoining soil. People v. Canal Board, 3 Thomp. & C. 277.

The topics of "The Reciprocal Easement of Lateral Support," and "Title in Party-wall and Right to Strengthen and Elevate," are the subjects of extended treatment in Ray on Negligence of Imposed Duties, 190.

the work. This is the law as established by the cases prior to that decision. It has remained the unquestioned law in this State since that time, and it has been confirmed by many cases since in other courts. Some of the most recent are very valuable for reference, notably Gilmore v. Driscoll, 122 Mass. 199; Dalton v. Angus, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 740, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 85, where a most thorough examination of the subject will be found. Although this law seems to give the owner of a building put upon his own land, in a manner most advantageous and sometimes necessary to make it available for his use, especially in a closely built city, but little protection against the choice or caprice of another who may own the adjoining land, yet it will be observed he is not entirely without protection. Neither can say, "It is lawful for me to do what I will with my own," as has been sometimes loosely stated in discussing this subject, and that it is a man's folly to build near the dividing line between his land and that of his neighbor, for it is more frequently his necessity that compels him to do so. The rights of the parties are equal, and are subject to modification by the conflicting right of each other. Our Statute relating to party walls (Revision, 809), shows that in some cases it has been thought necessary to fix authoritatively the mutual concessions and limitations in the rights of adjoining landowners. This Statute only applies where the excavation is more than eight feet in depth, while in this case the digging is but seven feet deep; but it is a recognition of the reciprocal right and duty which sometimes grow out of the mere vicinage of property. The maxim, sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas, is often invoked in such cases, and is of very wide application. In this case the limitation of this principle is that, if the owner of adjoining land would dig down beside the foundation of his neighbor's house, he must exercise his right to do so, not carelessly, but cautiously. There was no proof, or offer to prove, at the trial, that the defendant was negligent in digging his cellar, whereby the plaintiff's house was caused to settle, and the walls to crack, beyond the mere fact that this was the result. This result alone was not sufficient, for it may have been caused by defects in the plaintiff's house. The special ground of complaint is that it was done without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and without notice to them, by which they might have been enabled to protect their property. It is argued that the defendant thereby took upon himself the whole risk of injury to the building. The question whether such omission to give notice, under the circumstances stated, is evidence of carelessness in the execution of the work, is an important one, and it cannot be said to be definitely settled. The case most frequently cited in this country in favor of requiring such notice is Lasala v. Holbrook, 4 Paige, 169-178, 8 L. ed. 390-392 (1833). In this case Chancellor Walworth, while affirming the right of the owner of adjacent land to excavate for improvement on his own land, using ordinary care and skill, without incurring damages for injury to a building supported thereby, says: "From the recent English decisions it appears that the party who is about to endanger the building of his neighbor by a reasonable improvement on his own land is bound to give the owner of the adjacent lot proper notice of the intended improvement, and to use ordinary skill in conducting the same." He cites Peyton v. London, 9 Barn. & C. 725, 4 Man. & R. 625; Walters v. Pfeil, 1 Mood. & M. 362; Massey v. Goyder, 4 Car. & P. 161. In Peyton v. London it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, because the defendant had not given notice of his intention to pull down his supporting house, that not being alleged in the declaration as a cause of the injury. Lord Tenterden says, because of the failure to allege want of notice, the action cannot be maintained upon the want of such notice; supposing that, as a matter of law, the defendants were bound to give notice beforehand, upon which point of law we are not in this case called to give any opinion. In Massey v. Goyder, where notice was given to the occupier of adjoining premises of an intention to pull down and remove the foundation of a building, it was held that he was only bound to use reasonable and ordinary care in the work, and not to secure the adjoining premises from injury. In Chadwick v. Trouer, 6 Bing. N. C. 1, 8 Scott, 1 (1839), it was decided in the exchequer chamber that the mere circumstance of juxtaposition does not render it necessary for a person who pulls down a wall to give notice of his intention to the owner of an adjoining wall. This case was first considered in Trouer v. Chadwick, 3 Bing. N. C. 834, and cited in Smith v. Tanner, 2 Scott, N. R. 77, and Chadwick v. Trouer, 5 Scott, N. R. 119. In the argument, when it was urged that, if it be a duty imposed on a party not to do work so incautiously as to injure his neighbor's rights, and it is clearly a want of proper caution to omit giving such notice as may enable the neighbor to take steps for his own security, Parke, B., replied: "The duty of giving notice in such cases seems to be one of those duties of imperfect obligation which are not enforced by the law." But if it be a duty affecting property rights, and the breach causes damage, it would seem that the law must afford a remedy. In Brown v. Windsor, 1 Crompt. & J. 20, Garrow, B., said: "There may be cases where a man, altering his own premises, cannot support his neighbor's, and the support, if necessary, must be supplied elsewhere. In such case he must give notice, and then, if an injury occur, it would not be occasioned by the party pulling down, but by the other party neglecting to take due precaution.

There are no later cases that I have found in the English courts which change the rule given in Chadwick v. Trouer, and that is therefore supposed to be the present law in England relating to this subject, though the cases above cited refer to support by adjoining buildings. There are very few cases in our country which bear directly on this point. Shafer v. Wilson, 44 Md. 268, is most frequently referred to, after Lasala v. Holbrook, above cited. It is there said that notice to one's neighbor of an intention to make a contemplated improvement of property would seem to be a reasonable precaution in a populous city, where buildings are necessarily required to be contiguous to each other, and improvements made by one proprietor, however skillfully conducted, may be attended with disastrous results to his neighbors, who ought to have the opportunity to protect themselves and property. To the like effect is Beard v. Murphy, 37 Vt. 101. Chancellor Kent (3 Com. 437) has quoted the case of Lasala v. Holbrook, and this has been referred to in Shafer v. Wilson and elsewhere. Washb. Easem. 434, 435; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 497; 1 Thomp. Neg. 276; and other text-books,—cite these cases, and from such quotations it is impossible to determine how far the requirement of notice has passed into the general law of the courts in this country. None of these cases are of binding authority in this court, and, in a case of doubt like this, we should seek for that result which is most reasonable and just. Where the danger of loss in doing a legal act is not equally balanced, we should lean to that side which most needs protection. Here a mere notice, which can cause but little trouble to one who is honestly exercising his right of excavating his land next to his neighbor's house may enable the receiver of notice to shore or prop his wall to prevent its falling, or it may lead to some arrangement by which neither will be injured. It is more than a mere neighborly courtesy to give such notice, because it involves the right of one man to assert his right, regardless of the injury he may cause to his neighbor without such warning. The manner of giving notice may be only such as is reasonable under the circumstances, either to the owner of the property, or, if there be difficulty in finding or serving it on him, then it may be given to the tenant or occupant who is interested in protecting the property. Where it can be shown that such owner had knowledge of the improvement that was about to be made, it would not be necessary to prove a formal notice given to him.

In this view of the case, there was error in rejecting the evidence which was offered to show that the defendant gave no notice to the plaintiffs of his intention to excavate the land adjoining the house of the plaintiffs; and the judgment will be reversed.

Magie, J., dissenting:

The question in this case is whether the owner of an urban lot, who, in excavating its soil for a lawful purpose and in a manner not in itself negligent, has caused to settle a building erected on the adjoining lot, and deriving support from such soil without having acquired any right to such support, is liable to an action for the injury, merely because he had given no previous notice to the owner of the building of the intended excavation. The solution of the question is of great importance, and, as I have the misfortune to differ from the majority of the court, I deem it my duty to give my reasons for my dissent. From a very early period judicial consideration has been given to the right of support to soil in its natural state, and to artificial structures erected thereon, by the soil of adjacent or subjacent lands. A complete review of the course of decisions in England can be found in the opinions of Baron Pollock in Dalton v. Angus, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 740, and of Chief Justice Gray in Gilmore v. Driscoll, 122 Mass. 199. It is thereby thoroughly settled as the law of Great Britain that the undisturbed maintenance by an owner of a building erected on the confines of his land, and supported by the soil of adjacent lands, for a period requisite to make title by adverse possession, will establish in such owner a right to that support. While there are conflicting views as to the legal source and character of the right (Dalton v. Angus, supra), all agree that, once acquired, the right cannot be invaded by removal of the supporting soil, without liability for the resulting damage. Whether this doctrine is obligatory upon us, or has been adopted in this country, may, perhaps, be open to question. The analogous doctrine respecting the acquisition of rights by "ancient lights" has been doubted and denied. Hayden v. Dutcher, 31 N. J. Eq. 217.

But it is unnecessary to express any opinion on the subject, for in the case in hand plaintiffs had not, by length of maintenance of their house, acquired any right of lateral support, if they could have done so. But it is settled by the general concurrence of courts administering the common law that, when a building on the land of its owner derives actual support from the soil of adjacent land of another owner, but has acquired no right to such support, the latter owner may, for any lawful purpose, excavate and remove his supporting soil without any liability for injury occasioned thereby to the building, provided he does not act wantonly, or without the exercise of due care and prudence. In the case before us, the excavation was for a lawful purpose, and liability for the injury occasioned will only attach to the owner if his act in excavating was, in the eye of the law, negligent. Negligence is the want of that care which, under the circumstances, is due. As the only negligent act charged is the lack of notice, the question before us resolves itself into this, viz., whether it was defendant's duty to give notice of his excavation to plaintiffs. If so, a breach of that duty would constitute negligence. No such duty has been attempted to be imposed by statute. The "Act to regulate party-walls" is not applicable.

The contention is that the duty arose out of the juxtaposition of the lands, and the application of the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas. But it must be remembered that the conflicting interests of the parties arose, not from the mere juxtaposition of their lands, but from the erection of a building by one owner, supported by the soil of the other owner, without having acquired a right to such support. In making such erection, the owner of the building must be deemed to have full knowledge that the supporting soil can be lawfully removed. Can his act restrict the right of the other owner to remove the soil, and impose on the latter the duty of giving notice of what it is admitted he may lawfully do? If the act is an actionable wrong, or if the maintenance of the building will, by lapse of time, ripen into an indefeasible right, it seems to border on the absurd to say that the owner of the land injured, or threatened with injury, may not interrupt the running of the claim by removing the support improperly claimed, without the necessity of giving previous notice to him who is attempting to burden the land by such an easement or right. But if the act is neither actionable nor capable, by continuance, of creating an easement of support, or right of that nature, yet as to the adjoining owner it is without authority, and it is unreasonable, in my judgment, to permit such an act, knowingly done, to impose on the adjoining owner positive obligations restrictive of his rights. He who knowingly burdens the soil of another with the support of his building, without right, must in reason be deemed to take the risk of the owner removing the supporting soil, and to be prepared to protect his interest by his own vigilance. He cannot, by such act, impose on his neighbor the duty of being vigilant for him. The maxim, sic utere tuo, forbids the exercise of one's rights so as to injure the rights of others. But the removal of supporting soil, under the supposed circumstances, injured no right, for none had been acquired. The maxim no doubt forbids the negligent use of one's rights to the injury of the rights of others. This negative obligation is in my judgment the bound of the duty imposed in the case before us. The owner, in excavating, as he has a right to do, is under a duty to do the work with care and prudence, so as to do no unnecessary injury to the right of the owner of the building in its support on his own land. A failure to perform this duty will be negligence, but negligence cannot be predicated of a failure to give notice, for such a duty is not laid upon him. The argument in behalf of plaintiff seems to me to confound the rules of neighborly courtesy with the rules of law. Politeness to a neighbor might dictate the giving of notice to him in many instances where the law would not require any. What we settle in this case is a rule of law to govern an owner of land in the use of his undoubted rights therein.

But it is said that the doctrine contended for is established by authority. Among the many litigated cases on the subject of lateral support, which engaged the English courts before the separation of this country, none has been discovered in which this doctrine has been even hinted at. In 1838, Chancellor Walworth, in dealing with a case not involving this question, made this statement, viz.: "From the recent English decisions, it appears that the party who is about to endanger the building of a neighbor by a reasonable improvement on his own land is bound to give the owner of the adjacent lot proper notice of the intended improvement." Lasala v. Holbrook, 4 Paige, 169, 3 L. ed. 890. To support this statement he cites Peyton v. London, 9 Barn. & C. 725; Walters v. Pfeil, 1 Mood. & M. 362, and Massey v. Goyder, 4 Car. & P. 161. All these cases were decided in 1829. I think it can be shown that this statement of Chancellor Walworth is the sole basis of the claim that the doctrine contended for is established by authority. The independent opinion of that eminent jurist would go far to establish the doctrine, but, as has been seen, no opinion was called for, and none was expressed by him. Moreover, the cases referred to do not support his statement. In Peyton v. London, Lord Teunterden, after adverting to the fact that the declaration did not charge a want of notice of taking down the house whereby the alleged injury was caused, added: "Therefore, in our opinion, the action cannot be maintained upon the want of such notice, supposing that, as matter of law, the defendants were bound to give notice beforehand; upon which point of law we are not in this case called upon to give any opinion." In Walters v. Pfeil, the question of the obligation to give notice was not raised or mentioned. Massey v. Goyder is the report of a trial before Chief Justice Tindal. By one count, defendant was charged with excavating on his own land to the injury of plaintiff's building, without giving previous notice; by another count he was charged with negligently excavating. The question of notice was left to the jury, who found notice had been given, but upon a general finding judgment was entered on the last count. It is plain that none of the cases justified the statement in Lasala v. Holbrook. The precise question was afterwards raised. One of the counts of a declaration for injury done to a building by removal of its support on adjacent land was founded on a lack of notice. Tindal, Ch. J., in dealing with the case on demurrer, said: "As to the allegation that it was the duty of defendant to give notice to plaintiff of his intention to pull down his wall, . . . it is objected, and we think with considerable weight, that no such obligation results as an inference of law from the mere circumstance of the juxtaposition of the walls of defendant and plaintiff." Trower v. Chadwick, 8 Bing. N. C. 834. That cause was thereafter tried before the same chief justice. One of the issues was on the above-mentioned count. Damages were awarded generally. On writ of error, the exchequer chamber reversed the judgment. Baron Parke, delivering the unanimous judgment of the court, quoted the language of Chief Justice Tindal, above set out, and added: "We also think it impossible to say that, under such circumstances, the law imposes upon a party any duty to give his neighbor notice. We are inclined to think that the second count of the declaration has made the breach of this supposed duty a substantial ground for damage; and the probability is that the main damage did result from the want of notice, for it is obvious that, if notice had been given, the plaintiffs might have taken precautions to strengthen their vault. Inasmuch, therefore, as the damages are given generally upon the whole declaration, we think that the judgment must be arrested, and a verdict de novo awarded." Chadwick v. Trower, 6 Bing. N. C. 1 (1839). Notwithstanding this unmistakable deliverance, the statement of Chancellor Walworth commenced and has continued to be cited as expressing the conclusions of English courts on this subject. In the edition of the third volume of Kent's Commentaries, which was published in 1840, it is stated that "if the owner of a house in a compact town finds it necessary to pull it down and remove the foundation of his building, and he gives due notice of his intention to the owner of the adjoining house, he is not answerable for the injury which the owner of that house may sustain by the operation, provided he remove his own with reasonable and ordinary care." This statement was not made in the first edition of that volume, which was published in 1828. From that fact, and from the note to the passage above quoted, it is plain that it was based upon Lasala v. Holbrook and the English cases of 1829. The case of

Chadwick v. Trower was not alluded to. After the decision of Trower v. Chadwick, Gale & Whalley, in their treatise on Easements, discussed the question of the duty to give notice, now contended for, and declared their opinion that, if the observations of Chief Justice Tindal in that case were well founded, no such duty was imposed by law. Those observations were, as we have seen, adopted and approved by the exchequer chamber. Subsequent authors in this country have expressed views in respect to the duty to give notice, such as have been contended for, but they refer for English authority only to the cases of 1829, on which the statement in Lasala v. Holbrook had been based. The case of Chadwick v. Trower is not mentioned. They also refer to American cases as authority for the doctrine. I have not been able to find among them a single case justifying the statement. The cases generally cited are Shrieve v. Stokes, 8 B. Mon. 458; Winn v. Abeles, 35 Kan. 85, and Shafer v. Wilson, 44 Md. 268. In Shrieve v. Stokes the question of the obligation to give notice was not raised by the pleadings or the evidence. What was said by the court on the subject was incidental, and based on the supposed authority of the English cases of 1829. In Winn v. Abeles, the question of duty to give notice was not involved. In Shafer v. Wilson the question of liability for want of notice was raised. The court below instructed the jury that notice was a duty. In reviewing this instruction, the court above only says that such notice would seem to be a reasonable precaution, and basis this statement on Lasala v. Holbrook.

This review in my judgment justifies the assertion that the doctrine contended for has not the sanction of authority. In the only adjudicated case not based on mistaken citations the determination was against the doctrine; and although the decision does not bind us, it must have great weight as a declaration of the obligations imposed by the common law on adjoining property owners, by a court of eminent ability. Having found no support for the contention of plaintiffs, either in principle or authority, I am unwilling to join in imposing this burden on property owners. I have devoted much consideration to this case, from the sincere conviction that the rule to be promulgated will disastrously affect urban property, and without producing any practical good. A judicial determination that notice is necessary in cases such as that before us cannot prescribe the form of notice, or fix the time, or provide for constructive notice. Our determination will simply require reasonable notice, and whether in any case such notice has been given must be matter for the jury. An owner hereafter proposing to improve property so situate must give notice. Must the notice be in writing, or will verbal notice or knowledge suffice? How shall notice be given to the owner of the building if he be an infant, or non compos mentis, or non-resident? Such and other similar questions the owner, when confronted by the rule to-day promulgated, must determine according to his own view of what is reasonable, but conscious that a jury may disagree with his view and hold him liable. If the owner of the building be infant, idiot, or beyond seas, it would seem to be impossible to give the required notice. To add to the difficulties and risks which have before attended the putting down a suitable foundation for building in such cases, the difficulty of giving notice, and the risk of its being ineffective, will retard the improvement of such property and diminish its value. I shall vote to affirm the judgment below.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Ex Parte D. M. VANCE, Petitioner.

(....Cal....)

The time of absence from jail of one who, having been committed under an alternative judgment that he pay a fine or be imprisoned a certain number of days, secures his release through the unauthorized act of the sheriff, cannot be considered as having been spent in jail in satisfaction of the judgment.

(July 15, 1891.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the release from jail of one who had been committed for contempt of court,

NOTE.—Absence from jail not considered in satisfaction of the sentence.

A convict is not serving out his sentence while away from prison on parol where commutation of time is given by statute for obedience to prison discipline. Woodward v. Murdock, 124 Ind. 439.

The time during which a convict is at large on parol by the governor is to be computed as part of the term of his imprisonment, so as to extend the period of his sentence. Ibid.

One who escapes from prison before the expiration of his sentence becomes a fugitive, and upon his return no previous examination before a magistrate is required before an information is filed for another offense with which he is charged. People v. Kuhn, 11 West. Rep. 533, 67 Mich. 589.

The English courts have found no obstacle in the way of executing a prisoner where he has escaped after sentence, and remained at large beyond the 13 L. R. A.

time fixed for execution. In 1716, Charles Ratcliffe, after conviction and sentence to death for treason, escaped from prison and went to France. About thirty years afterwards he was brought before the king's bench, where his identity was established and he was afterwards beheaded. Rex v. Ratcliffe, 18 How. St. Tr. 429, 1 Wils. 150; Rex v. Harris, 1 Ld. Raym. 482.

Lord Hale says: "If a prisoner for felony be in jail and escape and the jailor pursue after him, he may take him seven years after, though he were out of view." Again: "If a felon escape out of the jail by negligence, though the jailor be fined for it, he may retake the felon at any time after, for the felon shall not take advantage of his own wrong or the jailor's punishment." 1 Hale, P. C. 602; 1 Russ. Crimes, 421.

In Cleek v. Com., 21 Gratt. 777, the defendant was sentenced to imprisonment for ten months, combut who alleged that the term of imprisonment had expired. Petitioner remanded.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. A. H. Carpenter for petitioner.

Messrs. C. S. Denson and Wilson & Wilson, contra.

De Haven, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The return to the writ of habeas corpus issued herein shows that the petitioner, D. M. Vance, was on October 18, 1889, adjudged by the Superior Court of Sacramento County to be guilty of contempt, and to pay a fine therefor of $300, and to be imprisoned in the county jail of Sacramento County until such fine was paid, in the proportion of one day for every dollar of the fine. The petitioner was on that day committed to jail under said judgment, and there remained until October 22, 1889, when he was released by the sheriff, and remained at liberty, free and without confinement, until June 10, 1891, at which date he was re-arrested under an order of the superior court made June 9, 1891, directing that its former judgment be enforced. The release of petitioner by the sheriff was not by any order of the court, but upon an undertaking given by petitioner on appeal to the supreme court from said judgment of contempt, and it may be assumed that both the sheriff and the petitioner acted upon the belief that the execution of said judgment was stayed by said appeal and undertaking. The petitioner now claims his release upon various grounds which assail the validity of the original judgment for contempt, and also because "the term of such imprisonment has long expired, and there having been no legal or authorized suspension of said judgment." In regard to the first claim of petitioner it will be sufficient to say that the affidavits charging him with contempt were such as to authorize the order which directed him to show cause why he should not be punished for the contempt therein alleged, and the subsequent proceedings ending in the judgment for contempt were regular, and the judgment itself valid. The remaining ground upon which the petitioner claims his release presents the single question whether his release from jail under the circumstances here stated, and thereafter remaining at large with free and perfect liberty, for a length of time sufficient to have satisfied said judgment if he had remained in jail, operate as a complete execution of the judgment; and it would seem from the mere statement of the proposition that the contention of petitioner on this point cannot be sustained. The sentence of the court was that he pay a fine, and that part of the judgment relating to imprisonment was merely incidental to the judgment of fine, and in the nature of an award of execution directing the particular way in which that judgment should be enforced, in the event of the non-payment of the fine imposed, and it seems clear to us that such judgment can only be satisfied by a compliance with its terms. In this case it is admitted that the judgment of fine has not been paid, and that the defendant has not suffered the alternative of actual imprisonment. The judgment therefore remains in full force. The act of the sheriff in releasing the petitioner was unauthorized, and petitioner's departure from the jail to which he had been lawfully committed, without having been discharged by due course of law, was equally so, and was in effect a technical escape, from which he can derive no advantage. The time of petitioner's absence from jail, in violation of law, cannot be considered as having been spent in jail in satisfaction of the judgment which required his actual imprisonment.

This question, although presented here for the first time, is not a new one. Re Edwards, 43 N. J. L. 555, the petitioner had been committed to state's prison for the term of ten years at hard labor. He made his escape, and remained at large for seven years, and he claimed that, notwithstanding such fact, he was entitled to his discharge at the end of the term of ten years. but the supreme court, in an elaborate opinion, held otherwise. The same question came before the Supreme Court of Kansas in the well-considered case of Hollon v. Hopkins, 21 Kan. 638, and was disposed of adversely to the contention of the petitioner here. In that case the petitioner had been sentenced to the state prison for three years "from the 19th day of September, A. D. 1874." On the next day after sentence he made his escape, and was not recaptured until 1878, and he insisted that the judgment had expired by its own limitation, but the court held that the essential part of the judgment was that petitioner be imprisoned for three years, and that the time fixed by the court for its commencement was not such a material part thereof as to per-mening July 13, 1870. He escaped September 21, 1870, and was not apprehended until January 14, 1871. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus, but the court refused to discharge him, holding that he must bear the full measure of imprisonment imposed.

Workhouse commissioners are without authority to establish rules by which a subsequent sentence against one imprisoned shall date from his incarceration, or by which deduction shall be made from sentences for good behavior. Vanvabry v. Staton, 38 Tenn. 334.

A prisoner who has served out the full extent of any valid sentence under the general laws will be discharged, although he was sentenced to a longer term, whether the judgment was altogether erroneous or only void as excessive. Re Franklin, 77 Mich. 615.

Under the New Hampshire statute, a convict who has been incarcerated, but subsequently committed to an insane asylum, cannot, upon discharge from the asylum, be remanded to prison, if at the time of the discharge the term for which he was sentenced to imprisonment has expired. Re McQuinn, 65 N. H. 84.

Gross v. Rice, 71 Me. 241, is not in conflict with the cases which have been cited. There, a statute providing that a prisoner should not be discharged from state's prison until he has remained the full term for which he was sentenced, excluding the time he was kept in solitary confinement for violating the prison rules, was held to be unconstitutional, on the ground that it deprived him of liberty without due process of law.

The defendant, in Ex parte Clifford, 29 Ind. 106, was sentenced, September 13, 1862, to three years in state's prison. January 9, 1863, he escaped, and remained at large until April 4, 1867, at which time he was recaptured. Being brought up on habeas corpus, his discharge was refused.

mit an evasion of the judgment by the wrongful act of the prisoner. The court there said: "The only way of satisfying a judgment judicially is by fulfilling its requirements. Of course, if Hollon had died, or been pardoned, the sentence would be at an end. But, as those things have not happened, and as the sentence has not been disturbed by any judicial decision or determination, there is no way of satisfying its requirements, or of exhausting its force, except service by Hallon of the time required in the penitentiary.

In State v. Cockerhusm, 24 N. C. 204, the defendant had been sentenced to be imprisoned for two months "on and after the first day of November next," and did not go into prison according to the sentence, and at a subsequent term of the court it was directed that the sentence should be immediately executed, and it was held that the order was proper, and that the essential part of the judgment was not the time when it should be executed, but the extent of the punishment fixed. So also in Dolan's Case, 101 Mass. 219, the same conclusion was reached, the court holding that "expiration of time without imprisonment is in no sense an execution of the sentence. Other cases might be cited to the same effect, and, indeed, our attention has not been called to the decision of any appellate court holding to the contrary. We are satisfied with the law as thus declared.

The fact of fraudulent intent must be found to support a judgment setting aside a voluntary conveyance as in fraud of creditors, at least unless the facts found absolutely exclude all possibility of the absence of fraudulent intent in the mind of the grantor, under statutes making every transfer of property with intent to defraud or delay a creditor void, and providing that the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact and not of law, and that no transfer shall be adjudged to be fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration; findings that the transfer was voluntary, that the grantor was insolvent, and that the transfer actually defrauded creditors are not sufficient.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Alameda County setting aside a judgment in his favor and granting a new trial in an action brought to set aside certain conveyances as fraudulent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order granting defendants a new trial. The action was brought by plaintiff, a judgment creditor, to set aside two certain deeds of gift made by defendant Watson A. Bray, the judgment debtor, to Julia A. Bray, his wife, May 20, 1880, and August 3, 1881, respectively, of lands in Contra Costa County, as being void against prior creditors. Plaintiff's debt had been reduced to judgment; execution was issued thereon, and returned wholly unsatisfied. In the lower court, plaintiff had judgment, as prayed for, declaring said deeds null and void as against his judgment, and that he be entitled to enforce his execution against the property in said deeds described. Defendants moved for a new trial, and their motion was granted upon the ground that the findings as filed omitted to find upon the issue of intent raised by the pleadings in the case; that is to say, there is no finding on the issue made by the pleadings, whether the conveyances from Bray to his wife, referred to in the pleadings, were made or accepted with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the plaintiff or other creditors of said Bray. The question presented by this appeal is, therefore, whether, in view of the facts found by the court, it was necessary to make a further finding as to the fraudulent intent; for, if the facts found by the court necessarily establish the fraudulent intent, that satisfies the law. If probative facts only are found, yet, if the ultimate fact flows as a necessary conclusion therefrom, the findings are sufficient. Osborne v. Clark, 60 Cal. 623; Biddel v. Brizzolara, 56 Cal. 881; People v. Haggar, 52 Cal. 189; Coveny v. Hale, 40 Cal. 555.

The only findings of the court necessary to consider in the investigation of this most important question are as follows:

(1) That said deeds were entirely voluntary, and there was no valuable consideration whatever for the making and delivery of the same, and said deeds were deeds of gift.

(2) That at the times of the making of said deeds the defendant Watson A. Bray was insolvent, and has ever since remained insolvent.

(3) That defendant Bray, at the time he made and delivered said deeds, was not fully aware, and did not know his actual financial condition, and his inability to pay and discharge in full his then outstanding debts and liabilities.

(4) That by the making and delivery of said deeds Watson A. Bray did hinder, delay, and defraud this plaintiff in the collection of his debt.

This action rests upon section 3439 of the Civil Code: "Every transfer of property . . . made . . . with intent to delay or defraud any creditor . . . is void." "Every transfer of personal property . . . is conclusively presumed if made by a person having . . . the possession or control, . . . and not accompanied by an immediate delivery . . . to be fraudulent and therefore void against those who are his creditors, while he remains in possession." Civil Code, § 3440.

Then, to exclude all possibility of misconception arising out of the conflicting decisions of other States as to whether the question of intent is a matter of law or of fact, section 3442 provides that in all cases arising under section 3439 "the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, and not of law." It further provides that no transfer shall be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. It also expressly excepts transfers of personal property arising under section 3440, for that section makes the question one of law by providing that transfers made in a certain way shall create a conclusive presumption of fraud. The general contention of appellants in this case is fairly illustrated by the doctrine laid down by Bump, in his work on Fraudulent Conveyances, 3d ed. 271, 273: "If the act necessarily delays, hinders, or defrauds his creditors, then the law presumes that it is done with fraudulent intent. The intent is to be assumed from the act. The circumstances of the act, or rather the act itself, is conclusive evidence of fraud, for no man is permitted to say that he does not intend the necessary consequences of his own voluntary act. The law will not speculate about what is actually passing in the donor's mind, for the act need not be immoral or corrupt. The law does not concern itself about the private or secret motives which may influence the debtor. . . . He may make a conveyance with the most upright intentions, really believing that he has a right to do so, and that it is his right and duty to do it, and yet, if the transfer is voluntary, and hinders, delays, or defrauds his creditors, it is fraudulent. . . . The presumption in such a case is conclusive, and against it all other evidence is unavailing. The debtor may have some other purpose in view, but the intent to defraud is a part and parcel of his act. It is upon these principles that the law relating to voluntary conveyances rests. In the construction of the Statute, they are deemed within its operation, when they necessarily tend to defeat the just rights of creditors, even though they are made bona fide and with the intention of conferring a gratuitous benefit upon some meritorious object. The law stamps a man's generosity with the name of fraud when it prevents him from acting fairly towards his creditors, and presumes fraud if he disables himself from paying his debts. In such case the presumption of fraud arises and may exist without the imputation of moral turpitude. The principle is, that persons must be just before they are generous, and that debts must be paid before gifts can be made." This doctrine, ever since the celebrated cases of Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. 500, 1 L. ed. 696, decided by Chancellor Kent, has been recognized and accepted by many judges in many States of the Union.

Respondents insist that "the question of intent is a question of fact, and that the intent or purpose of the grantor in making the transfer in all cases is a question for the jury, and that it is material to the issue to determine whether the act done is a bona fide transaction, or whether it is a trick or contrivance to defeat creditors." "That the question of solvency or insolvency of the grantor at the time of the making of the deeds is a matter of evidence to be given its due weight in determining the ultimate fact as to the fraudulent intent of the grantor; that a rich man may make a fraudulent deed as well as one who is insolvent; and that while a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent may be prima facie fraudulent, it cannot be conclusively fraudulent, for that would make the question of intent a question of law, and thus be in violation of that provision of the Code which says it shall be a question of fact." These views, to a great extent, are supported by the exhaustive case of Seaward v. Jackson, 8 Cow. 450, and by other authority, both English and American. The cases in this country passing either directly or indirectly upon the questions involved in this litigation are practically numberless, and, as we have already seen, are greatly at variance. But, as has been said by Bigelow on Fraud (Preface, iv. and v., ed. 1877): "The law here to be applied is statutory law, and, as to the statutory law concerning fraud on creditors and purchasers, each State of the Union, with few exceptions, has a Code of its own, interpreted by independent tribunals, and enforced by distinct and diverse penalties and procedure. With deference to the views of others who have attempted to present a harmonious view of the statutes of the different States, the author is satisfied that such efforts are both unsatisfactory and dangerous. The decisions of the courts of New York concerning the interpretation of an ambiguous statute of that State,—that is, concerning the intention of the Legislature of that State in the passage of the Act,—cannot be safe authority in another State, even upon a question of the meaning of a statute framed in the very same words. The Legislature of New York meant one thing by the language used, and the Legislature of another State may have meant something else, and so the courts of each State may have declared, and rightly. To say, therefore, that the decisions are in conflict is incorrect, and to attempt to deduce the true rule of law as applicable to both States is vicious." Without attempting to deduce the true rule from the many authorities of many States, we will discuss this case by the authority of our statutes and Codes, and in the light of the decisions of our own judicial tribunals.

Having found the fact that the conveyances were voluntary conveyances, that the defendant Watson A. Bray was insolvent at the time he made the conveyances, and that these conveyances delayed and defrauded the plaintiff in the collection of his debt, was it still necessary for the court to find the further fact that the intent of the grantor in making the conveyances was to delay and defraud creditors, and was the court justified in granting a new trial by reason of its failure to make such finding? Appellant contends that the absence of a finding of intent is immaterial, because the conveyance being voluntary, the grantor being insolvent, and the conveyance having defrauded the creditor, the intent to delay and defraud follows as an absolute and conclusive presumption, and the intent, being the ultimate fact, necessarily results from such probative facts. In order to support this contention the ultimate fact must follow necessarily—that is, as a matter of law—from the other facts.

In Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 556, the court said: "Of course, it is only when the conclusion follows as a matter of law that such finding will be held sufficient."

"The only inferences which we can draw from the findings," said the court in De Celis v. Porter, 65 Cal. 10, "are inferences of law. We are not allowed to draw inferences of fact from the facts found. If this court would infer a fact from other facts, it would be usurping the province of the trial court, which alone can find the facts in issue. This is the rule with regard to special verdicts, and we are of opinion that the same rule applies to findings of fact." To the same effect are the cases of Chandler v. People's Sav. Bank, 65 Cal. 499; Salisbury v. Shirley, 66 Cal. 228; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 556.

It may be conceded that it would have been perfectly proper for the trial court to have drawn an inference of fact as to the fraudulent intent of the grantor from the other facts found; that this court might be justified in setting aside a finding to the contrary as not being supported by the evidence (Judson v. Lufford, 84 Cal. 505), but that does not dispense with the necessity of an actual and express finding as to the ultimate fact, as a fact, by the lower court, nor authorize this court to exercise what would be original jurisdiction by supplying a finding upon this most vital and essential matter. As section 8442 of the Civil Code declares that the question of fraudulent intent is "one of fact and not of law," it is not entirely plain that this court can under any state of facts, however plain they might be, hold that the ultimate fact might flow from the probative facts as a matter of law. But, assuming that the ultimate fact of "intent to defraud" may flow as "matter of law" from the probative facts, yet to obviate a finding of this ultimate fact the facts found must necessarily and conclusively indicate that the grantor was possessed of the intent to defraud at the time the conveyances were made. If the facts found do not absolutely exclude all possibility of the absence of fraudulent intent in the mind of the grantor, then the want of the finding of such intent cannot be dispensed with in this court. Thus, in the case of Emmal v. Webb, 36 Cal. 204, the court, in considering whether it could infer a fact from other facts, said: "To warrant us in so doing, the fact to be inferred must follow inevitably from the facts found, or in other words, the non-existence of the fact to be inferred must, upon every conceivable theory of which the case will admit, be inconsistent with the existence of the facts which are found." And to the same effect are Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 556; Younger v. Pagles, 60 Cal. 520; Walker v. Buffandeau, 63 Cal. 312; Coglan v. Beard, 65 Cal. 63; Alhambra Addition Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 601.

We then proceed to consider whether there is any possible state of facts consistent with the findings of the court heretofore quoted, and also consistent with the absence of fraudulent intent in the mind of the grantor at the time of the making of the deeds sought to be set aside in this action. The finding of the court "that the defendant Bray by the making of these deeds did hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiff in the collection of his debt" throws no special light upon the solution of the question as to the actual intent of the grantor; while important as evidence of the intent, by reason of the presumption that every man intends the usual and ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts, yet our Statute requires that a conveyance shall not only delay and defraud creditors, but that it was made with the intent to delay and defraud, and the Statute appears to recognize the intent as the prevailing and controlling element in measuring the bona fides of the transactions. Bray did actually defraud Bull in the making of the deeds, by depriving him of property which would otherwise have been applied to the satisfaction of the execution; but it does not necessarily and conclusively follow therefrom that the intent was present in his mind to defraud, or that in making the transfer he may not have been actuated by the most honest motives.

Appellant insists that the existence of the facts, to wit, "that the grantor was insolvent at the time of the transfer, and that the conveyances were deeds of gift, render the inference of fraudulent intent absolute and conclusive, and a conveyance under such circumstances, therefore, would be void under any and all conceivable states of facts; and this is the important and determinative question in this case." Very many of the authorities from other States relied upon by appellant to support this contention rest in whole or in part upon the presumptions "that every man intends the usual and natural consequences of his voluntary act," and that "every man is presumed to know the condition of his own business;" and, applying those presumptions; it is said that the natural consequence of an insolvent giving away his property is to defraud his creditor, and that, therefore, the insolvent must have intended to defraud; and, again, "a man is presumed to know the condition of his own business affairs, and therefore if, as a matter of fact, he is insolvent, he must know of such insolvency."

Best, in his work on Evidence, section 807, speaking of the changes which this subject of presumptions has undergone in our legal history, says: "Certain presumptions which in earlier times were deemed absolute and irrebuttable have, by the opinion of later judges, acting on more enlarged experience, either been ranged among presumptiones juris tantum, or considered as presumptions of fact, to be made at the discretion of the jury. On the whole, modern courts of justice are slow to recognize presumptions as irrebuttable, and are disposed rather to restrict than to extend their number. To conclude a party by an arbitrary rule from adducing evidence in his favor is an act which can only be justified by the clearest expediency and soundest policy, and some presumptions of this class ought never to have found their way into it."

According to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (§§ 1961-1968), the foregoing presumptions are disputable presumptions, and may be controverted by other evidence; and, indeed, the presumption that every man knows the condition of his own business affairs has no standing in this case, for the trial court has found as a matter of fact that "the defendant Bray did not know that he was insolvent." And, not knowing his insolvency, how can it be presumed from the existence of his insolvency that he intended to defraud? For no man can be presumed to intend a consequence which he does not know, of which he is ignorant, and which, therefore, he cannot contemplate. It may be conceded that one who acts recklessly and regardless of consequences is not to be exonerated. The fraud in this case rests upon the insolvency of the grantor; for, while there is no allegation, proof, or finding as to the value of the property conveyed, still, if he was solvent, a gift of this character, in the absence of an actual fraudulent intent, would be upheld. If defendant Bray did not know that he was insolvent, then he did not know that this property was required to pay his debts, and the finding of the court that he was ignorant of his insolvency is absolutely inconsistent with the presumption that he intended the consequences of an act, which consequences depended upon insolvency. Appellant's counsel insist that a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent is void under all circumstances, and that the intent to defraud is conclusively presumed. If that be so, it must be by reason of some presumption of law; but, if it be said that fraud can be conclusively presumed in any case, except as provided by section 3440, Civil Code, then fraud is again made a question of law, and this would amount to an abrogation of section 3442, Id., which provides that "fraudulent intent is a question of fact," and would be creating a class of conclusive presumptions not recognized or justified by either section 3440, Id., or section 1962, Code Civil Proc.

As has been remarked at the inception of this opinion, the great number of cases from the courts of other States, cited by appellant's counsel to support this contention, will not be reviewed. Some of them directly sustain such position; others merely affirm the decisions of nisi prius courts, that a gift by an insolvent is sufficient evidence to justify the setting aside of a conveyance by a creditor; others hold the insolvent guilty of a fraudulent intent as a matter of law; and many others are based upon the two presumptions heretofore referred to, and holding that such presumptions were conclusive presumptions, and that therefore the fraudulent intent necessarily resulted therefrom; and this was the reasoning adopted by this court in the case of Swartz v. Hazlett, 8 Cal. 118. The court held in that case that "every man must be held to know the law and the facts regarding his own business." In other words, if the debtor is insolvent, he is conclusively presumed to know that fact; and, the necessary consequences of a transfer of his property being to delay and defraud his creditors, the fraudulent intent follows in all cases. The important distinction between that case and the one at bar is that in this case the lower court not only recognized the presumption that "every man is presumed to know the condition of his own affairs," as being rebuttable, but absolutely rebutted it by finding as a fact that "the defendant Bray did not know the condition of his own affairs, and did not know that he was insolvent."

In 1 Wharton, Cont., § 877, subd. 4, is used this language: "As a condition of fraudulent intention, insolvency known to the grantor must be shown. A party who believes himself to have the pecuniary ability to make a gift can make such gift without the risk of its being subsequently impeached, supposing his belief is not negligently adopted."

In the case of Swartz v. Hazlett, supra, this court really held that a transfer of property by a grantor who knew of his insolvency was conclusively fraudulent; and, while we are not inclined to even adopt that view of the law under our statutes, yet, from the reasoning of the court in that case, if there had been a finding as to the grantor's ignorance of his insolvency, it does not appear that the case could have been reversed, and judgment ordered for the plaintiff. As we have already seen (Emmal v. Webb, supra), if, upon any conceivable theory, the inference of fraudulent intent would be inconsistent with the fact of insolvency, then this court cannot find the intent as matter of law. Now, it appears from the record in this case, in addition to the findings already discussed, that the liabilities and assets of the defendant Bray approximated three quarters of a million dollars, respectively; that he continued in business for years after these deeds were made, and before he made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors; and, in addition to these facts, we will suppose that he honestly believed at all times that he had ample property remaining to pay his debts after this property was transferred, and that the property transferred was of merely nominal value. A state of facts could be imagined even much more favorable to the grantor, Bray, than the foregoing, and which would be perfectly reconcilable with the fact of actual insolvency, and the absence of fraudulent intent at the time of the making of the conveyances; and, conceding the trial court would be justified in drawing the inference of fraudulent intent from such a state of facts, this court would not and could not say that such intent would flow therefrom as a matter of law. It is difficult to see how trivial gifts, made with fair, honest intentions, can be adjudged to have been made with a fraudulent intent, when intent is declared to be a matter of fact in all cases.

In the case of Carpentier v. Mendenhall, 29 Cal. 484, it was held that a finding of a demand by one tenant in common to be let into possession, and a refusal by his co-tenant, was not a finding of ouster. The court said:

"The law will not presume from either the one or the other, nor from both combined, that there was an intent to oust. That intent must be established as a fact by the finding of the jury. Conversion is one of the points to be established in actions of trover, but it is settled that demand and refusal is not conversion, but only evidence of it, for the consideration of the jury. In the absence of all explanation, the court would be justified in directing or advising the jury to infer a conversion or an ouster, in a case like the one at bar, from the fact of demand and refusal, but the inference is to be made by the jury and not by the court." There appears to be no reason why the legal principles declared by this court in the criminal case of People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 44, are not applicable here. The defendant was charged with an assault with intent to commit murder. It is a statutory offense, and the intent is the essential ingredient. The trial court gave the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that the natural and probable consequence of every act deliberately done by a person of sound mind is presumed to have been intended by the author of said act; and if the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants, or either of them, did shoot at said Henry Coffey, as charged in the information, and that the natural and ordinary consequences of said shooting would be the death of said Henry Coffey, then the presumption of law is that the defendant so shooting did shoot at said Coffey with intent to kill him." This court said: "It is doubtless true that a man is presumed to have intended the immediate and natural consequences of his act, but, when an act becomes criminal only when it has been performed with a particular intent, that intent must be alleged and proved. It is for the jury, under all the circumstances of the case, to say whether the intent required by the Statute to constitute the offense existed in the mind of the defendant." This charge withdrew from the jury the consideration of the question whether the defendants intended to kill Coffey. The defendants claimed that they were acting in self defense, and upon real and apparent danger. To tell the jury, therefore, if they believed that the defendants had shot at Coffey, and that the natural and ordinary consequences of the shooting would be the death of Coffey, the law would presume them guilty of an intent to kill, was erroneous, because it entirely disregards the question whether the defendants acted in good faith, and to defend themselves against real or apparent danger. So, in the case at bar, if a voluntary transfer by the defendant insolvent carries with it a conclusive fraudulent intent, the defendant would be precluded from showing his motives and good faith in making the conveyance, and the question of intent, which a jury may have been called to try, which in all cases is a question of fact, and which is the fact in the case, would be driven from the case by the court calling to its aid presumptions which, as we have already seen, are not only liable to attack, but are put to flight at the moment they come in contact with a substantial fact.

The case of Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 58, 59, holds that insolvency is but a circumstance from which fraud may be inferred or argued; evidence of fraud, but not by any means conclusive or irrebuttable evidence. In that case the court said: "In a case like the one at bar, insolvency is not a fact of jurisdictional consequence, nor is it per se a condition of relief. . . . A complaint framed for the purpose named, while stating that the deed was without consideration, should aid or help out the averment, not by averring insolvency, for that is but a circumstance, not by averring generally that the deed was fraudulent, for that is but a conclusion of law, but by averring the fact superadded by the Statute, to wit, that it was made with 'intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors.' The state of the grantor's worldly affairs may be used as evidence to elucidate the intent, if disputed; but as matter of pleading it is not necessary that insolvency should be averred in the complaint, and for the obvious reason that the fact does not enter as a term into the legal proposition. A rich man may make a fraudulent deed as well as one who is insolvent."

The Civil Code provides that the mere want of consideration does not of itself render a conveyance fraudulent as to creditors; and considering this section in connection with the presumptions recognized by the court in Swartz v. Hazlett, supra, the distinction between sales for an inadequate consideration and voluntary conveyances is entirely imperceptible, and the question in both cases at once becomes one of intent to be decided from all the evidence in the case. The difference in these two classes of conveyances is only in degree; for the grantor must upon appellant's theory be presumed to know his condition, and to know that the consideration is inadequate, and that he is thereby depriving his creditors of the portion of the "fund" which is represented by the difference between an adequate and inadequate consideration, he must be presumed conclusively to intend to defraud them pro tanto, for the conveyance is voluntary to that extent. But McFadden v. Mitchell, 54 Cal. 629, holds that inadequacy of price and insolvency of the debtor are only circumstances more or less potential in the determination of fraud as a question of fact; and, referring to certain instructions given by the trial court, Justice McKee says: "By these instructions the court in effect took away from the jury the consideration of fraudulent intent as a question of fact, and as they are contrary to the plain rule established by the Code the cause is remanded for a new trial." Appellant's position in this case takes away from the jury the consideration of fraudulent intent as a question of fact. In Jamison v. King, 50 Cal. 186, the court, speaking through Justice McKinstry, said: "Doubtless the concurrence of insolvency on the part of the assignor, and inadequacy of price, would be a circumstance strongly tending to establish fraud; but inadequacy or failure of consideration is not of itself sufficient, even as against the creditors of an insolvent assignor, to authorize a court to find fraud as a conclusion of law. By our Statute it is provided: 'The question of fraudulent intent, in all cases arising under the provisions of this Act, shall be deemed a question of fact and not of law: nor shall any conveyance or charge be adjudged fraudulent as against creditors or purchasers solely on the ground that it was not founded upon a valuable consideration.' In the case before us the district court did not find fraud as a fact or as a conclusion of law, nor does the amended complaint allege it." In Miller v. Stewart, 24 Cal. 504, the court uses this language: "Whether the transactions in question were entered into by the Millers with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud their creditors is a question which the Statute leaves to the determination of the jury upon such evidence as may be presented for their consideration. The intent is expressly declared to be a question of fact, and must therefore be for the jury, and not the court. In the instruction above quoted the court in effect takes the question from the consideration of the jury, and assumes the decision thereof." In Harris v. Burns, 50 Cal. 141, it appears, the trial court instructed the jury that certain facts, if proven, were conclusive as to the intent of the assignor to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors. In the opinion of this court, Chief Justice Wallace says: "This instruction cannot be supported. The question of fraudulent intent is a question of fact; it is so declared by the Statute. . . . The instruction, in effect, took away from the jury the decision of the question of fact, and established the fraudulent intent by mere legal conclusion from an isolated circumstance. This we held erroneous in Jamison v. King, 50 Cal. 182, at the present term." This decision is not based upon the theory that the facts referred to by the trial court in the instruction were in themselves too weak to justify a conclusive presumption of a fraudulent intent; but it declares that the intent being a question of fact, such a presumption could not be indulged in under our Statute.

If the Legislature had intended a gift by an insolvent to constitute a constructive fraud or fraud in law, it was easy to have said so. Instead of that, they expressly legislated away all the reasons upon which the decisions so holding profess to stand. When the Legislature did intend to preserve the doctrine of fraud in law, they did so in express language, by section 8440, Civil Code, and then provided that in all other cases the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, and not of law. It is impossible to comprehend how any decision or series of decisions of other States can make the question of fraud in this State, and in this character of action, a question of law. No decision or series of decisions can repeal a statute.

Let the order be affirmed.

We concur: DeHaven, J.; Harrison, J.; McFarland, J.; Paterson, J.

Beatty, Ch. J.:

I concur. It does not seem possible to avoid the conclusion that the law of California on the subject of voluntary conveyances by insolvent debtors is such as in the opinion of Justice Garoutte it is declared to be. But I cannot refrain from expressing the belief that it is most unfortunate that the court should be forced to that conclusion. When an insolvent debtor makes a gift of his property to a donee of his own selection, there can be but one result, so far as his creditors are concerned. They are necessarily deprived of what is rightfully theirs, and the law ought to pronounce such transaction ipso facto fraudulent and void as to them. Our Legislature, however, has deliberately chosen to make the rights of creditors in such case depend, not upon the proof of facts susceptible of demonstration, and from which the injury is a necessary result, but upon proof of the secret intent of the debtor; in other words, upon the whim of a jury. Such a law invites fraud, puts a premium upon perjury, and multiplies fruitless litigation. It ought to be changed, but the Legislature alone has the power to change it. In the mean time the courts should give the utmost force and effect to so much of the law for the protection of creditors as remains. There should be no hesitation in stating, and in everywhere insisting upon, the proposition that a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent debtor is prima facie proof of a fraudulent intent, which throws upon the donee the necessity of rebutting the inference of fraud; and it ought not to be held or intimated that such inference will be rebutted by the mere fact that the debtor was at the date of the conveyance ignorant or uncertain as to his insolvency. It ought to be made clear, on the contrary, that he believed, and had good reason to believe, that his property remaining after the conveyance would be amply sufficient to enable him to meet and discharge his obligations as they matured.

(October 5, 1891.)

APPEAL by the executors and trustees under the will of Henry Kesler, deceased, from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia County awarding Mary R. Kesler one third of decedent's personal estate. Reversed.

Mary R. Kesler was the wife of Henry Kesler. Before their marriage they entered into a contract by which she was given a certain annuity in full satisfaction of all claims upon his estate. She claimed that this contract was a fraud upon her rights and the auditing judge disregarded it and permitted the widow to share in the estate as though the testator had died intestate.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

A party executing a legal instrument is presumed to be acquainted with its contents—where it is unconnected with suspicious circumstances the burden of disproving the presumption lies on him who would impeach the deed.

If one who is about to execute an instrument can read it, and neglects to do so, or being blind or illiterate chooses to act without requiring the contents to be made known to him, he will be bound to it.

Illustrations of the rule.

When certain sailors had signed articles to complete a voyage, but at an intermediate port refused to go on, and the captain thereupon promised to pay them increased wages, it was held that the promise was without consideration. Bartlett v. Wyman, 14 Johns. 260.

A firm having a contract to build a railroad found the contract unprofitable, whereupon the railroad company promised if they would go on and complete the contract they would repay to the contractors all of the obligations which they had or would incur in consequence of their completion of the work. Messrs. Samuel P. Hanson and John G. Johnson, for appellees:

The deed of marriage settlement was void because procured through fraud. There is no rule of evidence which requires that fraud shall be proven by more than one witness.

In Thomas v. Loose, 5 Cent. Rep. 190, 114 Pa. 35, the evidence referred to was evidence of facts which varied or changed the writing. Fraud is a fact like any other, which can be proved without overcoming that weight of inference which sustains a written instrument against an effort to modify it by parol.

The presumption as against a person of sound mind, who signs an instrument, that he or she is acquainted with its contents necessarily falls after uncontradicted proof has been offered, of the existence of a deliberate fraud, calculated to induce the execution.

If there be affirmative proof of fraud, the settlement will not be permitted to stand. The woman does not bear such a position towards the man as enables him to induce her signature to the settlement by any deceit.

Sterrett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is certainly no apparent reason why, situated as these parties were, the "law should regard with disfavor" the ante nuptial agreement made by them. Mr. Kesler was advanced in years, had already accumulated a fortune, and had a family by a former marriage; while Mrs. Davidson was lifted out of poverty and comfortably provided for by it. Persons, situated as they were, do not usually act from mere impulse, or contract without consideration; and the court below has accordingly found that "every requirement of the law seems to have been complied with in the execution of this contract. A full disclosure was made to the intended wife, and every opportunity afforded her either to obtain information as to the nature and character of the instrument she came prepared to execute, or object to its execution if ignorant of its contents, or deceived as to its purpose and object. She was not illiterate, but intelligent and well educated. She was not young and inexperienced, but of mature years and acquainted with marital duties and rights. She was a free agent, of sound mind, and fully capable of protecting herself. Nor was she under any restraint. The deed of settlement, although of great length, is in the usual form adopted by careful and accomplished conveyancers, and its preamble, in clear and perspicuous language, easily comprehended by a person of even ordinary intelligence, specified the terms and objects of the agreement entered into between the parties. That it was understood by the claimant we think there is no doubt. And from her necessities circumstances it is not wholly improbable she was content, assured of the maintenance and comforts afforded by her future husband's wealth during his lifetime and the secured annuity of $600 for her life after his death, to relinquish all further claim upon his estate." It is impossible to understand how, consistently with these facts, Mr. Kesler can be found to have practiced a fraud upon his intended wife in the execution of this contract. In his senile garrulity he may have made statements to his son-in-law which might better have been left unsaid; but when brought face to face with his wife he distinctly averred, and she did not deny, that she had never asked him any questions in regard to the agreement, and that he had made the settlement "to protect his family; that she might jump over the traces; that he fully intended if she proved a faithful, good wife,—he only had this to protect himself and his family,—if she proved to be what he thought she was, and what she had now turned out to be, he would have given her at the same time one third." (Testimony, pp. 48 and 49). But, whatever may have been his original intention, in view of the findings of the court below, that Mrs. Davison, knowing her rights and fully informed of the situation, deliberately and in writing released all her interest in her deceased husband's estate in consideration of the provision made for her by this agreement and was content, it is incredible that a fraud should have, in fact, been practiced on her. Even assuming that the facts are as claimed by her counsel, the quantum of proof adduced is not sufficient to modify the agreement; they were not proved by two witnesses or their equivalent. Thomas v. Loose, 114 Pa. 35, 5 Cent. Rep. 190.

The agreement must be considered as having embodied the real intention of the parties at its date, and therefore conclusive of their rights. Was there a valid revocation of it? It will be conceded that there must have been a meritorious or valuable consideration for such revocation (Stickney v. Borman, 2 Pa. 67); and it is very clear that neither of these existed here. The sole inducement was the doing of that which Mrs. Kesler was legally bound to do. She had voluntarily estranged herself from her husband because of her dissatisfaction with the ante-nuptial contract; there is no pretense that she had any other cause of complaint. If, as has been shown, that was a valid and binding contract, the estrangement was without justification; it was a wanton abuse of the marital relation for mercenary purposes; and reconciliation was her duty. Public policy forbids that the performance of such duty be made the subject of barter and sale. The law fixes and regulates the marital relation on public considerations, and will not allow the parties to discard and renew it for money. Thus in Roberts v. Friaby, 88 Tex. 219, the supreme court held that the husband is not legally bound by a post-nuptial contract in which he hires his wife to live with him. The same principle was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in Copeland v. Boaz, 9 Baxt. 223; and Mr. Justice Allen of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts well said: "It is as much against public policy to restore interrupted conjugal relations as it is to continue them without interruption for the same consideration. The right of condonation is not exercised for the sake of justice to the injured party, or with regard to the rights of others or the interests of the public when it is sold for money, and the law cannot recognize such a consideration." Merrill v. Peaslee, 146 Mass. 480, 6 New Eng. Rep. 120.

There are no cases in conflict with this view, decided by this court. It was not involved in Burkholder's App., 105 Pa. 31, upon which the court below relied.

It is said that abandonment of the legal proceedings instituted by Mrs. Kesler for the revocation of the ante-nuptial contract was sufficient consideration. The answer to this is that she was not prejudiced by that act; the question involved there has been raised here, and has been shown to be without merit.

Mrs. Kesler is therefore not in a position to claim the aid of a court of equity; and the decree of the court below must be reversed.

Decree reversed with costs to be paid by the appellee, and record remitted with instructions to distribute the fund in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

A Maryland statute providing that whenever the laws of any other State imposed upon Maryland insurance companies seeking to do business within its borders greater obligations or prohibitions than are prescribed for foreign companies seeking to do business in Maryland, the same obligations and prohibitions shall be imposed on companies of such State which shall seek Maryland business, makes such foreign law the rule which Maryland will apply to companies of the foreign State asking permission to do business within its territory; and if a Maryland company is refused a license in the foreign State merely on the ground of discretion, the latter's companies may be refused license in Maryland on the same ground, although the Maryland statutes do not in terms authorize it.

A corporation, organized and existing under the laws of one State, is a creature of those laws, and beyond its jurisdiction, it carries its corporate life and existence only by sufferance and upon an express or implied consent. It cannot come within another jurisdiction to transact business except by permission, either express or implied. The right of a State to exclude foreign corporations is perfectly settled and not open to debate. Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Bank of Augusta v. Earl, 38 U. Messrs. Bernard, Carter & Sons for appellee.

Irving, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question to be decided in this case arises upon an appeal from a pro forma order of Baltimore City Court directing a mandamus to issue against the insurance commissioner of the State, commanding him to issue a license to the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York to do business in this State. It is especially interesting and important, as it involves a question of comity between the States, and a construction of the statutes of this State and of New York State in relation to each other. The case has been argued with very great ability by the counsel on both sides, and by the aid of that skillful and learned debate we have been able to reach a unanimous conclusion. The record discloses the following state of affairs: The appellee for several years, as a New York corporation, upon paying the requisite license fees, has been transacting business in the State of Maryland, and has outstanding risks in the State of over $3,500,000. It is a corporation with $250,000 paid-up capital. In December, 1890, this company, tendering the usually demanded license moneys, asked for its annual license to transact business in Maryland. It was informed that, in consequence of a protest from the American Casualty Insurance & Security Company of Baltimore City, license to transact business in Maryland would not be granted. Thereupon the appellee filed its petition in the Baltimore City Court, alleging compliance or tender of compliance with all the prerequisites to the granting of license, and that the same had been refused. It then asked for mandamus to compel its issuance. Rule was laid on the insurance commission to show cause why the mandamus should not issue. By his answer the following admitted facts were disclosed: The American Casualty Insurance & Security Company of Baltimore City was organized and incorporated in 1890, with a paid-up capital of one million of dollars, and a half million of surplus. Its line of business was manifold, and similar to that of the appellee, and it became the rival of the appellee in insurance business. This company having started business here, desired to open an office and transact business in the City of New York. It applied for license to trans-meaning of the Act of Congress of 1875, relating to service of process, "found" in that State so as to give jurisdiction to Federal courts sitting in that State. Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 373, 24 L. ed. 853.

There is no sound reason why, in the case of an insurance company doing business in another State, by an agent, under statutes such as those referred to in the principal case, it should not be deemed to be represented in the latter by such agent, and held responsible for its obligations and liabilities there incurred. See also Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 65, 20 L. ed. 354; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 285, 20 L. ed. 576; St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. act business in New York City. The insurance superintendent of New York State replied that under the laws of New York he could not grant license to do more than one kind of business in that State. The application was modified so as to ask license for only one kind of insurance, viz., that of steam-boilers. Notwithstanding the company was ready and willing to comply with all the requirements of the State of New York preliminary to the issuance of license, the superintendent refused to grant license, in the exercise of the discretion which the Statute of that State in express terms confided to him. The language of the Statute of New York, to wit, of the second section of chapter 593 of the Acts of 1873, is as follows: "The said superintendent shall have power to refuse admission to any company, corporation, or association applying to be permitted to transact the business of insurance in this State from any other State or country wherever the capital stock shall be impaired, and also whenever in his judgment such refusal to admit shall best promote the interests of the people of this State." In the 188th section of article 23 of our Code of Public General Laws the following proviso is put: "Provided, that when by the laws of any other State any deposit of money or securities is required, or taxes, fines, or penalties, or other obligations or prohibitions are imposed upon insurance companies incorporated or organized under the laws of this State, and transacting business in such other State, or upon the agents of such insurance companies, greater than those required or imposed by the laws of this State, so long as such laws continue in force the same taxes, fines, penalties, and deposits, obligations, and prohibitions shall be imposed upon all agents or insurance companies of such State doing business in this State, instead of those prescribed by the laws of this State." The insurance commissioner of this State, regarding this provision of our Statute as substituting the New York Statute for our Statute whenever the New York law differed from ours, and introduced other and greater "obligations and prohibitions" as affecting Maryland companies desiring to prosecute business in New York State, and being informed that a Maryland company of like character with the appellee had been excluded from New York, and refused license to do business in that State, deemed it his duty to refuse license to the appellee to do business in this State. To test the correctness of his view of the law and conduct in the premises this proceeding was instituted and a pro forma order for mandamus was granted, from which this appeal was taken.

The appellee contends that the Statute of Maryland does not give our insurance commissioner any discretion whatever, as the New York law does, in express terms, give to its commissioner or superintendent of insurance; and that, therefore, when the appellee had tendered full compliance with all the provisions of our Statute which section 124 of article 23 of the Code enumerates, it was the imperative duty of the insurance commissioner to grant a license; and that his refusal was without warrant of law. The argument is that, as the Statute says that license shall not be granted

"unless it be fully organized and possessed of the amount of capital required of similar companies formed under the laws of this State, or until the following conditions have been complied with," then, when it is properly organized, and has proper amount of capital, and has complied with the conditions mentioned in the Statute,—as was admitted was the case as respects the appellee,—there was no alternative to the commissioner, and he must issue the license. The appellant controverts this position, and insists that, while a discretion in the matter is not conferred on the commissioner in express language, as is done by the New York Statute to its superintendent of insurance, yet our Statute is a strictly retaliatory one; and when the New York Statute imposes an "obligation or a prohibition" not found in ours, that obligation and prohibition must be treated as if found in so many words in our Statute, and it is to be enforced accordingly. In other words, the contention of the appellant is that, in such case, and for such emergency, our Statute makes the New York law our law to control the action of our commissioner of insurance. This, we think, is the correct view, and justifies the commissioner in refusing license to the appellee.

We cannot agree to the view, pressed with so much earnestness and ability by appellee's counsel, that the exclusion of the Maryland company from New York State by the refusal on the part of the New York superintendent to allow it license, was not a "prohibition" by the law of New York, within the meaning of our Statute. The law of New York vests such absolute discretion in its superintendent of insurance that it is within his power to exclude every Maryland company from working in New York State, if in his judgment it was not to the interest of the New York people to have companies of other States to compete with insurance companies of that State. Now, it is perfectly clear that our law-makers never designed that our statute should be so interpreted as to allow New York companies to have access to our State on the same terms as our own, while ours cannot be allowed in New York State. According to the view of the appellee, that very condition of things might have existed by the action of the New York superintendent, and yet it would not have existed by the law of New York. Clearly that cannot be a sound view which might lead to such result. The Maryland company has been shut out of New York. How has that been effected? By the unappealable determination of the New York officer not to grant it a license. By what authority has that officer so conclusively shut the door upon a Maryland company? By the law of New York, giving him the discretion and power of prohibiting that company from entering the State of New York to do insurance business there. It is the law that enabled the superintendent to prohibit, and that is responsible for the prohibition; and the prohibition must be referred to and charged to the superior authority,—the law of New York. It will not do to say, therefore, that the law of New York does not prohibit. By its express provisions, in certain contingencies, exclusion (which is prohibition most effectual) is allowed; and supposing that contingency as arising, the superintendent has excluded the Maryland company from New York; so that it is prohibited now, under penalties, from attempting to work there. The facts show it to have been a willful exclusion of the Maryland company from New York. Only two considerations are mentioned in the law giving the superintendent his power to refuse license. One is where there is impairment of the value of the stock of the company seeking license, and the other, when the superintendent for any reason may think it not for the interest of the New York people that such company should be permitted to do business in that State. There was no impairment of the stock, for the company was in unusually safe condition. Its capital was $1,000,000, all paid up; and it had a half million of surplus. So safe a company could not jeopardize the interests of the people by offering it insurance. It was four times as strong as the New York company in paid-up capital, and with so large a surplus offered an unusually safe medium of insurance in the several directions in which it took risks. It is apparent, therefore, that no justifying reason existed for prohibiting it from exercising its functions in the State of New York, and it was well justified in asking the commissioner in this State to put into force the retaliatory feature of our law; and there would seem to be especial fitness enforcing it as against the appellee, whose business is so especially along the same line and plane as the American Casualty Insurance & Security Company.

The rule for the construction of statutes is that statutes are to be "read according to the natural and obvious import of their language;" and no construction ought to be made against the express letter of the statute, for nothing can so express the meaning of the makers as their own direct words. Sedgw. Stat. & Const. Law, 260. The same author, in the same connection, says that words are to be taken in their ordinary sense, unless such a construction would be obviously repugnant to the intention of its framers. The object and intent of a statute is always to be regarded; and, of course, its language is to be understood and construed as furthering the object contemplated by the makers. A forced construction "for the purpose of extending or limiting their operation" must not be resorted to. The object of our Statute is palpable. The design was to put insurance companies coming from other States into the same position as ours would be in the State whence they came. They were to be admitted on the same terms, and none other than ours would be there. Companies coming from other States were intended to fare no better than ours would on going to their State. Any obligation or "prohibition" affecting Maryland companies in other States was to operate here on companies coming here from thence. With such an object in view, as very manifestly existed, the "prohibition" can have but one reference and meaning, and it would be forcing it from its natural and obvious meaning in the Statute to suppose, because it is used together with the language, "deposit of money or securities, taxes, fines, or penalties, or other obligations," and "or prohibitions" must have some reference to the subject of money deposits or taxes. After enumerating all the other things that might be demanded to be done, it winds up with "prohibitions," meaning thereby plainly what the word means in its most natural and usual signification. It clearly meant that if our companies were prohibited from a State, theirs were to be prohibited here. The law was intended to be one of strict reciprocity. "Prohibition" means, according to lexicographers, "forbidding to do;" "an inhibition;" "an interdiction." When, therefore, the superintendent refused license to the Maryland company, it was instantly forbidden to attempt to transact business in the State of New York. That such legislation as that of this State which we have been called on to construe is legitimate and constitutional is fully established by authority; but, as that has not been questioned, and the whole argument has rested on the construction of the language of the statutes of the two States, we need not cite authority in support of the law. The enforcement of the law in a fair and just way, as we have construed it, and its authority to the commissioner, cannot operate prejudicially to the people promoting competition. Competition is always in the interest of the masses, and a judicious officer will never unnecessarily do what will prevent it; but action such as he has taken in this case will tend to secure just treatment from other States. If this Maryland company was impaired in credit, and had for that reason been refused license in New York State, its prohibition from doing business there would not have given rise to the exercise of the retaliatory feature of our law, unless it was against some company from that State in like unsound condition.

Being of opinion that the mandamus against the appellant should not have been ordered, the ordered granting it must be reversed, and the petition therefor must be dismissed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

A municipal ordinance making it unlawful to or of the City of Richmond against the appellee for the violation of a city ordinance regulating the storing and keeping of petroleum and other inflammable oils within the corporate limits. Judgment was rendered against the appellee before the mayor, and the cause appealed to the Wayne Circuit Court. In that court demurrers were sustained to the several paragraphs of complaint, and judgment on the demurrer rendered against the appellant. The only question before us is as to the validity of the ordinance. The sections of the ordinance to which the objections are made are as follows: "Section 1. Be it ordained by the common council of the City of Richmond that it shall be unlawful for any person to keep or store any petroleum, naphtha, benzine, gasoline, coal oil, or any inflammable or explosive oils, within the corporate limits of the City of Richmond, in quantities greater than five barrels at a time, except as herein-after provided. Sec. 2. Any person desiring to keep or store any of the oils or products mentioned in the first section of this ordinance within the corporate limits of the City, in quantities greater than five barrels at a time shall present a written petition to the common council, at a regular meeting thereof, setting forth an exact description of the location, premises, and buildings on and in which it is proposed to keep and store such oils and products, and the manner and kind of vessels in which the same are to be kept, the kind of oils, and the purpose for which they are to be kept. Sec. 3. Upon the presentation of the petition, as provided in section two of this ordinance, the common council may, if the location and buildings described in said petition, and the purpose and keeping of such oils and products, are deemed suitable and proper, and that the person presenting such petition is a proper person, grant such permission to the person presenting such petition, to keep and store such oils and products on the premises, and in the manner set forth in the petition, or in the manner which the council may direct, in quantities greater than five barrels at a time, which permission so granted may be revoked at any time at the option of the council; and the rights and privileges to be exercised by the person receiving such permission shall engage in laundry business without consent of the board of supervisors, except the business be located in a building of brick or stone, confers a naked, arbitrary power upon the board, and is unconstitutional. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220.

not be assignable or transferable by the person receiving the same to any other person directly or indirectly, and any attempt so to do shall be deemed a revocation of all rights and privileges on the part of the person making the attempt." Two objections are urged against the validity of this ordinance: (1) That it gives to the council the power to arbitrarily discriminate between citizens by giving the permission to some and withholding it from others under similar conditions; and because it specifies no terms or conditions to be observed in the keeping or storing of such oils which could be complied with by all citizens alike. (2) That the ordinance is unreasonable, and is an undue restraint upon lawful trade and business.

The subject covered by the ordinance in question is clearly within the police power conferred by the charter upon the municipality. Section 3155, Rev. Stat. 1881, provides that the common council of a city shall have power to make by-laws and ordinances not inconsistent with the laws of the State, and necessary to carry out the objects of the corporation. The danger to be apprehended from the storing of large quantities of inflammable or explosive substances in large quantities within the limits of a city to life and property is so great as to invite legislative control of the same by the city government. The principal question in this case is whether or not the ordinance in question is a valid exercise of that power. It will be observed that this ordinance does not establish any general rule for the storage of substances proposed to be regulated; but it reserves to itself, at regular meetings, the right to grant or refuse permission to keep and store such oils, dependent upon whether it at such time deems the location and buildings suitable for such purpose and the person presenting the petition "a proper person." It further provides that the permission, when granted, "may be revoked at any time, at the option of the council." Language better calculated to enable the common council to arbitrarily control the business, without any fixed or known rules, cannot well be imagined. The business of keeping, storing, and dealing in such oils is a legitimate business, and every citizen has an inherent right to engage in the business upon equal terms with any other citizen.

In the case of Mills v. Goshen, 117 Ind. 221, 3 L. R. A. 261, an ordinance of the city requiring a license for carrying on the business of roller skating, and providing that such license should be issued upon the payment into the city treasury of such sum of money "as the mayor or common council shall determine in each particular case," was held invalid; the objection being that a discretion was lodged in the mayor or common council in fixing the fee to be charged. In the opinion this language is quoted with approval from Horst & Bemis on Municipal Police Ordinances: "The ordinance itself should specify every condition of the license, and the officer should be merely entrusted with the duty of issuing licenses."

In Fick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 80 L. ed. 220, an ordinance of the City of San Francisco, prohibiting the carrying on of laundries without a permit from the board of supervisors, except in buildings constructed of stone, was held invalid. The court says: "It does not prescribe a rule and conditions for the regulation of the use of property for laundry purposes, to which all similarly situated may conform. It allows, with restriction, the use for such purposes of buildings of brick or stone; but as to wooden buildings,—constituting nearly all those in previous use,—it divides the owners or occupiers into two classes, not having respect to their personal character and qualifications for the business, nor the situation and nature and adaptation of the buildings themselves, but merely by an arbitrary line, on one side of which are those who are permitted to pursue their industry by the mere will and consent of the supervisors, and on the other those from whom that consent is withheld at their mere will and pleasure. And both classes are alike only in this: that they are tenants at will, under the supervisors, of their means of living."

In Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, an ordinance of the City of Baltimore prohibiting the use of steam whistles without the permit of the mayor was held invalid. The objection to the ordinance was that it permitted him to exercise his own discretion in revoking a permit, without general rules to guide or control his action.

In Barthel v. New Orleans, 24 Fed. Rep. 564, an ordinance was held invalid which made it unlawful to maintain a slaughter house, "except permission be granted by the council of the City of New Orleans."

In State v. Mahner (La.) 9 So. Rep. 480, an ordinance of the City of New Orleans forbidding the keeping of dairies within certain limits, except by the permission of the city council, was held to be null and void.

In Newton v. Belger, 148 Mass. 598, 3 New Eng. Rep. 723, an ordinance which permitted the board of aldermen to exercise a discretion in granting or refusing a permit for the erection of buildings within a fire-district was held invalid.

Ordinances, apparently aimed at the "Salvation Army," prohibiting marching through the public streets without first obtaining the consent of the mayor or common council, or some other specified officer, not containing regulations operating uniformly in all processions, have been held invalid in Re Fraxee, 68 Mich. 396, 6 West. Rep. 140; Anderson v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 173; Chicago v. Trotter, (Ill.) 26 N. E. Rep. 359.

It seems from the foregoing authorities to be well established that municipal ordinances placing restrictions upon lawful conduct or the lawful use of property must, in order to be valid, specify the rules and conditions to be observed in such conduct or business; and must admit of the exercise of the privilege of all citizens alike who will comply with such rules and conditions; and must not admit of the exercise, or of an opportunity for the exercise, of any arbitrary discrimination by the municipal authorities between citizens who will so comply. We are of the opinion that the ordinance under consideration is objectionable for the reasons indicated. Having arrived at a conclusion that will necessarily not only dispose of the case, but invalidate the ordinance, we deem it unnecessary to pass upon the other objection to its validity. The ordinance, in its present form, cannot be enforced; and, if another one should be enacted, we must presume that the municipal authorities will, in their wisdom, enact a proper and reasonable ordinance.

Judgment affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

FARIST STEEL CO.

v.

CITY OF BRIDGEPORT.

(.....Conn.....)

1. Compensation must be paid to a riparian owner by a city which in establishing harbor lines appropriates a portion of the land lying between high and low water mark adjacent to his property under a charter which gives power to establish such lines but preserves to landowners the same rights that they have under the section of the charter providing for the opening of highways, where the latter section makes full provision for compensation for whatever damage a landowner may suffer.
2. The establishment of harbor lines by a city under power conferred by its charter will not preclude it from altering them by the subsequent establishment of new ones, as proper occasion may require, without further legislative authority, and the legal discontinuance of the old lines will be accomplished by the legal establishment of new ones without any specific declaration of discontinuance.
3. Under a charter provision that harbor lines established by a city may be laid out and designated by a committee appointed by the city council for that purpose, no legal layout can be made by the adoption by the council of a mere recommendation by the committee of the acceptance of a resolution previously passed by the council to the effect that the lines be laid out.
4. Although the presumption is that the establishment of harbor lines is for a public use in the interest of navigation, yet if the record shows that their purpose was to prevent a new bridge from being marred by the erection of structures on either side of and connected with it, the proceedings will be held void.

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for Fairfield County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors of an appeal from the action of the common council of Bridgeport in establishing harbor lines and assessing damages therefor. Judgment for appellant advised.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Morris W. Seymour, A. M. Tallmadge and H. H. Knapp, with Messrs. D. B. Lockwood and A. B. Beers, for appellant:

Though the Legislature has given power to establish harbor lines it nowhere in express terms gives the power to discontinue or alter such lines.

Municipal corporations have no inherent powers respecting wharves and docks; all their powers respecting them must be derived from the Legislature.

The plaintiff is owner in fee of certain real estate consisting of upland, and is a riparian owner of the mud-flats, adjacent thereto. For taking our mud-flats and depriving us at certain states of the tide of access to the channel, we claim we are clearly and legally entitled to substantial damages.

The Commonwealth has sovereign dominion, jurisdiction, and ownership over the seashore.

The State by virtue of such sovereignty establishes harbor lines and regulates the erection of wharves upon the shore (State v. Sargent, 45 Conn. 373; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 58; Engs v. Peckham, 11 R. I. 226); appoints harbor masters (Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 349); establishes a board of harbor commissioners (State v. Sargent, 45 Conn. 360); incorporates a company to remove obstructions to navigation (Hollister v. Union Co. 9 Conn. 436); regulates drawbridges and dams (New Haven & E. H. Toll Bridge Co. v. Bunnell, 4 Conn. 54; Holyoke W. P. Co. v. Lyman, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 138); controls the construction of public works in navigable waters.

All this may be done without making any compensation to the riparian owner because the State owns the land below high-water mark, while the riparian owner has the right to reclaim the same until the State has otherwise decided. Until he has reclaimed he has no title, no property to be taken, hence no compensation to be given.

Seymour, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The finding of facts states that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of certain real estate in the City of Bridgeport, consisting of uplands, and, as a riparian owner, of the mud flats adjacent thereto, on the east side of Bridgeport harbor. It further appears that in the year 1886 the common council of the City legally designated and established a harbor line on the east side of the Bridgeport harbor, which line ran over the mud flats of the plaintiff and others, and assessed benefits and damages resulting therefrom to the respective parties interested. At that time, and for many years before, a bridge existed over the harbor, with which certain buildings were connected along the sides of the east end thereof. In pursuance of a vote of the common council passed December 5, 1887, the City proceeded to lay out a new bridge or public highway in substantially the same location as that of the bridge above mentioned, which new bridge was completed and opened as a public highway about December 8, 1888. At the time the new bridge was completed the buildings along the sides of the east end thereof were connected with it, and still continue to be so connected. On the 3d day of September, 1888, the board of public works made the following report to the common council: "That in their judgment it would be wise, before the completion of the said new lower bridge, to take such action as would prevent the erection of buildings either on the north or south sides of the iron portion of said structure, and connecting therewith on either side. Such action should be taken, however, in accomplishing this purpose as will result in the least injury to private rights. The board suggests the advisability of condemnation by the City, for public use, of so much of the adjoining property as will be necessary to secure the result desired, and recommend that the matter be referred to some appropriate committee for action." This report was accepted, and referred to the street committee by the common council. On the 10th day of December, 1888, the committee on streets reported to the common council on the report of the board of public works, and made the following recommendation: "That such action be taken as will result in preventing the erection of buildings on either the north or south sides of the iron portion of the new lower bridge. The committee fully agree with said board that this expensive and slightly structure should not be marred by placing buildings on either side thereof; and they further report that they have consulted the city attorney in reference to the subject, and, as a result of such conference, have come to the conclusion that the most desirable course to pursue, in order to accomplish the object desired, would be to establish harbor lines on both sides of said bridge." The committee recommended the adoption of the following resolution: "Resolved, that the committee on harbor improvements is hereby directed to take such preliminary action as will result in the establishment of harbor lines on both sides of the lower or Bridgeport bridge, extending from the present harbor lines at the western end of the eastern causeway of said bridge, westerly to the draw of said bridge." This report was accepted and the resolution adopted by the common council. On the 7th day of January, 1889, the committee on harbor improvements reported on the report of the street committee relative to establishing harbor lines on both sides of the lower bridge, and recommended the adoption of the following resolution: "Resolved, that the clerk is hereby directed to notify owners of property and parties in interest to appear before this common council at the council room, on Monday evening, January 21, 1889, at 8.30 o'clock, and be heard in relation to the establishment of harbor lines on the east side of Pequonnock River, as follows: Beginning at a point in the harbor lines as already established, at the old wall or point of rocks, on property belonging to the Farist Steel Company; thence northeasterly in the direction of the common center of Kossuth Street and the new bridge, 340 feet; and thence northerly in a straight line to a point in the harbor line as already established at Howe's dock, at the foot of Howe Street, excepting that so much of said line as may lie upon or pass over the eastern approach to the new lower bridge shall remain inoperative and of no effect." The report was accepted and the resolution adopted by the common council. On the 21st day of January, 1889, the board of aldermen and the board of councilmen assembled in joint convention, and hearings were had relative to the establishment of said harbor line. On the 4th day of February, 1889, the committee on harbor improvements reported to the common council relative to the establishment of harbor lines on the east side of Pequonnock River, a hearing upon which was had before the common council January 21, 1889. They recommended the adoption of the following resolution: "Resolved, that harbor lines be and are hereby ordered laid out and established on the east side of Pequonnock River, north and south of the new lower bridge, commencing at the old wall or point of rocks on property of the Farist Steel Company, and extending northeasterly in the direction of the common center of Kossuth Street, 340 feet; and thence northerly, in a straight line to a point in the established harbor lines at Howe's dock, at the foot of Howe Street. Resolved, that Messrs. John McNeil, Richard B. Cogswell, and Charles R. Brothwell be and are hereby appointed a committee, whose duty it shall be to make such layout of harbor lines, and report in writing their doings to the common council, which report shall embody a survey and particular description of said lines." On the 18th of February, 1889, the committee reported, recommending the adoption of the following resolutions: "Resolved, that harbor lines or dock lines be and are hereby established on the east side of Pequonnock River, in accordance with a map thereof herewith submitted, and the following description of survey: Beginning at a point in the harbor line, as already established at the old wall or point of rocks on property belonging to the Farist Steel Company; thence extending northeasterly in the direction of the common center of Kossuth Street and the new lower bridge, 840 feet; and thence northerly in a straight line to a point in the harbor line, as already established, at Howe's dock at the foot of Howe Street, except in that so much of the line as may lie upon or pass over the eastern approach to said lower bridge shall remain inoperative and of no effect. Resolved, that the mayor appoint appraisers to estimate the damages and benefits resulting from the foregoing layout of harbor lines." The resolutions were adopted and the mayor thereupon appointed appraisers on said layout who proceeded to assess benefits and damages thereon, and on July 1, 1889, reported to the common council. In their report they did estimate, ascertain, and determine that the appellant will receive an equal amount of damages and benefits from the establishment of the harbor line. On the 15th of July, 1889, the common council accepted the report, whereupon this appeal was taken. It seemed to be conceded on the argument that the report of the appraisers, that the appellant's damages and benefits are equal to each other, proceeded upon the theory that he is entitled to no damages on account of the establishment of the harbor lines. The finding states that a tract of land is taken by the layout of the proposed harbor lines, and the appellant is deprived of the use, benefit, and worth of the same, and of all the privileges and franchises connected therewith, without compensation.

The first question, therefore, which we shall consider relates to the general right of the owner of lands abutting on navigable waters to damages for the legal establishment of a harbor line over the abutting flats, between high and low water marks. In Connecticut the public is the owner in fee of the flats adjoining navigable waters up to high-water mark, such title being vested in the public for purposes of navigation and commerce. Simons v. French, 25 Conn. 346.

The owner of the adjoining uplands has the exclusive privilege of wharfing and erecting stores and piers over and upon such soil, and of using it for any purpose which does not interfere with navigation, and it may be conveyed separately from the adjoining uplands. Over it he has the exclusive right of access to the water, the right to accretions, and generally to reclamations. Because the soil, between high and low water marks, is held to be publici juris, the right of the owner of the adjoining upland in it is termed a "franchise." But it is none the less a well-recognized, substantial, and valuable right. It constitutes, as the court says in Simons v. French, supra, speaking of the right of wharfage, like other franchises, a species of property, which, like other property, is alienable by the owner, and alienable as well before the right has been exercised as it would be after a wharf had been actually erected. It is claimed by the appellee that, inasmuch as the fee of the flats is in the State, therefore the State has the undoubted right, by itself or by those to whom it delegates the right to take and use them for any public purpose without giving compensation therefor, so long, at least, as the upland proprietor has not appropriated them to such uses as he legally may. There are cases which sustain such a claim. On the contrary there are cases which hold that riparian owners upon navigable waters have rights appurtenant to their estates of which they cannot be deprived, when once vested, except in accordance with established law, and upon due compensation. This, says Lewis, in his recent work on Eminent Domain, after reviewing the cases, seems the better and sounder rule. It certainly seems more in harmony with our Connecticut decisions that the right of wharfage—perhaps the most valuable franchise attached to the upland—is as much the subject of sale by the owner of the right before it has been exercised as it would be after.

The common council of Bridgeport, in establishing harbor lines, acts under the delegated power of the State. If the State might take the mud flats of the appellant in the legal establishment of harbor lines, without granting compensation therefor, on the ground that it owns them, and if the council, representing the power of the State, might, if it were so authorized, possess the same power, yet no such power is given or intended. The State has a right to give compensation, and to require the city to do so; and this it has expressly done. Section 38 of the city charter provides that the common council shall have power to designate and establish a line or lines on or along either or both sides of Bridgeport harbor or Pequonnock River, or on any part thereof, from the mouth of the harbor to Berkshire mill; and in designating and establishing such line or lines for the purposes aforesaid similar proceedings in all respects in relation thereto, and in relation to benefits and damages therefor, shall be had, and the persons whose land or mud flats are thus taken and appropriated, or who are especially benefited or damaged thereby, shall have the same rights, and be subject to the same obligations and liabilities, as in the case of the lay-out, alteration, or enlargement of highways, streets, public walks, etc., in said city. Section 32 of the charter provides that, before the common council shall determine to lay out, alter, extend, enlarge, discontinue, or exchange any highway, street, public walk, etc., in said City, they shall cause reasonable notice to be given, describing in general terms such proposed lay-out or alteration, and specifying a time and place when and where all persons whose land is proposed to be taken therefor may appear and be heard in relation thereto by the common council assembled in joint convention for such hearing; at which time and place, and at any meeting adjourned therefrom, the common council shall hear all the parties in interest who may appear and desire to be heard in relation thereto. Section 33 provides that if, after such hearing, the common council shall resolve to lay out, alter, extend, enlarge, discontinue or exchange such street, highway, walk, avenue, park, or landing place, they shall appoint a committee, whose duty it shall be to make such lay-out or alteration and report in writing their doings to the common council, which report shall embody a survey and particular description of such street, highway, etc., or alteration thereof. Section 34 provides, if said report shall be accepted, for the appointment of three judicious and disinterested freeholders of the City to estimate and appraise the benefits or damages, as the case may be, accruing or resulting to any person or persons from the taking of such land for public use or from such lay-out, alteration, etc. Said freeholders shall be sworn, and before making any such assessment of damages and benefits shall give reasonable notice to all persons interested of the time and place when and where they shall meet for that purpose. They shall meet at the designated time and place, and at such other times and places as they shall adjourn to therefrom, and shall hear all parties in interest who may appear; and they shall thereupon ascertain and determine what person or persons will be damaged by such taking of land or such lay-out or alteration, and the amount thereof over and above any damages they may receive therefrom; also who will receive an equal amount of damages and benefits therefrom. Thereupon they shall report to the common council. The report shall be continued to its next general meeting and published. Upon the acceptance of the report at the next meeting of the common council the same shall be recorded, and the common council shall cause a notice containing the names of the persons assessed, with the amounts of their respective assessments, to be published, as in the section directed, and such publication shall be deemed to be legal and sufficient notice to all persons interested in the assessments. Section 35 provides that upon the acceptance of the report of the freeholders, the survey and particular description which the charter requires to be made (section 33) shall be signed by the mayor, or, in his absence, by the president of the board of aldermen, and recorded in the records of the board of aldermen. Section 42 provides that any party who shall feel aggrieved by any act of the assessors in making any of the assessments of benefits or damages authorized in the charter, may make application for relief to the superior court or court of common pleas in and for Fairfield County, which court may confirm, annul, or modify the assessments, or make such order in the premises as equity may require. These extracts from the charter show that whatever right the State might have to take the property of the appellant in the flats between high and low water mark, yet it has authorized the council to take it only upon the payment of just compensation therefor; and upon this appeal the appellant has, of course, a right to be heard upon the question of damages, if the other proceedings should be held to be regular, so that a legal assessment can be made. But the appellant not only claims that the assessment gives it no compensation for the taking of its property, and is therefore unjust and illegal, but it also claims that the assessment was invalid, because, to state it generally, there has been no legal discontinuance of the harbor line established in 1886, and because the action of the common council in the matter of establishing the harbor lines in question has been irregular and illegal, so that no lawful lay-out of said lines has been made, and no legal assessment of damages and benefits has been or could be made thereon. The reasons are set forth particularly in the appeal, and are based upon the facts stated in the finding and reservation. We see no good reason for holding that the council, having in 1886 established harbor lines on the east side of the harbor, is thereby precluded from altering them by the subsequent establishment of new lines as proper occasion may require, without further legislative authority. We think, also, that the legal establishment of new harbor lines would of itself be, to all intents and purposes, a legal discontinuance of the old lines, without any specific action declaring them to be discontinued.

We come now to the question whether the harbor lines were legally established according to the provisions of the charter. That instrument, as we have seen above, provides that, in designating and establishing harbor lines, similar proceedings in all respects in relation thereto, and in relation to benefits and damages therefor, shall be had as in the case of the lay-out, alteration, or enlargement of highways, streets, public walks, etc., in said city. That is, as will appear by reference to the proper section, and adapting it to these proceedings, if after certain preliminary steps, the common council shall decide to designate and establish a harbor line, they shall appoint a committee, whose duty it shall be to make such lay-out and designation, and report in writing their doings to the common council, which report shall embody a survey and particular description of such harbor line. By reference to the finding incorporated in the early part of this opinion it appears precisely what was done in relation to the lay-out, after the steps preliminary to the appointment of the committee to make such lay-out had been taken. To briefly summarize it: February 4, 1889, the committee on harbor improvements reported resolutions, which the council adopted, and by which a committee was appointed to lay out the harbor lines, and report their doings to the council. February 18, 1889, the last-named committee reported and recommended resolutions for adoption, which the council adopted. Now the appellant claims that it appears from an examination of the above proceedings in detail that there has been no legal lay-out and establishment of said harbor lines: that it appears, and that such is the fact, that no action whatever was taken by the committee respecting the lay-out and establishment of harbor lines, except to report back and recommend the acceptance of the resolution in substance passed by the common council February 4, 1889; that the committee neither laid out nor established, nor does their resolution purport to lay out and establish, any harbor line, but only to recommend that the same be established by the common council, and that the common council in adopting the resolution, itself laid out and established such line. This precise point, among others, was discussed in Gregory v. Bridgeport, 52 Conn. 40. In that case a petition for widening a highway was referred by the common council to a committee. The committee subsequently reported as follows: "The committee on streets and sidewalks beg leave to report concerning the widening of the approach to the lower bridge, and recommend the adoption of the following resolutions: "Resolved, that the widening of the western approach to the lower bridge from the present north line of the street approaching the bridge, extending along the harbor seventy feet south on a line with the present wharf, and extending from the wharf westerly to the railroad, according to the map and survey thereof made by the city surveyor, and submitted herewith, be accepted and approved, and the same be and become, after the final settlement of assessments, a part of the highway thereto. Resolved, that the mayor appoint a special committee of three judicious and disinterested freeholders to estimate and appraise the benefits or damages, as the case may be, accruing or resulting to any person or persons from said widening." Upon this state of facts the court said: "There is nothing here which purports even that the committee had laid out the widened part of the street. . . . Obviously the report is nothing more than a recommendation to the council that the widening should be made in accordance with the map and survey submitted. Again the court says: "If what was done October 3d [the day the report was accepted] can be construed as a lay-out of the alteration of the street, the lay-out was made by the common council alone, contrary to the express provisions of the charter. The committee simply recommend the alteration described to the common council for their acceptance and approval. The council accepted and approved; and if, by so doing, the alteration was laid out, who did it? The committee, by their report and recommendation, do not pretend to have done it. They described the alteration, it is true, but this was necessary to enable the common council to know what alteration should be laid out. . . . It is clear, if there was any lay-out here, that it was done by the common council, and not by the special committee, as the present charter requires. But there was no lay-out of this improvement, and consequently no basis for the assessment of damages or benefits, and the assessment was therefore void." Manifestly, if that case is still an authority, there has been no legal lay-out and establishment of the harbor line in dispute.

It is claimed, however, that it is overruled on that point by Hough v. Bridgeport, 57 Conn. 290. It is true that it would seem from the case as stated in the opinion that the same question might have been made. If it was, there is no intimation that it was considered and decided, and no suggestion that anything therein contained overruled the point so explicitly stated in the former case. Instead of overruling, it distinguished, the case of Gregory v. Bridgeport from the one then under consideration. The first held that, under the charter, which provides that if, after certain preliminary proceedings, the council shall resolve to lay out a street, it shall appoint a committee to make such lay-out, the standing committee on streets and sidewalks was not of itself, and without such special reference, such a committee as was intended by the charter. In point of fact, as the opinion shows, upon receipt of the petition for widening the highway, the council immediately referred it to the standing committee on streets and sidewalks. That committee subsequently reported resolutions that the common council should order the widening to be made according to plans which it submitted. The resolutions were adopted, and furnished the first indication that the council resolved to make the lay-out. The charter was not followed; no committee was appointed to make the lay-out after the council had resolved that it should be made. The only committee which acted was the standing one on streets and sidewalks, to which the matter was referred before the lay-out was resolved upon by the council. Now, in Hough v. Bridgeport, the standing committee on streets and sidewalks was also appointed a committee to make the lay-out. Relying upon the general statement of the syllabus in Gregory v. Bridgeport, it is evident that the claim was made that such a reference was contrary to the charter. Thereupon the court distinguishes the two cases, and shows that whereas, in the former case, the petition was referred to the standing committee immediately upon its receipt, not to make a lay-out, but to examine and report what should be done, and no committee was appointed to make the lay-out after the council had resolved upon it, yet in the latter case the regular steps in this behalf were taken, and, though the lay-out was committed to the standing committee on streets and sidewalks, it was as a special committee, appointed after the council had resolved to make the lay-out, and consequently the decision in Gregory v. Bridgeport was not applicable. The second point made was that the committee appointed after the council had resolved upon the lay-out was not appointed to lay out the street, but to procure and report to the council a survey, etc. This the court says is a distinction without a difference, and that, taken in connection with its fellow resolution ordering the extension, it is to be construed as a direction to the committee to lay out the street, as well as to procure and report a survey of it. No other point which was in any respect common to the two cases was discussed or decided. If the point made in Gregory v. Bridgeport and in the case at bar, that the council, and not the committee, made the lay-out, was made, the law respecting it, as laid down in the former case, was not in terms overruled. We are not disposed to overrule it nor evade it. Under the charter it is necessary, and upon general principles it is expedient, that a committee should make the lay-out. In theory, at least, it is not a mere formal thing which anybody can do off-hand upon paper, but should be done carefully, and, as far as possible, with a view to the convenience of individuals, even after general directions have been given by the council.

One other point demands consideration. It is claimed that, even if all the proceedings were legal in form, yet there is a fatal objection to the validity of the assessment, in that the case itself discloses the fact that the harbor lines were established and the appellant's land condemned in order that the new bridge, that "expensive and slightly structure, should not be marred by placing buildings on either side thereof," and not for any legitimate public use whatever. The appellant says that, except for public uses, private property cannot be taken even upon the payment of just compensation. We presume that no one will question the correctness of that proposition. The taking of private property in the legal establishment of harbor lines is prima facie a taking for public use. The Legislature so considered it in granting the charter to the City of Bridgeport, and, though that fact is not conclusive, inasmuch as it is held almost universally that whether a particular use is public or not within the meaning of the Constitution is a question for the judiciary, still there can be no question but that property taken in the legal establishment of harbor lines is taken for public use. But the right to establish harbor lines, and to take private property for that purpose, must be exercised in good faith, and for a public use naturally connected with their establishment. Private property cannot be taken for other than public uses under the guise of taking it for public use. There may be difficulty in many cases in applying this rule, as where nothing appears in the proceedings of the purpose for which the lines were established, and the presumption would be that they were established in the interest of navigation. But where, as in the present case, all the proceedings declare the purpose to be an ulterior one, which no one would claim to be a public one within the meaning of the Constitution, when this purpose is spread upon the very records which are laid before us as containing the authority on which the assessment committee acted, we should be shutting our eyes to the real state of affairs, and permitting property to be taken under the excuse of the right of eminent domain in a case where no public use was contemplated, if we should decide in accordance with the appellee's claim. That would commit us to the doctrine that we are bound by the fact that it was a harbor line that was established, no matter for what purpose it appears to have been established, nor how far it is removed from the harbor. We cannot accept that conclusion, but must hold that, whereas it appears from the records themselves, which are introduced to show the facts upon which the legality of the assessment depends, that the harbor lines were laid out for the purpose of preventing a new bridge from being marred by the building of structures connected with it which would obscure it, and not in the interests of navigation or any other public use, private property cannot be taken without violating constitutional rights.

It is unnecessary to consider the other questions which were discussed. Upon those already considered we advise the Superior Court to render judgment for the appellant, annulling the assessment appealed from.

The other Judges concurred.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL
R. CO., Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. Plaintiff, without a ticket, though he had full opportunity to procure one, boarded defendant's train at Faribault, to go to Owatonna, and, when he told the fare collector where he was going, the latter told him the fare was fifty cents, which he paid. This was more than the ticket fare, but six cents less than the train fare. Before the train arrived at Walcott, the first station at which the train was to stop, the collector informed plaintiff of his error in the amount of the fare, and required him to pay the six cents, which plaintiff refused, and the collector told him unless he paid it he must leave the train. On arrival at Walcott, where the train stopped, the plaintiff persisting in his refusal, the collector put him off, and then returned him the fifty cents, less the fare from Faribault to Walcott. Held, that the collector, on discovering the mistake, might, within a reasonable time, require plaintiff to pay the other six cents.

the fifty cents till the arrival at Walcott was not a waiver of the right to require payment of the six cents. Qualifying Du Laurans v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 15 Minn. 49 (Gil. 29).

4. Also that the Company had a right to be paid the fare from Faribault to Walcott, and the collector might retain it out of the fifty cents. Overruling Du Laurans v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co. supra.

5. Also that the collector could not retain the entire amount, and also put plaintiff off, but could put him off only upon first returning to him the fifty cents, less the fare to Walcott, and, having put him off before doing so, the expulsion was wrongful.

(July 7, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Steele County denying its motion for new trial of an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful expulsion of plaintiff from defendant's train in which a verdict had been returned in favor of plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. W. Root (Mr. W. H. Norris, of counsel), for appellant:

Respondent endeavoring to secure from the collector reduced transportation, knowing that such act on the part of the collector would be against the rules of the carrier, and that in permitting it the collector would be disobedient to his rules and instructions, amounts to a fraud on the part of the respondent; and he is not, in such case, entitled to a passenger's rights.

McVeety v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 45 Minn. 268.

It is a reasonable regulation which prohibits persons from traveling upon railroads without purchasing tickets or paying fare, and a person going on the road in known violation of such a rule, and by inducing the conductor to violate it, is not lawfully on the road.

Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 245.

Being unlawfully upon the train for one purpose, he was unlawfully there for all purposes, and the appellant had the right to expel him at any time or place, provided care was taken not to expose him to serious injury or danger.

Wyman v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 34 Minn. 210, 212.

The act of the collector in retaining a portion of the amount paid by respondent as his fare to Owatonna, was no waiver on the part of the company.

Trottinger v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 11 Tenn. 533, 13 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 49.

The collector had not the power to waive the additional ten cents, nor had he the right to receive any sum less than that fixed by the rules and regulations of the company. Knowing this, the respondent was guilty of fraud in tendering any sum less than fifty-six cents, or in endeavoring to persuade the collector to accept anything less than this amount.

Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Carmichael, 9 L. R. A. 388, 90 Ala. 19.

The collector had the right to retain an amount sufficient to pay the respondent's fare to Walcott, even though respondent had not so consented.

McCarthy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 482.

The company was under no duty to immediately, upon respondent's refusal to pay fare, stop the train and expel him.

Harrison v. Fink, 42 Fed. Rep. 792.

Messrs. Amos Coggswell and Sawyer & Sawyer, for respondent:

Du Laurans v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co., 15 Minn. 49 (Gil. 29), is "on all fours" with the case in hand and determines every question that can be raised here against the appellant; and unless that decision is squarely overruled the order appealed from must be affirmed.

Gillilan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, without procuring a ticket, though he had full opportunity to do so, boarded a passenger train of defendant at Fairbault to go to Owatonna. The ticket fare was forty-six, the train fare fifty-six, cents. Soon after the train started the fare collector came to plaintiff, and asked him where he was going, and, on being told to Owatonna, said the fare was fifty cents, which plaintiff then paid him. A few minutes after, and before the train reached Walcott, the first station from Fairbault, the collector came again to plaintiff, and told him he had made an error in the amount of the fare, and insisted that he should pay the other six cents, and, on plaintiff refusing, told him unless he paid it he would put him off the train. Plaintiff still refused, and on 13 L. R. A.

the arrival of the train at Walcott, plaintiff persisting in his refusal, the collector put him off, and, after he was off, returned to him the difference between the fifty cents and the fare from Fairbault to Walcott. Assuming (what, in view of the defendant's regulations posted up in its passenger stations and passenger cars, can hardly be assumed) that the collector had authority to accept for the fare any less than the fifty-six cents and waive the Company's right to full train fare, the receipt by the collector, through mistake, for the full fare, of less than the fare, did not amount to such waiver. The collector had a right, on discovering the mistake, to require the plaintiff, certainly within a reasonable time, on informing him of the error, to pay the remainder of the train fare, just as anyone on discovering a mistake in payment may, within a reasonable time, require its correction. And it was the duty of the plaintiff, on being informed of the error, to pay the remainder of the full train fare, as demanded by the collector. Nor was the collector's retention of the money paid him by plaintiff (still assuming his authority to waive any part of the train fare) until the arrival of the train at Walcott, and while the question whether the plaintiff would pay the remaining six cents or leave the train was an open one (for notwithstanding his previous refusal, the plaintiff might, until the arrival at Walcott, where the train was to stop without regard to his matter, still pay and secure the right to go to his intended destination), such waiver, and especially as the collector insisted on payment of full train fare, and informed plaintiff that he must pay or leave the train. The rule laid down in Du Laurans v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co., 15 Minn. 49 (Gil. 29) to the effect that when a passenger tenders in good faith, on the train, the ticket fare as full fare to his place of destination, and the conductor takes and retains it, he thereby waives the right to require the passenger to still pay the difference between the ticket and train fare, is (assuming the conductor's authority to waive it) undoubtedly correct as applied to a case where, from the circumstances attending the tender, receipt, and retention of the money, the passenger is justified in the belief that it was accepted in full for his fare to the place of his destination. Thus, if the conductor should receive and retain it without demanding more, till the train had passed the place at which he must exercise or abandon the right to eject the passenger for non-payment, the latter would have the right to assume that the amount paid was satisfactory. But it cannot correctly be applied to a case like this. It would be equivalent to the proposition that the collector waived payment while insisting upon it, a proposition contradicting itself.

To determine whether he would pay the difference demanded, or persist in his refusal and leave the train, the plaintiff had until the train stopped at a place where he might be put off. So long as he had that election, the collector might retain the amount paid him to abide it. As soon as it was made, to wit, when plaintiff finally refused at

Walcott, the right of the collector to retain the entire sum paid ceased, except he chose to retain it for the very purpose for which it was paid him; that is, for the full fare to Owatonna. He could not retain the entire sum, and also eject the plaintiff. As precedent to the right to expel him from the train, he should have returned to plaintiff what he was entitled to of the money, and until he did that he had no right to put him off. It is true he returned it to him immediately after the expulsion. But the wrong had then already been committed, and could not be repaired by doing what ought to have been done before the expulsion. We have said the collector ought to have returned to him what he was entitled to of the money (not the whole of the money), because we hold that where a passenger refuses to pay the fare rightfully demanded of him to his place of intended destination, and the carrier puts him off at a proper place, because of such refusal, the carrier has a right to be paid the proper fare for carrying him to that place, and to retain it out of any money the passenger may have paid on account of fare. This is contrary to what was decided (the court being divided upon it) in the Du Laurans Case. The reasons given for the decision in that case were that the passenger does not intend to make a contract to be carried to the place short of his intended destination, where he is put off, and that the carrying the passenger in that case to the place where he was put off was no benefit, but, on the contrary, a detriment to him.

When, under circumstances that imply a request, a railroad company carries a passenger from one point to another, it is no concern of the company, as affecting its right to compensation, that it is or is not to the advantage of the passenger to be carried to and left at the latter place, and it is therefore immaterial. The sole question is, Was the service rendered at the request, express or implied, of the passenger? When one voluntarily enters a train of cars, and expressly requests to be carried to a particular place, but refuses to pay the rightful fare to that place, so that the company has a right to put him off before reaching that place, a request must be implied to be carried to the place where the company may rightfully put him off. His intention must be taken to be to ride to the destination expressed by him, if the company will carry him to that place, without his paying the fare, and, if it will not, then to ride to such place where the company may rightfully put him and does put him off. That in such case he may be carried to and left at such place is what he must be presumed to expect and intend. And he can have no right to expect that the company will put him off, till the train reaches its first regular stopping station. The train need not stop for the mere purpose of putting him off. The facts upon which we hold that the expulsion of the plaintiff from the train was wrongful were established at the trial, and not disputed, so that he was entitled to a verdict. The instructions of the court, assigned as error, going only to the right to a verdict, were therefore, if erroneous, harmless. We see no error in the instructions touching the measure of damages.

Order affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

J. H. ALSUP, Admr., etc., of N. M. Alsup, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

R. M. BANKS et al.

(.....Miss.....)

1. A written lease for five years of a valuable plantation is not terminated by the death of the lessee before the expiration of that time, and his administrator will be liable for the rent for the unexpired term.
2. Reletting real estate at the best price obtainable to a third person, after the death of the lessee, before the expiration of the term, with notice to the latter's administrator, who has abandoned the premises, that he will be held for the rents, and that the premises will be let on account of his intestate's estate, will not constitute an annulment of the original lease, nor release the administrator from his liability for the rents.

(May 25, 1891.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Tunica County in favor of complainants in an action brought to recover rent. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs leased a plantation to N. M. Alsup, in December, 1888, for the term of five years, and in the following October the lessee died. His administrator abandoned the leased premises, and plaintiffs let them to a stranger at a less rent than deceased had agreed to pay, and NOTE.—Lease, not terminated by death of lessee.

Upon the death of a tenant, the lease vests in his executor or administrator. James v. Dean, 15 Ves. Jr. 241; Doe v. Porter, 3 T. R. 13.

It vests for the usual purposes to which testator's assets are applied, and the legatee has no right to enter without the executor's special assent. 1 Wms. Exrs. 60.

Although he does not enter into possession of the premises, he may be sued as assignee of the lease, for the rents subsequent to the death of the lessee. Wollaston v. Hakewell, 3 Man. & G. 297.

If he enters upon the demised premises he becomes personally liable for the accruing rent. Hopwood v. Whaley, 6 C. B. 744.

Where the land yields some profit, but less than the rent, he may tender the amount of such profit or pay it into court. Patten v. Reid, 6 L. T. N. S. 281.

But by assigning the term he may free himself from liability for future rent, and for subsequent breaches of covenant. Taylor v. Shum, 1 Bos. & P. 21. See Collins v. Crouch, 13 Q. B. 542, cited in Wood, Land. & T. § 356, p. 560.

brought this action to recover the difference. Defendant claimed that the lease was terminated by the lessee's death; that it was canceled by the reletting of the premises; and filed a cross-bill alleging the insolvency of the lessee's estate, and asking that plaintiffs pay him, for the benefit of other creditors, the difference between their pro rata share of the assets, according to their full claim, and the amount they realized from the reletting.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. St. John Waddell, for appellant:

Where a contract is executory, and the administrator can do all that the deceased could have done, it may be enforced.

Wood, Land. & T. § 356.

But where the death of a party to a contract puts a stop to his business, and leaves no legal right in his administrator, except to close it up with the least loss to the estate, no recovery can be had against the administrator.

Terrington v. Greene, 7 R. I. 589, 84 Am. Dec. 580.

This was an executory contract, and the administrator could not carry it out.

Chalmers, Probate Law & Practice, § 231, and cases cited.

Mr. Banks took possession, and this was prima facie evidence that there had been a revocation of the contract.

Bedford v. Terhune, 30 N. Y. 453, 86 Am. Dec. 402; Wilbourn v. Wilbourn, 48 Miss. 38; Hardy v. Thomas, 23 Miss. 544. See also Baumgartner v. Haas, 68 Md. 82.

Messrs. Perkins & Percy, for appellees:

It must be proved that the lessor and lessee mutually agreed to a surrender of the term.

Bedford v. Terhune, 30 N. Y. 453, 86 Am. Dec. 402.

The surrender of demised premises by a tenant during the term, to be effectual, must be accepted by the lessor.

Auer v. Pennsylvania, 99 Pa. 870, 44 Am. Rep. 114.

Taking possession, repairing, advertising the house for rent, are all acts in the interest and for the benefit of the tenant, and do not discharge him from his covenant to pay rent.

Breckmann v. Twibill, 89 Pa. 58.

Where acts are relied upon as evincing an agreement to surrender, they should be such as are not easily referable to a different motive.

Martin v. Stearns, 52 Iowa, 845-849; Thomas v. Nelson, 69 N. Y. 118; Nelson v. Thompson, 23 Minn. 508; 2 Taylor, Land. & T. § 507.

Whether the administrator is personally liable where he enters after the death of the lessee, and how he may exonerate himself from that liability, have been inquired into in numerous cases, quite a number of which are cited in the note to Wood on Landlord and Tenant, § 856, p. 560.

It has been held that the administrator may discharge himself from all liability as such by alleging that the term is of no value, and that he has fully administered the assets which have come into his hands.

Wood, Land. & T. p. 561.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

That the demurrer to the cross-petition was properly sustained is too clear to require any 18 L. R. A.

remark. Equally non-maintainable is the proposition that the contract of lease was terminated by the death of the lessee, and that no suit to enforce the same could be prosecuted against his administrator. That a contract of lease for a very valuable plantation, running for a term of five years, does not fall in the small class of contracts ended by the death of the lessee is perfectly clear. The execution of this contract was not with reference to a business which could not be carried on without the personal presence of the lessee. Such a thought cannot be supposed to have occurred to the parties to the contract, for the execution of it was not at all contingent upon the continued existence of the parties, or either of them.

The remaining contention on the part of appellant rests upon the proposition that there was an annulment of the lease contract, by agreement or by implication in law, from the acts of the parties and a surrender by the administrator. The facts are that after the death of the lessee, and at the beginning of the second year of the term, the appellant signified to appellees his purpose not to carry out the contract, and to abandon and surrender up the premises, which was met by an expression of unmistakable unwillingness to that course, by appellees; that soon afterwards appellant did abandon and vacate the premises; that appellees notified him that they would hold the estate of the lessee for the rents, according to the terms of the lease, and that they would let the premises for the account of the intestate's estate, and hold it for any deficiency that might arise; that appellees, after appellant's abandonment of the premises, took possession and rented the place to others, at an annual rental less by about a thousand dollars than that agreed to be paid by the deceased lessee; that appellees did all they could to obtain the best terms in renting to others, and that the price obtained was the highest and best that could be secured. That there was no surrender, in the sense that there was such yielding of possession of the leased premises, by mutual agreement, which worked a cancellation of the original contract and an extinguishment of the leasehold estate, appears certain to us. There can be no reasonable inferences drawn from the facts above recited tending even to show such mutual agreement and purpose. On the contrary, we have the expressed declaration of the unwillingness of appellees to that course, and their declared purpose, in the event of appellant's abandoning the premises, to let them and hold the lessee's estate for the difference between the sum thus obtained and that stipulated for in the lease contract. On these facts, the case seems manifestly against appellant's contention.

Nor do the facts that appellees took possession of the premises, after their abandonment by appellant, and rented them on the best terms obtainable, release appellant from his liability to pay, as the representative of the deceased lessee; for all these acts of appellees were in the interest and for the benefit of the lessee, equally as for the interest and benefit of the lessors. There was no taking by the lessors of possession unqualifiedly and unconditionally, and a dealing with the premises in a manner inconsistent with the continuance of the unexpired lease. True, the lessor might have permitted the premises to remain vacant and untilled, and have recovered the entire rental from the lessee or his representative; but he was not compelled to take this course. He wisely and lawfully took the other course, whereby the interests of the lessee's estate were largely subserved.

The decree of the court below conforms to these views, and must be affirmed.

(.....Miss.....)

A common carrier by water who receipts for goods marked for delivery at a private landing cannot, without excuse or justification, deliver them at another landing without liability for the damages so occasioned. And if such delivery is made with a willful purpose to harass and injure the owner, punitive damages may be recovered.

(June 1, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wilkinson County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for defendants' breach of their contract as common carriers to deliver goods at plaintiff's wharf. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. J. H. Jones and D. C. Bramlett, for appellant:

The evidence clearly established a contract on the part of defendants to carry the freight to plaintiff's landing. The conduct of defendants in refusing to comply with their obligation as common carriers was oppressive and willful. The question of damages should have been submitted to the jury.

NOTE.—Exemplary or punitive damages; when allowed.

Exemplary damages grow entirely out of the nature of the act of the defendant for which the plaintiff recovers. They are given in enhancement, merely, of the ordinary damages on account of the bad spirit and wrong intention of the defendant, and are recoverable with the ordinary damages, under the common allegation that the act declared for was done to the damage of the plaintiff. Hoadley v. Watson, 45 Vt. 289.

Other terms sometimes used are "punitive" or "punitive" damages, and "smart money." These terms are usually employed indifferently in describing these damages. *Hackett v. A common carrier becomes liable to exemplary damages in cases of injury to the passenger by his negligence, only when his conduct has been such as to justly charge him with wanton or reckless indifference to the passenger's safety. Whenever this is the case, the law allows punitive damages, not because the plaintiff is entitled to anything more than strict compensation, but for the sake of the salutary effect which such examples may have in deterring the perpetration of similar wrongs. *Milwaukee & St. P. The conduct and motives of the injuring party are open to inquiry. If he acted recklessly, or willfully and maliciously, with a design to oppress and injure the plaintiff, the jury may, as a punishment, and as a protection to society against a violation of personal rights, award such additional damages as in their discretion they may deem proper. Universal Encyclop. Law, § 1970 et seq.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court below erred in striking out the plaintiff's evidence, and entering judgment for defendants. It is perfectly clear that defendants gave receipts to consignors for two shipments (those from the Red Star Shoe Store and from Durner) marked to appellant, for his landing, at Ft. Adams, and that there was willful refusal to deliver according to contract. It is equally clear that seventy-two other packages, as appears from the evidence of the witness Price, were marked for delivery at Stricker's landing, but, in disregard of the contract, were delivered at another place, without excuse or justification on the part of appellees. For the small damages sustained by appellant in these instances, at any rate, the plaintiff was unquestionably entitled to a recovery. But on the evidence, taken as a whole, it appears that the conduct of appellees, in refusing to comply with their obligations to Stricker to deliver the packages of freight at his landing, after they had undertaken so to do, was not only without sufficient excuse, but was plainly the result of a willful purpose to harass and injure the appellant, and would fairly seem to entitle him to punitive damages to some extent. At least, under the evidence offered by appellant, he was entitled to have had his claim, in both the aspects adverted to, submitted to a jury, and, in the absence of countervailing evidence, he should have had a verdict for such amount as the proofs warranted. While a common carrier by water may not be required to stop at any and all mere private landings, yet when he contracts so to do he cannot be permitted capriciously to disregard his obligation and duty.

Reversed and remanded.

1. An agreement between all the next of kin of one who died a member of a benefit society, before anyone knew in whose favor the certificate was made payable, that the fund should be collected by the administrator and divided equally among them, is sufficiently supported by consideration in the mutual surrender by each of the chance to receive a larger share, and will be binding on the one who proves to be the beneficiary named.

2. An agreement between the next of kin of a decedent that all his property, including money due on life insurance policies, payable to some of them, shall be collected by the administrator, and a certain portion of the proceeds used in the ornamentation and care of decedent's burial lot and the remainder divided equally among the next of kin, will be supported as a family settlement and the beneficiaries in the insurance policies cannot claim their proceeds.

3. An agreement by a man, on behalf of his wife, to a family settlement of an estate in which she is interested, by which certain insurance policies payable to her are made part of the general fund, is ratified by her subsequently joining in an application for the appointment of an administrator and the execution of a power of attorney to enable him to collect the money in accordance with the agreement, and it will be binding on her although the husband had no authority to make it.

BILL of interpleader against the administrator and next of kin of Duncan Campbell, deceased, to determine who is entitled to the proceeds of certain benefit certificates which he had taken out in his lifetime. Judgment in favor of the administrator.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank H. Jackson and John Haskell Butler for complainant.

Messrs. Cooke & Angell, for J. I. Greenhalgh and wife:

Upon the death of Duncan Campbell this fund was a chose in action. It was due to Phebe A. Greenhalgh exclusively. It was hers individually. It was no part of the estate of Duncan Campbell.

Etna L. Ins. Co. v. Mason, 14 R. I. 588; Holland v. Taylor, 9 West. Rep. 606, 111 Ind. 12, 6 Am. Prob. Rep. 536, and cases cited in foot note.

The agreement signed by her husband purporting to be for his wife, was void ab initio. Pub. Stat. chap. 166.

The husband was prevented by the statute from reducing the fund to "possession."

Arnold v. Ruggles, 1 R. I. 165.

The agreement was in excess of his powers because made in ignorance of the fact that his wife was the only loser by the scheme and to what amount she would lose by it.

If the husband had been duly authorized to include such funds, the agreement, however worded, would still be void, because revoked before acted upon.

The brothers of Mrs. Greenhalgh procured this agreement with a motive of personal gain and expected to gain by it, but these are not considerations.

Philpot v. Gruninger, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 577, 20 L. ed. 744.

In spite of all probable opposition even, everything would have been compulsory upon the administrator that this agreement called for, except the application of these funds. Even a court of law would brand this as unconscionable and void.

Mr. John J. Arnold for the other respondents.

Matteson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill of interpleader to determine to whom shall be paid a benefit fund of $1,000 due from the complainant on account of the death of Duncan Campbell, one of its members. This fund is claimed on the one hand by the respondent John H. Campbell, administrator of the estate of the deceased, by virtue of an agreement entered into as herein set forth, and on the other hand by the respondent Phebe A. Greenhalgh, wife of the respondent James I. Greenhalgh, who, under the name of Phebe A. Metcalf (her name prior to her marriage with Greenhalgh), is designated as a beneficiary in the certificate of membership issued by the complainant to the deceased. The deceased died December 7, 1887, unmarried, leaving as his next of kin the respondents, Catherine Campbell, his mother; John H. Campbell, Frank E. Campbell, his brothers; and Phebe A. Greenhalgh, his sister. On December 12, 1887, a meeting was held, at which all the respondents except Mrs. Greenhalgh were present, for the purpose of arranging for the settlement of his estate. At this meeting an agreement was entered into by which it was provided that John H. Campbell should be appointed administrator; that he should pay all bills owed by the deceased at his death;

Where the compromise is voluntary, and there is the absence of fraud or imposition, it will be upheld however disadvantageous. Ackerman v. Ackerman, 44 N. J. L. 174; Steele v. White, 2 Paige, 478, 2 L. ed. 996.

The party compromising cannot be relieved from it, although he shows that it was not beneficial to him, or that he had the right to recover in the suit in point of law. Brooklyn Bank v. Waring, 2 Sandf. Ch. 5, 7 L. ed. 484.

Where there is a real controversy between parties, and the case is one of any doubt, the court will not set aside a compromise fairly made by them, though it should afterwards appear that one has thereby received property to which he was not legally entitled. Jordan v. Stevens, 51 Me. 78; See 13 L. R. A.

Trigg v. Read, 5 Humph. 529. See Day v. Stær, Clarke, Ch. 199, 7 L. ed. 91.

A doubtful claim prosecuted in good faith is a good consideration for a promise made on compromising and settling it; and the promise cannot be impaired by showing that the claim was invalid. Brooklyn Bank v. Waring, supra.

Compromise of family disputes is favored.

The compromise, among the members of the same family, of disputed claims with reference to family property, has always been regarded by the courts as constituting a valid consideration for the contracts entered into effecting the settlement. Adams v. Adams, 70 Iowa, 258. See Stapilton v. Stapilton, 1 Atk. 2; Westby v. Westby, 2 Drew. & W. 502; Zane v. Zane, 6 Munt. 406; Paris v. Dexter, 15 Vt. 379; Cruger v. Douglas, 4 Edw. Ch. 438, 6 L. ed. 930.

that he should put in order the burial lot in Swan Point cemetery according to the rules and regulations of the cemetery; that a suitable head-stone should be erected to the memory of the deceased, at a cost not exceeding $100; that the administrator should have orders on the different organizations to which the deceased belonged for the full amount of insurance in such organizations, and that the moneys collected thereon, or from any other source, should be placed in a general fund; that the sums required for the purposes specified, and also to provide for the perpetual care of the burial lot, should be paid by the administrator out of such general fund; and that the next of kin should share equally in the residue, no matter to whom the certificates of membership held by the deceased in the several societies might have been made payable. Mrs. Greenhalgh was represented at this meeting by her husband, and he entered into and signed the agreement in her behalf. The valuable papers of the deceased were contained at the time of his death in a package kept in the safe of the Providence Gas Company. These papers were taken by John H. Campbell to the meeting; but the package was not opened until the signing of the agreement, and none of the respondents knew, until after the package was opened, who had been named as beneficiary in the certificates of membership. Pursuant to the agreement, John H. Campbell was subsequently appointed administrator, and accepted the office, Mrs. Greenhalgh and her husband both signing the application for his appointment. Powers of attorney from Mr. and Mrs. Greenhalgh to the administrator, dated December 19, 1887, were prepared and executed, authorizing him to demand, recover, receive, and receipt for all sums of money due or payable to Mrs. Greenhalgh, formerly Phebe A. Metcalf, from the societies of which the deceased was a member, by reason of his death. These powers of attorney were subsequently left by the administrator with these societies; but before the moneys due from them had been paid to the administrator Mr. and Mrs. Greenhalgh caused notices to be served upon the different societies revoking the powers of attorney, and forbidding the payment of the moneys. The administrator first learned of the revocation of the powers of attorney about the first of the following February or March, and had in the mean time, on the faith of the agreement, ordered a head-stone, and contracted for the improvement of the burial lot, and for its perpetual care. The complainant declined to pay the money to Mrs. Greenhalgh without the surrender of the certificate issued by it to the deceased.

Mrs. Greenhalgh thereupon requested the administrator to deliver the certificate to her, but the administrator refused to comply with her request. Up to this time the certificate had remained, without objection, in the possession of the administrator. No adjustment of the matter having been made by the respondents, the complainant, after a year or more had elapsed, filed this bill.

In behalf of Mrs. Greenhalgh it is contended that the agreement was void for want of consideration. The purpose of the agreement was to provide for the settlement of the affairs of the deceased, and the amicable distribution among his next of kin of the surplus of his estate, including the benefit funds of the several societies referred to, after payment of his debts, and the sums required for the objects specified. The distribution was not unreasonable, for it was an equal distribution among the next of kin, and the same which the law makes of intestate estates. There is no charge of fraud or undue influence, and, so far as the testimony discloses, all of the parties to the agreement were possessed of equal knowledge, and stood upon an equal footing. In the uncertainty as to who had been named as beneficiary or beneficiaries, each was willing to surrender his chance of getting a larger share, or the whole, for the certainty of an equal share with the others. If there was no other consideration for the agreement than this mutual surrender by each of his or her chance to receive a larger share, we think the agreement could be supported. There are numerous cases of compromises of doubtful or disputed rights, not only between members of families, but between strangers, which rest upon no other consideration than the surrender by the parties of a portion of such doubtful or disputed rights, and which have been upheld, though it may have appeared upon subsequent investigation or adjudication that one of the claimants had no right, or not so great a right as the share he received by the compromise, in the property in doubt or in controversy. In Dunnage v. White, 1 Swanst. 137, 151, 152, the master of the rolls remarks: "Undoubtedly parties entitled in different events may, while the uncertainty exists, each taking his chance, effect a valid compromise." The agreement in the case at bar was not strictly a compromise, since at the time it was made no dispute had arisen between the parties, and neither had made any claim to any greater share in the whole or any part of the estate than the others. There are, however, cases which do not involve any element of disputed right, and which, therefore, were no more compromises than the agreement in question, which rest upon the consideration of a mutual chance.

In Beckley v. Newland, 2 P. Wms. 182, the complainant and respondent had married sisters, who were cousins and presumptive heirs of a Mr. Turgis, a very rich man. Turgis made a will, in which he left a large estate, real and personal, to the respondent, but only a small real estate to the complainant. Before the execution of the will the complainant and respondent had entered into articles by which they agreed that whatever should be given to either should be equally divided. The Lord Chancellor said: "A performance of these articles ought to be decreed, though there was no other consideration for them than the mutual benefit of the chance."

In Harwood v. Tooke, 2 Sim. 192, the complainant was a nephew, heir-at-law, and one of the next of kin of William Tooke, a man of large property. The respondent was not related to William Tooke, but was an intimate friend. The complainant and respondent, both having expectations from him, agreed by parol to divide equally whatever he might leave them. He died in 1802, having left a much larger portion of his property to the complainant than to the respondent. The respondent, not wishing to hold the complainant to the full extent of their agreement, proposed to accept £4,000 in satisfaction of his claims, and the complainant gave him a promissory note for that sum. The respondent afterwards indorsed the note to Sir Francis Burdett as the consideration for the purchase of an annuity. The bill prayed that the note might be declared to have been unduly obtained from the complainant, and without good or valuable consideration, and that it might be delivered up to be canceled, and that the defendant might be restrained from using, applying, negotiating, or paying it away, or bringing an action against the complainant respecting the note. Lord Eldon granted the injunction, and the money was paid into the court; but subsequently, upon hearing, dismissed the bill, and upon rehearing the decree of dismissal was affirmed. In Wethered v. Wethered, 2 Sim. 183, two sons agreed to divide equally whatever property they might receive from their father in his lifetime, or become entitled to under his will or by descent or otherwise from him. It was held that the agreement was not against public policy, and would be enforced in equity.

But there is a class of cases of family arrangements, relating to the settlement of property, in which there is no question of doubtful or disputed rights, and in regard to which a peculiar equity has been administered, in that they have been supported upon grounds which would hardly have been regarded as sufficient if the transaction had occurred between strangers. In these cases the motive of the arrangements was to preserve the honor or peace of families or the family property. When such a motive has appeared, the courts have not closely scrutinized the consideration. Trigg v. Read, 5 Humph. 529, 546; Burkholder's App. 105 Pa. 31; Wilen's App. Id. 121; Walworth v. Abel, 52 Pa. 370; Farnsworth v. Dinmore, 2 Swan, 38; Williams v. Williams, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 294, 304; Houghton v. Houghton, 15 Beav. 278; Wycherley v. Wycherley, 2 Eden, 175; Frank v. Frank, 1 Ch. Cas. 84; Slupillon v. Stapillon, 1 Atk. 2; Pullen v. Ready, 2 Atk. 587; Cory v. Cory, 1 Ves. Sr. 19; Head v. Godlee, Johns. V. C. 536, 569.

In the case at bar the motive for the agreement was, as we have seen, to provide, among other things, for the amicable distribution among the respondents of the surplus of his estate, including the moneys payable on the benefit certificates, after the payment of debts, etc. This motive constituted a sufficient consideration within the law relating to family arrangements, and the agreement is therefore sustainable as a family arrangement.

In Houghton v. Houghton, 15 Beav. 278, 300, it is said: "If the transaction is one which tends to the peace and security of the family, to the avoiding of family disputes and litigation, or to the preservation of the family property, the principles by which such transactions must be tried are not those applicable to dealings between strangers, but such as upon the most comprehensive experience have found to be most for the interest of families."

Williams v. Williams, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 294, was a case the facts in which were as follows: A. died in 1831, possessed of real estate held in socage, gavelkind, and borough English tenures, and also of leaseholds, stock in trade, and other personal property. He made a will by which, after certain provisions for his wife, he gave all his property to his two sons equally, but, the will being incomplete was refused probate. At an interview between the brothers shortly after the will had been refused probate, the elder brother declared that the invalidity of the will should make no difference, and that the property should not be "mine or thine, but ours." No agreement in writing was made, but for twenty years after the death of A. the two sons carried on the partnership together, and dealt with the whole property, real and personal, as if it belonged to them equally. The widow never insisted upon her rights in her husband's property. In 1851 the partnership was dissolved. The younger brother having died, his representatives brought two suits,—the first to determine the rights of the two brothers in certain real estates, alleging that a family arrangement had been made between them that they should be equally entitled to those estates; the second to take the accounts of the partnership which had been carried on between the two brothers. The elder brother, the respondent, denied any such arrangement as was alleged. The vice-chancellor held that such a course of dealing had been proved as established the existence of a family arrangement which the court would uphold, and declared the complainant entitled to the relief prayed. The respondent appealed from this decree. Turner, Lord Justice, in his opinion affirming the decree of the vice-chancellor, remarks: "Nor do I think there was any want of consideration. The vice-chancellor has, and I think correctly, rested this part of the case upon the footing of the cases as to family arrangements. They extend, as I apprehend, much further than is contended for on the part of the appellant, and apply, as I conceive, not merely to cases in which arrangements are made between members of a family for the preservation of its peace, but to cases in which arrangements are made between them for the preservation of its property." He then refers to the resettlement of family estates upon an arrangement between father and the eldest son on his attaining 21 as a branch of these cases, and adds: "Certainly this court does not in such cases inquire into the quantum of consideration." Wycherley v. Wycherley, 2 Eden, 175, was a case of the resettlement of property, in which a son upon his marriage had joined with his father in the resettling of the estate, and by a memorandum executed at the same time agreed to secure £500 to each of his sisters. It was held that there was a sufficient consideration for the court to decree specific performance of this agreement. The Lord Chancellor said: "I think the present was not a mere voluntary agreement, and the court will (and I am warranted by the precedents to say that it has done so) attend to slight considerations for confirming family settlements and modifications of property. They pay a regard to reasonable motives and honorable intentions. In these cases they will not weigh the value of the consideration. They consider the ease and comfort and security of families as sufficient consideration." But, independently of the considerations above mentioned, the agreement provides for putting in order the burial lot and also for its perpetual care. These are matters outside of the administration. Each of the parties to the agreement, presumably on the faith of it, has, by signing it, consented to the reduction of his or her distributive share of the estate by his or her proportion of the sums required for those purposes. It is possible that but for the agreement this consent would not have been given. This, of itself, would seem to furnish a sufficient consideration, and, as we have seen above, in cases of family arrangements courts do not inquire into the quantum of the consideration.

It is further contended in behalf of Mrs. Greenhalgh that it clearly appears from the testimony that the only authority that her husband had was to represent her in relation to Duncan Campbell's estate, and not to give away her separate property; and that this fund was no part of his estate, but a gift from him to her. There would be some force in the suggestion were it not that Mrs. Greenhalgh subsequently joined in the application for the appointment of the administrator and in the execution of the powers of attorney to the administrator for the collection of the moneys in pursuance of the agreement, and thereby ratified the making of the agreement by her husband and cured the lack of authority, if the lack existed. The counsel for Mrs. Greenhalgh further contend that the fund in question, being a chose in action, could not be conveyed by Mr. and Mrs. Greenhalgh, but could only be disposed of by a trustee of her estate, appointed under R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 166, § 18, or § 22. A chose in action is personal estate. R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 166, § 6, authorizes any married woman to sell or convey, or to make contracts respecting the sale and conveyance of any of her personal property other than that described in section 5 of the same chapter, with the same effect, and with the same rights, remedies, and liabilities, as if she was sole and unmarried. The personal estate described in section 5, though it embraces some choses in action, does not include such a chose as the fund in question. We are of the opinion that the signing of the agreement and the subsequent ratification of it by Mrs. Greenhalgh, the execution and delivery of the power of attorney to collect the money, and the leaving of the certificate with the administrator for the purpose of enabling him to collect the money, were consistent only with an intention to transfer the fund to the administrator under the agreement, and operated as an equitable assignment of the fund accordingly. Clemson v. Davidson, 5 Binn. 391, 398; Spain v. Hamilton, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 604-624, 17 L. ed. 619-625; Newby v. Hill, 2 Met. (Ky.) 530-532; Wiggins v. McDonald, 18 Cal. 126, 127; Garnsey v. Gardner, 49 Me. 167, 171, 172; Wallace v. Walter Heywood Chair Co. 16 Gray, 209.

We are further of the opinion that, an equitable assignment of the fund having thus been made, the power of attorney was coupled with an interest, and therefore not revocable.

We decide that the respondent John H. Campbell, administrator, is entitled to the fund in suit.

v.

John Scott WILSON, Appt.

(...Cal....)

A stockbroker who receives stock from one who has stolen it, sells the same and pays over the proceeds to his principal, is liable to the true owner for its value although he has acted in good faith, without notice, and in reliance on the thief's representations of ownership.

(Beatty, Ch. J., and Paterson, J., dissent.)

(July 1, 1891.)

NOTE.—Rights of the owner of stolen stock certificates.

Different rules from those affecting negotiable paper obtain as regards stock certificates indorsed in blank and subsequently lost or stolen. A purchaser of such certificates is not in any sense a bona fide holder for value or entitled to protection, nor is any subsequent purchaser of that identical certificate. The real owner may compel the corporation which originally issued the certificate to register the stock as his on its books, or he may have an action for damages against a bona fide transferee of the thief where such transferee sold with notice. Bartow v. Savage Min. Co. 64 Cal. 388; Winter v. Belmont Min. Co. 59 Cal. 428; Anderson v. Nicholas, 28 N. Y. 600; Biddle v. Bayard, 13 13 L. R. A.

Pa. 150; Given's App. (Pa.) Nov. 5, 1888; Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 368.

If the principal is a wrong-doer, the agent is a wrong-doer also. A person is guilty of a conversion who sells the property of another without authority from the owner, notwithstanding he acts under the authority of one claiming to be the owner, and is ignorant of such person's want of title. Kimball v. Billings, 55 Me. 147; Koch v. Branch, 44 Mo. 543; Hoffman v. Carow, 22 Wend. 285.

Simply intrusting the possession of a chattel to another as depositary, pledgee or other bailee, or even under a conditional executory contract of sale, is clearly insufficient to preclude the real owner from reclaiming his property, in case of an APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain mining stock which defendant had sold, and delivered its proceeds to a third person. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

A stock broker who sells and transfers stolen stock cannot escape liability by paying the proceeds of such sale to the thief.

De Haven, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was the owner of 100 shares of stock of a mining corporation, issued to one H. B. Parsons, trustee, and properly indorsed by him. This stock was stolen from plaintiff by an employé in his office, and delivered for sale to the defendant, who was engaged in the business of buying and selling stocks on commission. At the time of placing the stock in defendant's possession, the thief represented himself as its owner, and the defendant relying upon this representation, in good faith, and without any notice that the stock was stolen, sold the same in the usual course of business, and subsequently, still without any notice that the person for whom he had acted in making the sale was not the true owner, paid over to him the net proceeds of such sale. Thereafter the plaintiff brought this action to recover the value of said stock, alleging that the defendant had converted the same to his own use, and, the facts as above stated appearing, the court in which the action was tried gave judgment against defendant for such value, and from this judgment, and an order refusing him a new trial, the defendant appeals. It is clear that the defendant's principal did not by stealing plaintiff's property acquire any legal right to sell it, and it is equally clear that the defendant, acting for him and as his agent, did not have any greater right, and his act was therefore wholly unauthorized, and in law was a conversion of plaintiff's property. "It is no defense to an action of trover that the defendant acted as the agent of another. If the principal is a wrong-doer, the agent is a wrong-doer also. A person is guilty of a conversion who sells the property of another without authority from the owner, notwithstanding he acts under the authority of one claiming to be the owner, and is ignorant of such person's want of title." Kimball v. Billings, 55 Me. 147; Coles v. Clark, 3 Cush. 399; Koch v. Branch, 44 Mo. 542.

In Stephens v. Ellwall, 4 Maule & S. 259, this principle was applied where an innocent clerk received goods from an agent of his employer, and forwarded them to such employer abroad; and, in rendering his decision on the case presented, Lord Ellenborough uses this language: "The only question is whether this is a conversion in the clerk, which undoubtedly was so in the master. The clerk acted under an unavoidable ignorance and for his master's benefit, when he sent the goods to his master; but, nevertheless, his acts may amount to a conversion; for a person is guilty of conversion who intermeddles with my property, and disposes of it, and it is no answer that he acted under the authority of another, who had himself no authority to dispose of it."

To hold the defendant liable, under the circumstances disclosed here, may seem upon first impression to be a hardship upon him. But it is a matter of every day experience that one cannot always be perfectly secure from loss in his dealings with others, and the defend-unauthorized disposition of it by the person so intrusted. Ballard v. Burgett, 40 N. Y. 314.

The mere possession of chattels, by whatever means acquired, if there be no other evidence of property or authority to sell from the true owner, will not enable the possessor to give a good title. Covill v. Hill, 4 Denio, 323.

Where the stock sold and converted was indisputably the property of another, the purchaser acquires no title thereto by the delivery thereof to him by the person who purloined the same. He has no greater or better title to it than that possessed by the person from whom he received it. Mechanics Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 599; Anderson v. Nicholas, 28 N. Y. 600.

Certificates of stock of an incorporated company are within the statutory definition of personal property, and are the subjects of larceny. People v. Griffin, 38 How. Pr. 475.

Where an owner has been deprived of his stock without either his consent or negligence, and by means of a forged power of attorney, he may compel the corporation to issue a certificate to him equal to the amount of shares lost or stolen and to pay him the dividends accruing thereon. *Ashby v. Stock certificates are denied the attributes of negotiability such as characterize bills of exchange or promissory notes. Title, however, may pass to the transferee by the indorsement and delivery of the owner, but not without his consent; and it cannot pass under a forged power of attorney. Davis v. Bank of England, 2 Bing. 398; Pollock v. National Bank, 7 N. Y. 274.

Even a stolen bank note may be recovered from anyone not a bona fide holder. Solomons v. Bank of England, 13 East, 185, note; Mechanics Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 621; Sherwood v. Meadow Valley Min. Co. 50 Cal. 412.

Where a stock certificate, having attached to it a blank power of attorney authorizing its transfer, which was duly signed by the original holder, of whom the loser purchased it, was either lost or stolen, and upon the faith of which a transferee obtained a new stock certificate which he subsequently sold, the purchaser will be protected in his possession of the stock. Mandlebaum v. North American Min. Co. 4 Mich. 465.

ant here is only in the position of a person who has trusted to the honesty of another, and has been deceived. He undertook to act as agent for one whom it now appears was a thief, and, relying upon his representations, he aided his principal to convert the plaintiff's property into money, and it is no greater hardship to require him to pay to the plaintiff the value of this property than it would be to take it away from the innocent vendee who purchased and paid for it. And yet it is universally held that the purchaser of stolen chattels, no matter how innocent or free from negligence in the matter, acquires no title to such property as against the owner, and this rule has been applied in this court to the innocent purchaser of shares of stock. Baratou v. Savage Min. Co. 64 Cal. 888; Sherwood v. Meadow Valley Min. Co. 50 Cal. 418.

The precise question involved here arose in the case of Bercich v. Marye, 9 Nev. 812. In that case, as here, the defendant was a stockholder who had made a sale of stolen certificates of stock for a stranger, and paid him the proceeds. He was held liable, the court in the course of its opinion saying: "It is next objected that, as the defendant was the innocent agent of the person for whom he received the shares of stock, without knowledge of the felony, no judgment should have been rendered against him. It is well settled that agency is no defense to an action of trover, to which the present action is analogous." The same conclusion was reached in Kimball v. Billings, 55 Me. 147, the property sold in that case by the agent being stolen government bonds, payable to the bearer. The court there said: "Nor is it any defense that the property sold was government bonds payable to bearer. The bona fide purchaser of a stolen bond payable to bearer might perhaps defend his title against even the true owner. But there is no rule of law that secures immunity to the agent of the thief in such cases, nor to the agent of one not a bona fide holder. . . . The rule of law protecting bona fide purchasers of lost or stolen notes and bonds payable to bearer has never been extended to persons not bona fide purchasers, nor to their agents."

Indeed, we discover no difference in principle between the case at bar and that of Rogers v. Huie, 2 Cal. 571, in which case Bennett, J., speaking for the court, said: "An auctioneer who receives and sells stolen property is liable for the conversion to the same extent as any other merchant or individual. This is so both upon principle and authority. Upon principle, there is no reason why he should be exempted from liability. The person to whom he sells, and who has paid the amount of the purchase money, would be compelled to deliver the property to the true owner or pay him its full value; and there is no more hardship in requiring the auctioneer to account for the value of the goods than there would be in compelling the right owner to lose them, or the purchaser from the auctioneer to pay for them." It is true that this same case afterwards came before the court, and it was held, in an opinion reported in 2 Cal. 571, that an auctioneer, who in the regular course of his business receives and sells stolen goods, and pays over the proceeds to the felon, without notice that the goods were stolen, is not liable to the true owner as for a conversion. This latter decision, however, cannot be sustained on principle, is opposed to the great weight of authority, and has been practically overruled in the later case of Cerkel v. Waterman, 68 Cal. 84. In that case the defendants, who were commission merchants, sold a quantity of wheat, supposing it to be the property of one Williams, and paid over to him the proceeds of the sale before they knew of the claim of the plaintiff in that action. There was no fraud or bad faith, but the court held the defendants there liable for the conversion of the wheat. In this case it was the duty of the defendant to know for whom he acted, and, unless he was willing to take the chances of loss, to have satisfied himself that his principal was able to save him harmless if in the matter of his agency he incurred a liability by the conversion of property not belonging to such principal.

Judgment and order affirmed.

ERROR to the District Court for Butler County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in a proceeding to punish him for violating the provision of the Statute relating to the registration of voters. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. L. B. Kellogg, Atty-Gen., and E. H. Hutchins for the State.

Messrs. Clogston, Hamilton, Fuller & Cubbison for defendant in error.

Valentine, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a criminal prosecution in the District Court of Butler County, under § 15, chap. 80, Laws 1879 (Gen. Stat. 1889, par. 711), in which the defendant, W. O. Bush, who was the city clerk of the City of El Dorado, a city of the second class, was charged, upon information in two counts, with registering J. N. Hanna as a voter, Hanna not being present, nor appearing in person, nor giving his name, age, occupation, or place of residence. The title to the Act in which the aforesaid section 15 is found, and sections 8 and 15 of such Act, read as follows: "An Act to Provide for and to Regulate the Registration of Voters in Cities of the First and Second Class, and to repeal all prior Acts in Relation thereto." "Sec. 8. No person shall be registered unless he appear in person before the city clerk, at the city clerk's office, during usual office hours, and apply to be registered, and give his name, age, occupation, and particular place of residence, as required to make the proper entries in the poll-books." "Sec. 15. If any officer shall neglect or refuse to perform any duty required by this Act, or in the manner required by this Act, or shall neglect or refuse to enter upon the performance of any such duty, or shall enter, or cause or permit to be entered, on the registry books, the name of any person in any other manner, or at any other time than as prescribed by this Act, or shall enter, or cause or permit to be entered, on such list, the name of any person not entitled to be registered thereon, according to the provisions of this Act, or shall destroy, secrete, mutilate, alter, or change any such registry books, he shall, upon conviction, be punished by confinement and hard labor in the penitentiary, not exceeding one year, and shall forfeit any office he may then hold."

The portions of the foregoing sections particularly applicable to this case are those which read as follows: "No person shall be registered, unless he appear in person before the city clerk, at the city clerk's office, during usual office hours, and apply to be registered, and give his name, age, occupation and particular place of residence. . . .

If any officer [a city clerk] . . . shall enter, or cause or permit to be entered, on the registry books, the name of any person in any other manner, or at any other time, than as prescribed by this Act, . . . he shall, upon conviction, be punished," etc. The defendant moved the court to quash the information, upon the following grounds, to wit: "first, that the Act of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, under which said information is pretended to be drawn, to wit, chapter 80 of the Session Laws of 1879, is unconstitutional, being in contravention of § 16 of article 2 of the Constitution of the State of Kansas: second, that no offense is charged against the defendant in said information: third, that neither of the counts of said information states and charges an offense against the laws of the State of Kansas." The court sustained the motion, and discharged the defendant, and the State of Kansas appeals to this court. No brief for the defendant has been filed in this court, but from the plaintiff's brief, and the defendant's motion to quash, we can probably obtain a correct understanding as to what were the grounds upon which the court below quashed the information. It is claimed, as we understand, that the title to the Act is not broad enough to authorize a provision in the body of the Act creating a criminal offense, or prescribing a punishment therefor. We think it is. State v. Barrett, 27 Kan. 213, and cases there cited; Durein v. Pontious, 34 Kan. 353. The offense in the present case, and the punishment therefor, have relation to the general subject contained in the title to the Act, which is the registration of voters in certain cities, and such offense and punishment are included within such subject, within the meaning of the Constitution. They clearly relate to the registration of voters.

It is further claimed, as we understand, that the information is defective, for the reason that it does not allege any criminal intent on the part of the defendant. Of course, a crime cannot be committed unless the person committing the acts supposed to constitute the crime entertains a criminal intent, and that criminal intent must, in some manner, be averred in the information or indictment, either expressly or impliedly. But when the commission of an Act is made a crime by statute, without any express reference to any intent, then the only criminal intent necessarily involved in the commission of the offense is the intent to commit the interdicted act, and in such a case it is not necessary to formally or expressly allege such intent, or any intent, but simply to allege the commission of the act, and the intent will be presumed. In the present case, the wrong committed was the registration of the name of J. N. Hanna as a voter, without his appearing in person, or being present, and without his giving his name, age, occupation, or place of residence. In such a case, all that is necessary is simply to allege the fact that the defendant so registered the name of Hanna, without also stating that he so registered such name, with the intent to so register the same. It is alleged in the information that the defendant "unlawfully and feloniously" so registered the same. Mr. Bishop, in his work on Criminal Procedure (vol. 1, § 521), uses the following language: "Starkie says: 'To render a party criminally responsible, a vicious will must concur with the wrongful act. But, though it be universally true that a man cannot become a criminal unless his mind be in fault, it is not so general a rule that the guilty intention must be averred upon the face of the indictment.' For, in a large part of the crimes the vicious will appears, prima facie, in the act itself; hence to allege simply the act makes the required prima facie case, and any non-concurrence of the will therein is a matter of defense." And in note 2 to the same section he uses the following language: "Where the act is in itself unlawful, an evil intent will be presumed, and need not be averred, and, if averred, is a mere formal allegation, which need not be proved by extrinsic evidence."

In the American and English Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 4, p. 681) the following language is used: "Where the Statute contains nothing requiring acts to be done knowingly, and the acts done are not malum in se, nor infamous, but are merely prohibited, the offender is bound to know the law, and a criminal intent need not be proved. The intent is immaterial where the Statute declares it a misdemeanor to obstruct a public road. When the Statute does not make intent an element of the crime, intent need not be alleged, although, under general principles, it must be proved; and it is held that one who does that which the law forbids is presumed to have had the criminal intent." In the present case, we think the criminal intent was impliedly and sufficiently alleged by the allegations setting forth and averring the commission of the prohibited acts.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

All the Justices concur.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, in support of which Messrs. E. N. Smith and Redden & Schumacher, for defendant in error, contended:

This section, examined and interpreted in the light of common sense, simply means that no officer shall fraudulently violate the provisions of the Act regulating the registration of voters. To hold that the clerk is guilty under the admitted facts in this case would be such a harsh construction of the criminal law that its enforcement would simply be revolting. Upon referring to other sections of the Act it appears that if the clerk is guilty on the stated facts in this case, every officer in the city is equally guilty; and one half of the city officers in the State of Kansas are liable to prosecution and conviction for the violation of the letter of the law. The statement of such a proposition is sufficient.

See 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, §§ 4-6, p. 679; 7 Crim. L. Rep. p. 278, article by W. F. Elliott.

Johnston, J., on October 10, 1891, delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the original hearing no argument or appearance in behalf of the defendant was made, but upon this application for a rehearing the defendant appears by his counsel, and insists that the information filed against him is inadequate in its averments, and fatally defective in not charging a culpable intent. It is stated, in substance, that he was the city clerk of El Dorado, and that he unlawfully and feloniously registered J. N. Hanna as a qualified voter, when Hanna did not appear in person, or was not present in the office of the city clerk, giving his name, occupation, and place of residence, as the Statute directs. It is stated that, at the hearing of the motion to quash, the county attorney informed the court "that there would be no effort made to show any fraudulent intent on the part of the defendant in the simple act of registering J. N. Hanna, who was at that time a resident and otherwise a legal and qualified elector in the City of El Dorado, but who did not appear in person before said clerk on the day on which he was registered." It is also stated that the district court held that unless "the defendant by his act intended to commit some wrong, either in registering a person not entitled to vote, or intending to injure or defraud a person with a right to vote out of his vote, or intending to injure or defraud some candidate before the election, the defendant would not be guilty of violating the law;" and, as none of these things were contended for by the prosecution, the motion to quash was sustained.

It is earnestly contended that it was not within the legislative intent to punish as for felony every omission or failure of the officers to carry out the minute and minor details of the Registration Act, and that, although the prohibition of the Act was general in its terms, it fairly embraced only the mischiefs which the enactment was intended to prevent. It is therefore urged that the information should contain statements showing a culpable intent on the part of the defendant to defeat the obvious purpose of the statute, or allegations of some acts or omissions of the defendant of a substantive character necessarily resulting in the wrong or injury which the Legislature intended to suppress. The writer hereof is now inclined to think that the allegations of the information are insufficient; but the majority of the court are of opinion that the language of the charge, stating that the act was unlawfully and feloniously done, characterizes it as a crime, and therefore the information is not so inadequate in statement as to be fatally defective. The court, however, does not decide, as counsel seems to think, that every departure from the letter of the Statute comes within its prohibition and penalty, and therefore the hardships which counsel imagine will result from the enforcement of the Act do not exist. It is true that the language of section 15 is sweeping in its terms, and, if construed with literary severity, would embrace the slightest departure from any direction or detail which the Statute contains, however innocent and harmless the act or omission of the officer might be. It is evident from the provisions and penalty of the Act that such was not the purpose of the Legislature. The Act is a general one, giving specific and minute directions and details as to the preparation for and the regulation of the registration of voters in cities of the first and second classes. Minute directions are given as to the various steps to be taken, and the manner thereof, some of which are very important, while others are of less importance; and at the end of the chapter it is provided that if any officer shall neglect or refuse to perform any act required by the Statute, and in the manner required by it, he shall be guilty of a felony, and punished by confinement and hard labor in the penitentiary, as well as to forfeit the office which he then holds. The Legislature doubtless intended to impose upon the officers a faithful observance of the provisions of the Act, with a view of carrying out its purposes; but it will hardly be contended that the Legislature intended to visit so severe a punishment upon an officer, free from any wrong intent, for some slight departure from an unimportant detail of the law, which does not and cannot operate to defeat its object. We may properly look at the mischief proposed to be remedied, and to some extent the severity of the penalty imposed in determining the true legislative intent in framing the Act. It has been held that the purpose of the Registration Act is to preserve the purity of the ballot-box by ascertaining in advance, by proper proofs, who are entitled to vote at an election, thus securing, ten days before the election, the full registry of all persons entitled to vote, which registry can be examined and scrutinized by any interested party. State v. Butts, 31 Kan. 537.

Any substantive act or omission of an officer which appears to operate to defeat this purpose comes within the prohibition and penalty of the Statute; but a strict compliance with a minor detail that could have no such effect was not intended to be punished as a felony. For instance, the Act provides that on January 1st of each year the mayor and council shall procure and open a poll-book for each ward in the city. Would the inadvertent omission to furnish a poll-book until the following day subject these officers to imprisonment in the state penitentiary? The Statute further provides that the poll-books shall at all times be kept in the office of the city clerk. If the clerk should take one book out for repairs after office hours, and return it in time for the opening of business the next morning, would he be liable to a felon's punishment? Again, the Act requires that the books shall be open at all times during the year, except for ten days preceding the election; but, it will not be contended that the clerk must keep them open during the night-time, or be held liable to the rigorous penalties of the Act. This is the more apparent, for another section provides for registration during the usual office hours. If the clerk, as a matter of courtesy and accommodation, should remain in his office a short time beyond the usual office hours, and should then register legally qualified voters, would he be held liable to the penalties of the law. He is required to enter the names of the persons registered in alphabetical order; but if he should, by mistake, fail to enter a name in that order, he would hardly be guilty of felony, although the work was not done in the manner provided in the Act. It is also provided that no person shall be registered unless he appear in person at the city clerk's office, and apply to be registered; but if a qualified voter who was an invalid was driven in a carriage to the city clerk's office, but was unable to enter there, and should call the city clerk out in the street, or should chance to meet him in the street, and there apply to be registered, and the city clerk, knowing that he was unquestionably a qualified voter, should register him, would this deviation from the strict letter of the Statute be within the severe penalties provided in section 15? We think not. These and many other like acts and omissions are within the letter of the Statute; but manifestly the Legislature did not contemplate that such acts or omissions should be punished as felonies. A departure from some directory provision, made without fraudulent intent, and which, in its nature and effect, cannot injure anyone, or operate to defeat or interfere with the purpose of the Act, cannot be regarded to have been in the mind of the Legislature in prescribing the penalties of the Act. Although such departure appears to be within the strict letter of the Act, a consideration of the mischief intended to be prevented, the remedy proposed, and the punishment provided, indicate clearly that such was not the intention of the makers of the Statute. It has already been held that, when the intention of the Legislature can be discovered, it should be sensibly followed, although such interpretation may seem contrary to the letter of the Statute. Intoxicating Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751, 762.

The motion for a rehearing will be denied.
Horton, Ch. J., concurs.

Valentine, J. :

I concur in overruling the motion for a rehearing, but I do not wish to express any opinion upon any matter not involved in the consideration of this question. The fundamental question to be considered is whether the defendant's motion in the court below to quash the information should have been sustained or not; and as to when informations may be quashed, and when not, see the case of State v. Morrison, 46 Kan. —.

The only substantial question now presented is whether the information states a public offense as against the defendant or not. Or, in other words, the question is this: Where a criminal information states and charges everything and all things necessary, under the statutes, to constitute a public offense, and states the same substantially, and almost literally, in the language of the Statute defining the offense, and charges that the acts of the defendant constituting the offense were committed by him "unlawfully and feloniously," does such an information state a public offense or not? Or perhaps, in still other words, the question is this: May a person unlawfully and feloniously violate a criminal statute without being guilty of any offense?

In the case of Wong v. Astoria, 13 Or. 538, it was held that to allege that an act was done "willfully and unlawfully" was equivalent to alleging that it was done "knowingly." In the case of Weinzorpfen v. State, 7 Blackf. 186, 195, it is said, among other things, as follows: "'Feloniously' is substituted for it [the word 'unlawfully'] in this indictment, and is not tantamount to it, but is a word of far more extensive criminal meaning. The act complained of could not have been feloniously, and not unlawfully, done." In the case of Carder v. State, 17 Ind. 307, it is said "that the word 'feloniously,' in the connection in which it was used in the indictment, was identical in its import with the word 'purposely.'" In the case of Com. v. Adams, 127 Mass. 15, 17, it is said: "But the allegation that the defendant maliciously and feloniously incited and procured the principal to commit the felony imports that she acted with an unlawful intent." In the case of Allen v. Hundred of Kirton, 3 Wils. 318, it is said as follows: "Here he [the prosecutor] has alleged in his declaration, and proved at the trial to the satisfaction of the jury, that the same was committed and done feloniously; and that act, which was committed feloniously, was certainly done willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously; for doing an act feloniously is doing it malo animo, viz., with malice. Therefore Sergeant Burland concluded that the declaration was perfectly right; and of that opinion was the whole court, and gave judgment for the plaintiff." In Webster's International Dictionary it is said that the word "felonious" means "having the quality of a felony; malignant; malicious; villainous; perfidious; in a legal sense, done with intent to commit a crime." The Encyclopædic Dictionary says that the word "felonious" means, in law, "of the nature of a felony; done with deliberate purpose to commit a crime." And the word "feloniously" means, in law, "in a felonious manner; with deliberate intention to commit a crime." See also the Imperial Dictionary and the Century Dictionary, substantially to the same effect.

Under the foregoing authorities, and under the allegations of the information, the defendant did all that was necessary to be done, under the statutes, to constitute his acts a criminal offense; and as he did the same "unlawfully and feloniously," he did the same "with intent to commit a crime." (Webster, Int. Dict.); or "with deliberate intention to commit a crime" (Encyclop. Dict.). It would therefore seem that the information ought to be held to be sufficient. Can a person violate a criminal statute "with deliberate intention to commit a crime," and still be innocent and blameless? Where a statute prohibits a thing, and makes the doing of the same a criminal offense, but nevertheless a party does such thing, and does it "unlawfully and feloniously," or, in other words, does it "with the intent to commit a crime," is he still innocent and blameless? Will it be claimed that the Statute in the present case is a bad law, and that the Legislature has no right to pass a bad law, and therefore that the same should be annulled by the courts?

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Frederick HABERMAN, Respt.,

v.

John O. BAKER, Appt.

(....N. Y.....)

1. The mere fact that a map bearing a prior date and showing a road not mentioned in a deed is annexed to a subsequent deed is not sufficient to show that the earlier conveyance was made with reference to the road.
2. A conveyance of land bounded "along" a certain road which was laid out entirely on the grantor's land, but on the margin thereof, carries the fee in the whole roadbed.
3. Lands purchased at a mortgage sale by the mortgagee's administrator c. t. a. in his own name although held by him in trust, take on in his hands the character of the mortgage indebtedness and are as personalty of which he can convey a good title that cannot be disputed by the mortgagee's heirs.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York, affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase real estate. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Robert Sturgis, with Messrs. Daly, Hoyt & Mason, for appellant:

The vendor of a lot carved out of a larger plot owned by him can impose no servitude upon the lot so sold in favor of the portion retained by him, in derogation of his grant, without an express reservation in the grant.

Sloat v. McDougal, 30 N. Y. S. R. 912; Burr v. Mills, 21 Wend. 290; Oakley v. Stanley, 5 Wend. 628.

It is therefore evident that Stillwell had no idea of conveying the fee in this roadbed to Robert L. Bowne, or Charlton or Adams for their exclusive use and enjoyment as against his own use, or that of the purchasers from him.

The courts will not extend the effect of a conveyance, so as to carry title to the centre lines of roads adjoining property so conveyed.

Bissell v. New York Cent. R. Co. 23 N. Y. 61; Perrin v. New York Cent. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 120; People v. Colgate, 67 N. Y. 512; White's Bank of Buffalo v. Nichols, 64 N. Y. 65; English v. Brennan, 60 N. Y. 609; Mott v. Mott, 68 N. Y. 246; Kings County F. Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 87 N. Y. 287; Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 161; Hussner v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 96 N. Y. 16; People v. Jones, 112 N. Y. 597.

Where the vendor fails to show he has a marketable title, a purchaser will not be compelled to specifically perform.

Schriber v. Schriber, 86 N. Y. 684.

Messrs. Samuel Untermyer and Moses Weinman, for respondent:

The intention and effect of the deeds from Stillwell to Bowne and Charlton was to convey the fee of the property in the Stillwell Road and the fee in the adjoining half of the Bloomingdale Road.

Re Ladue, 118 N. Y. 218; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 1890.

Conceding it to be true, for the sake of argument, that after the conveyance to Bowne, Stillwell laid out a road running along his own property, his deed to Charlton would then convey the fee of the entire roadbed.

Re Robbins, 84 Minn. 99; Taylor v. Armstrong, 24 Ark. 102.

Herman Le Roy Edgar, as administrator with the will annexed of William Edgar, deceased, foreclosed the mortgage belonging to the estate. Having purchased the property at the sale, he would be deemed to have purchased it as trustee and he would have a right to convey it without a release from those interested in the estate.

Lockman v. Reilly, 95 N. Y. 64; Valentine v. Belden, 20 Hun, 587.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action, which was brought to compel the defendant to perform his point of an agreement with plaintiff, and to complete his purchase of the plaintiff's land, various objections to the plaintiff's title were raised, and have been more or less discussed. If any of them are substantial, the defendant should not, of course, be compelled to accept the title tendered by plaintiff. Whether equity will enforce the specific performance of such contracts is a matter resting, it is true, in discretion; but it is a discretion which proceeds, in its exercise, upon settled rules, and not arbitrarily. Where the case is one in which the proceeding is against the purchaser at a judicial sale, to compel him to carry out his bid, the discretion of the court may be influenced differently from a case like the present, where the action is upon the private contract of the parties. But this is just; for, in the former case, the bidder is warranted in assuming, not only that the title to the land is readily marketable but also that the judgment of the court has set at rest all questions which might reasonably be raised concerning the validity of the title offered. In all cases I suppose that the quality of the title must be the same; but where the deliberate convention of private parties results in a contract for the sale and purchase of lands, the matter of the plaintiff's right to an enforcement of that contract should be considered more favorably; and if, notwithstanding all the legal questions raised by objections, or suggested from the records, the vendor is found to have the legal title to the premises, and has a legal right to convey, as he has agreed, performance by the vendee must be decreed. That precise rules can be laid down, to be observed in the various cases, where the object is to compel the specific performance of agreements for the sale and purchase of lands, I doubt, and their necessity is not apparent. "The discretion of courts in such cases," to cite the observation of Lord Eldon in White v. Damon, 7 Ves. Jr. 35, and which Sir John Romilly, master of the rolls, quotes in Haywood v. Cope, 25 Beav. 140, "must be regulated upon grounds that will make it judicial." In this case the objections relate to the plaintiff's title to, and right to convey, certain pieces of land, which formerly were included in highways since abandoned. His contract was to sell a distinct parcel or block of land lying between Eighty-Sixth and Eighty-Seventh Streets, the Boulevard, and Tenth Avenue, in the City of New York. At about this point, an old highway, known as the "Bloomingdale Road," skirted, on the west, the lands of which this block is a part, and, in laying out the Boulevard, the old highway was here mainly taken in. From the Bloomingdale Road, at about where Eighty-Seventh Street meets the Boulevard, there led off to the eastward a way, which was known as "Stillwell's Road" or lane. As a consequence of the alternation of lines, caused by opening and regulating the Boulevard, Eighty-Seventh Street, and Tenth Avenue, pieces or gores of land were added to the property of the plaintiff's grantors, to form the present block, to which, from their having previously constituted parts of the abandoned highways, the title is deemed to be in the heirs of Samuel Stillwell. Originally, Samuel Stillwell owned the farm or tract of land of which the block now in question once formed a part, and the lane or road bearing his name was built by him for purposes of convenience of access for himself and to other adjoining parcels of land which he had sold to various parties. It ran wholly upon his own lands and partly upon the northerly margin of the premises in question. For some distance eastwardly from the Bloomingdale Road the land on the other or northerly side of this lane belonged to other owners. The first conveyance made by Stillwell, in the chain of this title, was made in 1803 to John Charlton. The description of the premises conveyed bounded them "along the Bloomingdale Road," and, where they adjoined Stillwell's road, "along said road . . . to the Bloomingdale Road." By such a description a grantor usually is deemed to convey the fee of the soil to the center of the road, where it is the dividing line between properties. In the absence of some express reservation by a grantor of his property in a road, such as would be implied where an easement over it was alone granted, and the description ran to and along the side of it, as it was in Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. 447, or later, in the case of Mott v. Mott, 68 N. Y. 246, a conveyance of lands, generally bounded as along or upon a road, will convey the fee to its center. See Jackson v. Hathaway, supra.

A recent decision of this court, in its second division, made with respect to another part of Stillwell's property, has settled this question of what passed of this private road, in the case of a grantee of land adjoining, and where the description of the grant was "along the lane of said Stillwell, intended for a road," etc. It was held that, under the deed, the fee of the soil was granted to the center of the road when built. Re Ladue, 118 N. Y. 218. To complete the title to all of Stillwell's road, the plaintiff attempts to deduce a title to the further half through the original conveyance of lands made by Stillwell to R. L. Bowne in November, 1796, which comprised a tract extending from the Bloomingdale Road eastwardly, and along the land subsequently laid out and used as a lane. In this deed there was no reference to any road, and the only ground for presuming anything with regard to its dedication or existence at that time was that, in a conveyance of other parts of Stillwell's property, subsequent in time to Bowne's, a map annexed thereto showed this lane laid out. As this map bore a date earlier than that of the deed to Bowne, the plaintiff argues that Bowne's conveyance must have been with reference to the road as shown thereby. I think, however, that such an inference is hardly permissible from the mere fact of the date. Something further was required as proof concerning the map, or of the laying out of the road, in order to ingraft upon the grant to Bowne any such additional right of property. But it is not necessary to depend upon that line of argument in aid of the plaintiff's title to the land formerly comprised within the abandoned highways. From the proofs, I think we must assume that Stillwell conveyed to Bowne with no reference to this lane.

The question, then, is whether, as the road was laid out upon Stillwell's land, a title in fee to the whole roadbed did not pass to Charlton, or his grantees, subject only to any easements in its use as a road. This question, I think, must be answered in the affirmative. That any property in the northerly half of the road should have remained in Stillwell or his heirs would require the support of some presumption, bearing upon his interests, or relating to some necessity in fact, the elements for which, I think, we cannot find. The only interest in the lane, or in its maintenance as such, was possessed by Stillwell's grantees. He had parted with all of his land bordering on the lane. The natural presumption, and one which seems to flow from the established rules, would be that, in bounding his grant to Charlton along this highway, Stillwell had conveyed his fee in the roadbed. Where the highway divides two properties, the owner of each abutting piece is presumed to own to the center of the way. 13 L. R. A.

The presumption is based on the idea that the adjacent owners originally contributed the land for the road, and this presumption assumes that nothing militates against it in the facts of ownership. But, if the grant of the abutting property went only to the side of the road, or the public authorities are vested with the right to the soil of the street, the presumption cannot exist. Dunham v. Williams, 87 N. Y. 251.

Where the highway has been, as in the present case, wholly made from and upon the margin of the grantor's land, his subsequent grant of the adjoining land should be deemed to comprehend the fee in the whole roadbed, upon the same principle that exists for giving the fee to the center in the other cases. The grantor should be presumed to have intended by his conveyance the full investiture of the grantee with all appurtenant property rights in the highways. What other intention could be consistently supposed?

In the early case of Jackson v. Hathaway, supra, it was observed that there was reason for intending that the parties to a conveyance of property bounded along or upon a highway meant to the middle of the highway. Would there not be equally reason for the legal intentment that they meant the whole highway, where it was the property of the grantor in its entirety? Can we suppose an intention in the grantor to reserve to himself, or to his heirs, the fee in half of the highway? I think not. As to the grantor, the control and beneficial use of the road have ceased to be of importance; but to the grantee they must be important, if not essential, for many patent reasons.

The case of Bissell v. New York Cent. R. Co., 28 N. Y. 61, though applied to a case where the question of title related to only half of the street, is authority for the proposition that there is no reason to infer an intention in the grantor to withhold his property in, or title to, the land covered by the highway, after parting with all his right and title to the adjoining land.

Our attention has been directed to several cases in the courts of other States where this question has been discussed and similarly decided, and in some of them the reasoning is upon the authority of Bissell v. New York Cent. R. Co. supra. See Re Robbins, 84 Minn. 99, and Taylor v. Armstrong, 24 Ark. 102, and, as well, Watrous v. Southworth, 5 Conn. 305; Chaplin v. Hindleton, 18 Conn. 28.

I am therefore of the opinion that, under Stillwell's grant to Charlton, the ownership of the soil of Stillwell road, where adjacent to the property granted, passed to the grantee as a parcel of the grant. So long as the road was required as such, and an easement had been acquired by the public, the ownership of its soil may have been subjected to the use. But when, after the year 1846, the public easement had been abandoned, and the highway ceased to exist, the land comprising it reverted to primary conditions of ownership and of use, and became a parcel of the adjoining property, from which it was taken originally. The fee in the land of Stillwell's lane being in the plaintiff, and because of the description of the grant as to the Bloomingdale Road, questions as to the title to the gore produced by the change in the westerly line of the tract by the laying out of the new Boulevard are disposed of. The ownership of the land in the lane carried the fee to the center of the Bloomingdale Road opposite to the lane, and that, with the description along the Bloomingdale Road, comprehended the gore in question. In 1847, Eighty-Sixth Street, but not Eighty-Seventh Street, having been theretofore legally opened and in use, an agreement as to a division of lands was made between John Adams, then in possession of the property composed of the block in question, and Herman Le Roy Edgar, in whom had become vested the legal title to the lands north of Stillwell's Road. The effect of that agreement was to make the south side of Eighty-Seventh Street, subsequently opened, from the Boulevard to Tenth Avenue, pro tanto a division line between their properties. But the appellant interposes certain objections as to the title of Le Roy Edgar, and affecting his right to conclude other interests in the land by such an agreement. After Bowne had acquired the title to the tract of land, of which a portion bordered upon the north side of Stillwell's Road, he mortgaged the same in 1809 to William Edgar, as security for the repayment of a loan. Upon a sale decreed in proceedings instituted after the mortgagee's death to foreclose the mortgage, the premises were purchased by Herman Le Roy Edgar in his individual name. He was, however, at the time, the administrator with the will annexed of William Edgar, the deceased mortgagee, and it is argued that he acquired the title to the premises purchased in the capacity of trustee for those interested in the testator's estate, and that releases were needed to cut off their interests. The point is not tenable, however, for though it is true that he held the property in trust, nevertheless the premises so acquired took on the character of the mortgage indebtedness, and were as personality in the administrator's hands, which he could dispose of and was liable to account for as such. The case of Lockman v. Reilly, 95 N. Y. 64, 71, is sufficiently in point as to this. In that case it was held that whether the executors took a deed in their names as such executors, or in their individual names, was immaterial. The testator's heirs could take no direct interest in the land so purchased, and could not dispute the title of a purchaser from the executors; and this would be so, it was said, even though no power of sale might be contained in the will.

Another objection raised by the appellant is that the mortgagee, Edgar, had taken possession and had become seised of the property by title, which descended to his heirs, and was not affected by the mortgage foreclosure. The point is not discussed, and does not seem serious. It need be but briefly adverted to in answer. It seems to me to be sufficient to say that, while it is true that the mortgagee went into possession of the mortgaged premises, the possessory right gained thereby was to satisfy the mortgage debt out of the property mortgaged. Had the debt been paid before any adverse title had been gained, the possessory right would have ceased, and the mortgagor would have been entitled to repossess himself of the property. But upon the foreclosure of the mortgage by the executor of the mortgagee, it not only appeared that Bowne, the mortgagor, had regained possession of the mortgaged premises within 18 years of the time that his mortgagee had entered, but all claims to any interest therein were expressly waived, except for the amount due upon the bond and mortgage. Further than this, it is to be observed that it was found as a fact by the trial court that the devisees of William Edgar, Jr., to whom Edgar, Sr., the mortgagee, had bequeathed and devised his residuary estate, in which were comprehended the mortgage interests in question, had conveyed all their right, title, and interest to the grantee, Herman Le Roy Edgar. As that grant conveyed the lands, which included the premises in question, by boundaries as rearranged under the agreement of division between said Edgar and Adams, the plaintiff's predecessor in interest, any possible claims outstanding in William Edgar, Jr.'s, devisees were relinquished, and their conveyance quieted all questions as to any land which, by the rectangulation of the line of the south side of Eighty-Seventh Street, would be left between it, the westerly side of Tenth Avenue, and the north line of what was the old Stillwell lane.

I have discussed those objections which seemed to me to offer any legal question requiring an expression of opinion, and I think neither they, nor any others, are material, or disclose any flaw in the plaintiff's title. The appellant, therefore, should be compelled to perform his contract.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT

John T. BRESSLER, Ptff. in Err.,
v.

WAYNE COUNTY.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. The owner of national bank stock,

*Head notes by NORVAL, J.

NOTE.—Taxation of national bank stock.

The authority of the States to tax the shares of national bank stock is derived wholly from the 13 L. R. A.

in listing his shares for taxation, is not entitled to deduct his bona fide indebtedness from the value of such shares of stock.

2. The decision on the former hearing of the case, reported in 25 Neb. 488, is overruled.

(September 16, 1891.)

Act of Congress permitting it. Without the consent of Congress such bank-stock shares cannot be taxed by state authority. McCulloch v. Maryland, ERROR to the District Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to compel the correction of plaintiff's tax assessment by allowing him a deduction for debts owed by him. Affirmed.

A decision was reached in this case and an opinion handed down at the January Term, 1889, which reversed the judgment below and is reported in 25 Neb. 488. A rehearing was subsequently granted, after which the opinion given herewith was handed down.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Northrup & Welch for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. William Leese, Atty. Gen., and J. D. King for defendant in error.

Norval, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is on rehearing, the opinion being reported in 25 Neb. 488. The question involved is the right of the owner of shares in a national bank, having no other credits or moneyed capital, to have deducted, in the assessment and taxation of such shares, his bona fide debts. On the former hearing it was held that, under section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, he was entitled to such deduction. Said section 5219 permits state taxation of the shares of stock in national banks, subject only to two restrictions: first, "that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State;" and, second, "that the shares of any national banking association, owned by nonresidents of any State, shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located, and not elsewhere."

17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579; Osborn v. Bank of United States, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204; Weston v. Charleston, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 449, 7 L. ed. 481; People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539-543, 25 L. ed. 705, 706.

The provision of the National Bank Law, that state taxation on the shares of the banks shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of citizens of the State, has reference to the entire process of assessment and includes the valuation of the shares as well as the ratio of percentage charged on such valuation. People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539, 25 L. ed. 705.

It could not have been the intention of Congress to exempt bank shares from taxation because some moneyed capital was exempt. Hepburn v. School Directors of Carlisle, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 480, 23 L. ed. 112.

The subject was further considered in the case of Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19, 24 L. ed. 300. One of the questions in that case had reference to an exemption from taxation by state authority of bonds issued by a municipal corporation in the hands of individuals. It was held that the exemption did not invalidate the assessment upon the shares of national banks.

Discrimination in favor of other moneyed capital inhibited.

The Act of Congress was not intended to curtail the state power on the subject of taxation. It simply required that capital invested in national banks should not be taxed at a greater rate than like property similarly invested. By the modification of the Act of 1864 by the Act of February 10, 13 L. R. A.

The second limitation is not important in this case, but it is claimed that by not allowing bona fide debts to be deducted, in the assessment of shares in national banks, the State thereby places a higher burden of taxation upon money invested in national banks than is imposed upon other moneyed capital, and therefore contravenes the first restriction imposed by Congress in the section above referred to. The Supreme Court of the United States has in many cases considered and construed the provisions of the Act of Congress which limit the power of the States in the taxation of national bank shares. A reference to some of these decisions will aid in the determination of the question involved in this case.

In People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539, 25 L. ed. 705, it is held that the Statute of the State of New York, which permits a taxpayer, in listing his property for taxation, to deduct the amount of his debts from the valuation of all his personal property, including moneyed capital, except his bank shares, is in conflict with the Act of Congress, in that shares of national banks are required to be assessed higher in proportion to their real value than other moneyed capital in the hands of citizens of the State is valued for taxation. It is further held that the rule of uniformity in the taxation of such shares applies to the valuation of the shares, as well as to the ratio of percentage laid on such valuation. To the same effect is Albany County Suprs. v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305, 26 L. ed. 1044.

In Pelton v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 143, 25 L. ed. 901, it is held that where a state statute provides for the valuation of all moneyed capital for taxation at its true value, 1868, it was intended to provide that the validity of the state tax was hereafter to be determined by the inquiry whether it was at a greater rate than was assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens. Boyer v. Boyer, 113 U. S. 691, 28 L. ed. 1089.

Although, for the purpose of taxation, the state statutes provide for the valuation of all moneyed capital, including shares in national banks, at the true cash value, yet if the tax officers systematically and intentionally valued the shares at their full value, while other moneyed capital was assessed at far less than its actual value, such assessment was in violation of the Act of Congress. Pelton v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 143, 25 L. ed. 901. To the same effect is the decision in Cummings v. Merchant's Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 903.

In the case of Hepburn v. School Directors of Carlisle, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 480, 23 L. ed. 112, it was decided to be competent for the State to value, for taxation, shares of stock in a national bank at their actual value, even if in excess of their par value, provided thereby they were not taxed at a greater rate than was assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State.

When national bank shares had been assessed at their full value, while all other property in the State was only assessed at from thirty to forty per cent of its real value, the court held that the assessment was illegal, and that the bank in its corporate capacity was a proper party complainant. Merchants Nat. Bank of Toledo v. Cumming, Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 928; Morse, Banks & Banking, 587.

But a court of equity will not restrain the collection of a tax upon the shares of a national bank including shares of the national banks, and the taxing officers intentionally assess such shares at their actual valuation, while other moneyed capital was assessed far below its real value, such assessment of national bank stock was in violation of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes.

In Evansville Nat. Bank v. Britton, 105 U. S. 822, 26 L. ed. 1053, it is ruled that under the Statute of Indiana, which allows deductions of bona fide debts to be made from all credits, in listing the same for taxation, the assessing of national bank shares, without permitting the shareholders to deduct from the value the amount of his bona fide debts, is a discrimination forbidden by Congress.

In the more recent case of Mercantile Nat. Bank v. New York, 121 U. S. 138, 30 L. ed. 895, the court, in an able and exhaustive opinion, construed the meaning of the words "other moneyed capital," as used in the Act of Congress. We quote from the opinion: "The key to the proper interpretation of the Act of Congress is its policy and purpose. The object of the law was to establish a system of national banking institutions in order to provide a uniform and secure currency for the people, and to facilitate the operations of the treasury of the United States. . . . The main purpose, therefore, of Congress, in fixing limits to state taxation, on investments in the shares of national banks, was to render it impossible for the State, in levying such a tax, to create and foster an unequal and unfriendly competition, by favoring institutions or individuals carrying on a similar business, and operations and investments of a like character. The language of the Act of Congress is to be read in the light of this policy. Applying his rule of construction, we are led, in the first place, to consider the meaning of the words 'other moneyed capital,' as used in the Statute. Of course it includes shares in national banks; the use of the word 'other' requires that. If bank shares were not moneyed capital, the word 'other' in this connection would be without significance. But 'moneyed capital' does not mean all capital the value of which is measured in terms by money. In this sense, all kinds of real and personal property would be embraced by it, for they all have an estimated value as the subjects of sale. Neither does it necessarily include all forms of investment in which the interest of the owner is expressed in money. Shares of stock in railroad companies, mining companies, manufacturing companies, and other corporations are represented by certificates showing that the owner is entitled to an interest, expressed in money value, in the entire capital and property of a corporation; but the property of a corporation which constitutes its invested capital may consist mainly of real and personal property, which, in the hands of individuals, no one would think of calling moneyed capital; and its business may not consist in any kind of dealing in money, or commercial representatives of money. So far as the policy of the government in reference to national banks is concerned, it is indifferent how the State may choose to tax such corporations as those just mentioned, or the interest of individuals in them, or whether they should be taxed at all. . . . The business of banking, as defined by law and custom, consists in the because a state statute does not set forth in express terms that there shall be no greater assessment upon national banks located within the State than upon the state banks. First Nat. Bank v. Douglas County, 3 Dill. 380.

Capital stock not taxable.

The capital of a national bank is not taxable by the State. National Commercial Bank v. Mobile, 62 Ala. 296; New York v. Comrs. of Taxes, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 244, 18 L. ed. 344; Bradley v. Illinois, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 459, 18 L. ed. 453; Salt Lake City Nat. Bank v. Golding, 2 Utah, 1; Sumter County v. National Bank of Gainesville, 62 Ala. 464; First Nat. Bank v. Douglas County, 3 Dill. 380.

Capital stock as such cannot be assessed. The only way stock can be reached is by assessment of the different shares of stockholders (Collins v. Chicago, 4 Biss. 472), and an assessment on the shares in gross against the bank is not authorized and is illegal. National Commercial Bank v. Mobile, 62 Ala. 294.

A bank is not liable to taxation on its capital under a statute which requires owners of property to return it for taxation (Waco Nat. Bank v. Rogers, 51 Tex. 606; State v. Newark, 40 N. J. L. 568; Waite v. Dowley, 94 U. S. 527, 27 L. ed. 181; Sumter County v. National Bank of Gainesville, 62 Ala. 468; Van Allen v. Nolan, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 584, 18 L. ed. 234); although it is the owner of all the property of the corporation, real and personal (Van Allen v. Nolan and Sumter County v. National Bank of Gainesville, supra); and it is not liable for either state or municipal taxes on the shares of stock not owned by it, but owned by individual stockholders. 18 L. R. A.

Waco Nat. Bank v. Rogers, 51 Tex. 606; 1 Dexty, Taxn. 377.

In Minnesota a state statute requiring all the shares of a national bank to be assessed and taxed at their actual tax value, without any deduction on account of the real property held by the bank, and in which a portion of its capital is invested, does not authorize the taxation of real property, ex nomine lawfully owned and used as a place for the transaction of its business, for tax acts are presumed not to impose a double burden. Rice County Comrs. v. Citizens Nat. Bank of Faribault, 23 Minn. 280.

In New Jersey, to the extent that the capital is invested in the securities of the federal government, it is beyond the power of the States to tax it as against the corporation, for the reason that taxation in that instance would be indirectly a tax upon the credit and securities of the government. State v. Newark, 39 N. J. L. 380; First Nat. Bank of Louisville v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353, 19 L. ed. 701; Van Allen v. Nolan, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 573, 18 L. ed. 232.

The policy of the New York Legislature in regard to the taxation of bank capital and bank shares has been uniform. The stock has been taxed at its nominal value, without deduction for debts or charge for surplus, and, more recently, at its actual value. People v. Dolan, 36 N. Y. 52.

In Wisconsin the value of stock in a national bank, owned by a taxpayer, must be considered a part of the "debts due or to become due" him from which he is entitled to deduct the amount of his bona fide and unconditional indebtedness, in listing his property for taxation. Ruggles v. Fond du Lac, 53 Wis. 436.

issue of notes payable on demand, intended to circulate as money, where the banks are banks of issue; in receiving deposits payable on demand; in discounting commercial paper; making loans of money on collateral security; buying and selling bills of exchange; negotiating loans; and dealing in negotiable securities issued by the government, state and national, and municipal and other corporations. These are the operations in which the capital invested in national banks is employed, and it is the nature of that employment which constitutes it, in the eye of this Statute, 'moneyed capital.' Corporations and individuals carrying on these operations do come into competition with the business of national banks, and capital in the hands of individuals thus employed is what is intended to be described by the Act of Congress. . . . The terms of the Act of Congress, therefore, include shares of stock or other interest owned by individuals in all enterprises in which the capital employed in carrying on its business is money, where the object of the business is the making of profit by its use as money. The moneyed capital thus employed is invested for that purpose in securities by way of loans, discount, or otherwise, which are from time to time, according to the rules of the business, reduced again to money and reinvested. It includes money in the hands of individuals employed in a similar way, invested in loans, or in securities for the payment of money, either as an investment of a permanent character, or temporarily, with a view to sale or repayment and reinvestment. In this way the moneyed capital in the hands of individuals is distinguished from what is known generally as 'personal property.' "

It follows from these decisions that any method of assessment of taxes which prohibits the owner of national bank shares, who owns no other credits or moneyed capital, from deducting his bona fide indebtedness from the value of such shares, and permits the deduction of such debts in the assessment of like property similarly situated, conflicts with the Act of Congress. Was the rule of uniformity prescribed by the federal statute violated in the assessment of the plaintiff in error? In determining this question, it will be necessary to examine some of the provisions of the Revenue Law of this State. Sections 27, 30, and 33 of the Revenue Law are as follows: "Sec. 27. In making up the amount of credits which any person is required to list for himself, or for any other person, company, or corporation, he shall be entitled to deduct from the gross amount of credits the amount of all bona fide debts owing by such person, company, or corporation, to any other person, company, or corporation, for a consideration received; but no acknowledgment of indebtedness not founded on actual consideration, believed when received to have been adequate, and on such acknowledgment made for the purpose of being so deducted, shall be considered a debt, within the meaning of this section; and so much only of any liability, as surety for others, shall be deducted as the person making out the statement believes he is legally and equitably bound and will be compelled to pay on account of the inability or insolvency of the principal debtor; and, if there are other sureties who are able to contribute, then only so much as the surety in whose behalf the statement is made will be bound to contribute: provided, that nothing in this section shall be so construed as to apply to any bank, company, or corporation exercising banking powers or privileges, or to authorize any deductions allowed by this section from the value of any other item of taxation than credits." "Sec. 30. Every bank (not incorporated), banker, broker, or stock jobber shall, at the time fixed by this chapter for listing personal property, make out and furnish the assessor a sworn statement, showing—first, the amount of property on hand or in transit; second, the amount of funds in the hands of other banks, bankers, brokers, or others, subject to draft; third, the amount of checks or other cash items, the amount thereof not being included in either of the preceding items; fourth, the amount of bills receivable, discounted, or purchased, and other credits due, or to become due, including accounts receivable, and interest accrued, but not due, and interest due and unpaid; fifth, the amount of bonds and stocks of every kind, state and county warrants, and other municipal securities, and shares of capital stock of joint-stock or other companies or corporations, held as an investment, or any way representing assets; sixth, all other property appertaining to said business, other than real estate (which real estate shall be listed and assessed as other real estate is listed and assessed under this Act), seventh, the amount of deposits made with them by other parties; eighth, the amount of all accounts payable, other than current deposit accounts; ninth, the amount of bonds and other securities exempt by law from taxation, specifying the amount and kind of each, the same being included in the preceding fifth item. The aggregate amount of the first, second, and third items in said statement shall be listed as moneys. The amount of the sixth item shall be listed the same as other similar personal property is listed under this chapter. The aggregate amount of the seventh and eighth items shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of the fourth item of said statement, and the amount of the remainder, if any, shall be listed as credits. The aggregate amount of the ninth item shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of the fifth item of such statement, and the remainder shall be listed as bonds or stocks." "Sec. 33. The stockholders in every bank located within this State, whether such bank has been organized under the laws of this State or of the United States, shall be assessed and taxed on the value of their shares of stock therein in the county, town, precinct, village, or city where such bank or banking association is located, and not elsewhere, whether such stockholders reside in such place or not. Such shares shall be listed and assessed, with regard to the ownership and value thereof, as they existed on the first day of April, annually; subject, however, to the restriction that taxation of such shares shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon any other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of this State, in the county, town, precinct, village, or city where such bank is located. The shares of capital stock of national banks not located in this State, held in this State, shall not be required to be listed under the provisions of this Act."

It will be observed that section 27 authorizes the individual tax-payer to deduct the bona fide debts owing by him from the gross amount of his credits, and prohibits any deduction from the value of any other item or property of taxation than credits. The word "credits," as used in the section was not intended to include notes, securities, accounts due, or other credits which are the assets of any bank, banker, broker, or stock jobber but was intended to cover debts due the tax-payer growing out of the other ordinary business transactions. We must therefore look elsewhere for the rule which governs the assessment of moneyed capital invested in the banking business. Section 33 declares that shares of stock in every bank within the State, whether incorporated under the laws of this State or the United States, shall be assessed according to their value, subject to the restriction "that the taxation of such shares shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens of this State." This limitation is the same as imposed by Congress upon the States as a condition to the taxation of national banks. So it cannot be said that the Legislature, in providing for the taxation of national banks, has unfavorably discriminated against them. The word "rate," as used in this section, applies as well to the valuation of the shares of the stockholder as to the ratio of tax to be levied thereon. There must be uniformity, both in the assessment and the levying of the tax. National bank shares cannot be assessed at their full value, and "other moneyed capital" below its actual value. Looking to section 30, we find that in assessing the property of unincorporated bank, and that of bankers, brokers, and stock jobbers, they are allowed to deduct the amount of their indebtedness to depositors and the amount of all accounts payable, other than current deposit accounts, from the amount of their bills receivable, and other credits due, or to become due; but this deduction cannot be made from any other item of their property. The fact that the unincorporated bank is entitled to such deduction is no valid reason why the debts of the owner of national bank stock should be deducted from the value of his shares in assessing them. National banks are assessed solely by taxing the shares of stock. In unincorporated banks there are no shares to tax, and the Legislature, of necessity, was compelled to adopt a different method of taxing them, by assessing the value of the capital therein invested, which is practically the difference between the value of the assets and the amount of liabilities. The shares of a national bank do not represent the assets of the bank, but rather the difference between the value of its property and its liabilities. While the method of assessing national banks is different from that by which a private bank or banker is assessed, the rule of uniformity is preserved so that it cannot be said that the law of the State requires that national banks shall be taxed at a greater rate than is imposed upon the capital invested in the state banks.

It must, we think, be conceded that the larger part of the moneyed capital of the individual citizens of this State, within the meaning of the words "other moneyed capital" as defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, is in the hands of brokers, stock jobbers, and incorporated and unincorporated state banks. And as the State has not, in the taxation of the capital thus invested, unjustly discriminated against the national banks, the fact that in the assessment of a small portion of the moneyed capital in the State, which is not invested so as to come in competition with the national banks, the tax-payer is permitted to deduct his bona fide indebtedness from credits, is not such a discrimination as violates the rule of equity required by the legislation of Congress. The principle was substantially recognized in the case of Mercantile Nat. Bank v. New York, supra. In that case, the plaintiff, a national bank located in the city of New York, brought suit against the defendants to enjoin the collection of taxes levied upon the shares of the stockholders of the bank, claiming that the laws of the State exempt from the taxation so much of the moneyed capital of the individual tax-payer as creates a discrimination against capital invested in such shares. The laws of the State of New York exempt from assessment shares of stock in trust companies, life insurance companies, deposits in savings banks, and bonds of the municipalities of the State. The court held the exemptions already mentioned did not effect an unfriendly or unlawful discrimination against national banks, or the capital therein invested, nor does it result in taxing the shares of such banks at a higher rate than is levied upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State. So in the case of Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19, 24 L. ed. 369, it is held that taxes assessed on national bank shares are not invalidated by reason of the exemption from taxation by state authority of bonds issued by the City of Nashville in the hands of individuals.

The rule deducible from the decisions of the United States Supreme Court is that, where the rate fixed by the State for the taxation of capital in the hands of individual citizens, situated similarly to that invested in national banks, is not less than that placed upon national bank shares, the rule of uniformity prescribed by the Act of Congress is maintained, even though some moneyed capital in the State, which is invested by individuals in business or enterprises, which do not come in competition with national banks, is exempt from taxation, or is assessed at a less rate than is imposed upon shares of stock in national banks. It is obvious that the laws of this State providing for the taxation of national banks are in perfect harmony with this rule, and that the plaintiff in error has no legal ground to complain because he was not permitted to deduct the amount of his debts from the value of his national bank stock. If our Statute permitted debts to be deducted from the value of all kinds of property, or from all credits, in listing the same for assessment, as the laws of some of the States allow, then the indebtedness of the owner of national bank shares would have to be deducted from the value of his shares. But the proviso clause of section 27 of the Revenue Law of this State provides that the rule which allows the deduction of debts from credits shall not "apply to any bank, company, or corporation exercising banking powers or privileges." We therefore reach the conclusion that in this State, in the assessment of shares of national bank stock, the owners thereof are not entitled to deduct their bona fide indebtedness from the value of such shares of stock.

George W. HARVEY et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. One who, in protection of a mortgage which he in good faith has taken from one who had no legal power to make it, because under guardianship as of unsound mind, satisfies a prior judgment lien on the mortgaged property, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditor for the collection of the amount paid; especially where he was induced to take the mortgage by fraudulent statements that the guardianship had been terminated.

2. The complaint in an action to obtain subrogation to the lien of a judgment need not allege the insolvency of the judgment debtor, nor that he has no other property out of which the claim may be collected.

(September 19, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant Spaulding from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Grant County subrogating the complainants to the lien of a judgment which they had satisfied for the protection of an invalid mortgage held by themselves. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John A. Kersey, for appellant:

No one can so contract with a person under guardianship, as a person of unsound mind, as to become entitled to subrogation by paying any claim against the one under such guardianship.

If appellees have any claim whatever on account of having paid the Ferguson judgment, it is a claim against the judgment debtors for money paid to their use, and at their instance and request; and it is not sufficient to work an equitable assignment of the Ferguson judgment to them as against the appellant, who held a judgment against and was the guardian of Ferguson's judgment debtors.

A mere stranger or volunteer who pays a debt cannot be subrogated to the creditor's rights.

Brandt, Suretyship, § 260.

It is only in cases where the person paying

NOTE.—Subrogation defined.

Subrogation is the equity by which a person who is secondarily liable for a debt, and has paid the same, is put in the place of the creditor, so as to entitle him to make use of all the securities and remedies possessed by the creditor, in order to enforce the right of exoneration as against the principal debtor, or of contribution against others who are liable in the same rank with himself. Bispham, Eq. § 385.

When a man pays a debt which could not properly be called his own, but which it was his interest to pay, the law subrogates him to all the rights of the creditor. 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. 417.

This definition includes the case now under consideration. The complainant paid the debt, not his own, but which it was his interest to pay. Gaskill v. Wales, 36 N. J. Eq. 527.

Doctrine of subrogation.

The doctrine of subrogation is of wide extent and operation in various departments of equity jurisprudence. The courts of all the American States, with very few exceptions, have extended the remedy in cases arising between principal and surety, as well as mortgagor and mortgagee. *Scribner v. Adams, 73 Me. 541; Kelly v. Herrick, 181 Mass. 373; Pierson v. Catlin, 18 Vt. 77; Hayes v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. 123, 1 L. ed. 736; Talbot v. Wilkins, 81 Ark. 411; Dent v. Wait, 9 W. The doctrine of subrogation is a device to promote justice. We shall never handle it unwisely if that purpose controls the effort, and the resultant equity is steadily kept in view. Acer v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 365.

One who is only a volunteer cannot invoke the aid of subrogation, for such a person can establish no equity. Gans v. Thiene, 36 N. Y. 232. See notes to Boone v. Clark (Ill.) 5 L. R. A. 273, and Wilton v. Mayberry (Wis.) 6 L. R. A. 61.

Right of subrogation; its nature and scope.

The right of subrogation is afforded in cases where a person is required to pay a debt or prior incumbrance to protect his right or to save his property; and whenever to accomplish such protection it is necessary that he have the support of the security so paid, he will be entitled to it if it can be taken without prejudice to the superior rights of others. Cole v. Malcolm, 66 N. Y. 363; Barnes v.

the debt stands in the situation of a surety, or is compelled to pay in order to protect his own interests, that equity substitutes him in the place of the creditor.

Richmond v. Marston, 15 Ind. 184.

The fraudulent representations being denied, there should have been some proof of them, if they were sufficient for any purpose when proved.

For aught that is averred, the Lockwoods may be amply able to pay appellees any sum due them for any cause or on any account. If that is so they ought not to be allowed subrogation, and thus compel appellant to pay them in order to protect his claim, accruing to him by virtue of his judgment and sheriff's certificate.

Edinburg Am. Land Mortg. Co. v. Latham, 88 Ind. 88.

Messrs. Harvey & Paulus, Marsh & Brownlee and J. L. Custer for appellees.

McBride, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

November 28, 1886, Amaretta Lockwood, one of the appellees herein, was the owner of an undivided interest in certain land in Grant County. On that day one Josiah Ferguson recovered a judgment in the Grant Circuit Court against her for $30 and costs, which became a lien on her interest in the land. December 28, 1886, she with her husband and co-appellee, James H. Lockwood, were by the Wells Circuit Court adjudged of unsound mind, and incapable of managing their respective estates, and the appellant was duly appointed their guardian. The guardianship was terminated by a judgment of the Wells Circuit Court on the — day of April, 1887, declaring them restored to their right minds, and again capable of managing their estates. On the 26th day of January, 1887, the Lockwoods applied to the appellees, Harvey & Paulus, to act as their attorneys in the institution and conduct of certain litigation, and represented to them that they had been already adjudged of sound mind, and their guardianships terminated. Harvey & Paulus, not knowing that this was untrue, accepted and entered upon the duties of the employment, and to secure the compensation agreed upon took from the Lockwoods a mortgage on the land in Grant County. On the day the mortgage was executed the land was advertised for sale by the sheriff of Grant County on an execution issued on the Ferguson judgment. Harvey & Paulus, to save the land from sale, and thereby protect their mortgage, paid to the sheriff $48.43, the amount of the judgment, with costs. This suit was originally commenced to foreclose the mortgage; but the Lockwoods and the appellant, who was joined as a defendant, attacked the validity of the mortgage on the ground of the incapacity of the mortgagors when it was executed. The appellant, also by a separate answer, which was supported on the trial by proof, showed that when he was discharged as guardian the Wells Circuit Court allowed him for services, money expended, etc., $378.78, which the court adjudged to be a specific lien on the mortgaged land, and that a transcript of the judgment had been duly filed and recorded in the clerk's office of Grant County. Harvey & Paulus thereupon, with leave of the court, and without objection from the defendants, filed a second paragraph of complaint, alleging the facts substantially as above stated, and asking to be subrogated to the lien of the Ferguson judgment. This paragraph also contained averments charging that the representations made by the Lockwoods to Harvey & Paulus that they had been adjudged of sound mind and relieved from guardianship were not only false, but were fraudulently made to induce them to

A surety who pays the debt of his principal is entitled to subrogation in equity, and to an assignment of the securities held by the creditor. When, therefore, a second mortgagee pays to the first mortgagee his debt, although the first mortgagee is thereby satisfied, the second mortgagee is entitled to hold the premises as security for the amount paid on the first mortgage. Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 86.

A party advancing funds to raise the incumbrance upon real estate belonging to a person incapable of making a valid contract may invoke the equitable doctrine of subrogation. Coleman v. Frazer, 3 Bush, 300.

If the right to redeem from the mortgage, and 18 L. R. A.

by such redemption to stand in the place of the mortgagee, and hold his interest in the land, is treated as identical with the right to make payment, then this right belongs to every surety for the mortgage debt, even if he has no interest in or lien upon the estate; for, upon the equitable principle of subrogation, a surety who has satisfied a demand is entitled to hold the securities of the creditor and to enforce them as against the person and the fund primarily liable. Averill v. Taylor, 8 N. Y. 44.

And it is sufficient to entitle a junior incumbrancer to be subrogated to the rights of a senior mortgagee if he tender to such senior mortgagee the amount secured by his mortgage, with interest and costs before the foreclosure sale. Marshall v. Ruddick, 28 Iowa, 487; Dings v. Marshall, 7 Hun, 522.

A junior mortgagee or judgment creditor has a right to protect his interest by paying a prior mortgage due and payable, and if he does pay it he succeeds by subrogation to the rights and interests of such prior mortgagee in the lands, as security for the amount so paid, without any assignment or act of transfer by or on the part of the prior mortgagee. 2 Story, Eq. § 1024; *Brainard v. act as such attorneys, and accept said mortgage. The circuit court found these averments to be true, and adjudged the mortgage void, but sustained the claim of Harvey & Paulus to be subrogated to the lien of the Ferguson judgment, with priority over the judgment of the appellant. This conclusion of the court is vigorously attacked by the appellant, who insists that, the mortgage being void, and the mortgagors incapable of contracting, the payment by the appellees of the Ferguson judgment was voluntary, and by persons standing in the relation of strangers to the debtors, and will not entitle them to subrogation. In this the appellant is wrong, and the judgment of the circuit court is right. True, the mortgage was void, because the mortgagors were, by the express terms of the Statute, legally incapacitated from contracting. One may, however, be so weak intellectually as to be incapable of managing his estate, and thus be legally subjected to guardianship, and still be capable of perpetrating a fraud. The court has found in this case that these parties, by means of the representations made, not only secured the services of the appellees as attorneys, but also induced them to save their land from sale by the sheriff by paying the Ferguson judgment. It is certain that they obtained a substantial benefit. To sustain their present claim would be to relieve them wholly from liability for the Ferguson judgment, without having rendered any equivalent whatever therefor. The Statute which provides for the guardianship of those non compos, and for the conservation of their estates, is intended to protect them from the consequences of their mental weakness, and to guard against the danger of wrong being done to them by the dishonest and the unscrupulous. It was never intended to serve as an intrenchment to shelter them from the consequences of such wrongs as their limited capacity gave them the power to knowingly perpetrate upon others. Indeed, if no question of fraud or of attempted fraud entered into the transaction, it is a clear case calling for the application of the doctrine of subrogation, which does not depend upon or grow out of the ability of the parties to make valid contracts, as it is not founded upon contract, either express or implied, but upon principles of equity and justice, intended to afford protection to a meritorious creditor, and prevent the sweeping away of the fund from which in good conscience he ought to be paid. Sheld. Subr. § 4; 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1419; Hooker v. Benson, 88 Ind. 250.

Assume that the mortgagors, as well as the mortgagees, acted in good faith; when the mortgagees, to protect what they erroneously supposed was a valid mortgage, paid the judgment, they were neither strangers nor volunteers. The fact that the mortgage proved to be void because the makers had not the legal power to make it affords only stronger reasons why the equitable doctrine of subrogation should be invoked.

The second paragraph of the complaint, asking for subrogation, did not contain any averments of the insolvency of the debtors, or that they had no other property out of which the claim could be collected. Appellant demurred to this paragraph on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, the demurrer being overruled, an exception was saved to the ruling. This ruling is assigned as error, appellant insisting that the omission of such averments or their equivalent makes the complaint bad. The question in this case is as to the preservation of a security in favor of a creditor. The right of a creditor to be subrogated to the securities of one whose claim he has paid does not depend upon the solvency or the insolvency of the debtor, but upon the circumstances attending the payment of the debt to which the security was an incident.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Stephen COLLAR
v.
Hamblin D. COLLAR, Appt.

(....Mich.....)

1. Evidence that a conveyance of his interest by a tenant in common to a trustee to facilitate a sale of the property and distribution of the proceeds was in fraud of his creditors is immaterial in an action by him to recover his share of the proceeds of the sale, to which they are not parties.

2. When a writing is shown to have been executed for the purpose of conveying an estate held in common to a trustee for sale and

NOTE.—Parol evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of a written instrument.

Few axioms of law have a more extended application or are so universal in their application as that which denies to parol evidence the right to explain, vary, or contradict the terms of a written instrument. Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74; Croome v. Lediard, 2 Myl. & K. 251.

Every jurisdiction in this country, without exception, has given indorsements to the rule stated in the text, and while great misconception and contrariety of view exists as to the nature and scope of the numerous exceptions which have engrafted themselves upon the original formula, still it may be affirmed without fear of contradiction that wherever the evidentiary facts disclose a pertinent case, the courts apply in all its rigor the provisions of the law as stated. *Morrill v. Robinson, 71 Me. 24; Brandon Mfg. Co. v. Morse, 48 Vt. 322; Fay v. Gray, 124 Mass. 500; Carlton v. distribution of the proceeds, it is the best evidence of the terms of the trust and unless it has been lost, parol evidence respecting the terms should be excluded.

3. Although a parol agreement to acquire the interests of all the tenants in common of real estate, convert the same into money and pay over to each his pro rata share of the proceeds, is not enforceable under the Statute of Frauds, yet if the agreement is carried out so far that the title is acquired and the property converted into money, a trust will arise to pay over the proceeds. The trust, however, is not enforceable at law unless the trustee has affirmatively recognized his duty to make the payment.

4. Upon the death, before converting the land into money, of one who has received a conveyance of the shares of tenants in common of real estate under a parol agreement to sell the same and divide the proceeds among his grantors, the land descends to his heirs unincumbered by any trust, and a purchaser from them will owe no duty to the original grantors arising out of the parol agreement made with them.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ingham County to review a judgment in favor of complainant in an action brought to recover money alleged to have been received by defendant for land in which complainant had an interest and which it was defendant's duty to pay over to complainant. Reversed.

For a full statement of the facts of this case, see the former report in 4 L. R. A. 491, from which it appears that George Collar died in 1868 intestate seized of fifty-five acres of land and leaving the following children heirs surviving, being all his heirs-at-law, viz.: Silas, Sylvester, John, Martin, Henry, Cameron, Mary (wife of Jacob Thorne), Stephen and Hamblin D.

In December, 1874, plaintiff and others of the heirs conveyed their interests in this fifty-

The meaning of the rule is, not that courts require the strongest possible assurance of the matters in question, but that no evidence shall be admitted, which, from the nature of the case, supposes still greater evidence behind in the party's possession or power; because the absence of the primary evidence raises a presumption that, if produced, it would give a completion to the case at least unfavorable, if not directly adverse, to the interest of the party. Clifton v. United States, 45 U. S. 4 How. 242, 11 L. ed. 957.

On prior and on subsequent occasions the same court has announced a similar principle, and we may safely affirm that it is a cardinal feature of evidentiary law as administered in this country. No evidence shall be received, which presupposes better evidence in the party's possession, and this rule may be regarded as established beyond question. Tayloe v. Riggs, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 591, 7 L. ed. 276; Cooke v. Woodrow, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 18, 3 L. ed. 22; Fresh v. Gilson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 327, 10 L. ed. 982; De Lane v. Moore, 55 U. S. 14 How. 253, 14 L. ed. 409; McPhaul v. Lapeley, 37 U. S. 20 Wall. 284, 22 L. ed. 344.

The rule that the best evidence must be produced which the nature of the case admits, means, not that the courts require the strongest possible assurance, but that no evidence shall be admitted which presupposes greater evidence in the party's favor. United States v. Reyburn, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 352, 8 L. ed. 424.

The reason of the rule that secondary or inferior evidence shall be substituted for any evidence of a higher nature which the case admits is the attempt to substitute the inferior for the higher implies that the higher would give a different aspect to the case of the party introducing the lesser. United States v. Wood, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 430, 10 L. ed. 527; Tayloe v. Riggs, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 591, 7 L. ed. 276; Clifton v. United States, 45 U. S. 4 How. 242, 11 L. ed. 957; De Lane v. Moore, 55 U. S. 14 How. 253, 14 L. ed. 409.

Analogous reasoning will require the rejection of parol evidence where the best evidence attainable is, for instance, a letter, statement or document, and its non-production is not accounted for, and no foundation is laid for the introduction of secondary evidence. Mugge v. Adams, 76 Tex. 448.

Where the best or primary evidence has been lost or destroyed, much latitude is allowed in the admission of parol evidence to supply the omission, and although much latitude may have been carried to its extreme limits, a new trial will not be granted where the finding was substantially right upon the evidence. McCullough v. Davis, 6 West. Rep. 579, 108 Ind. 292; Rice, Ev. p. 147.

As to the rule that parol evidence cannot vary or contradict a written contract, see note to La Fayette County Mon. Corp. v. Magoon (Wia.) 3 L. R. A. 761.

Exceptions to the foregoing rule.

The following American cases illustrate the exception by which parol evidence may be admitted to vary written instruments, on the ground of mistake, in different forms and modes of proceedings: *Peterson v. five acres of land to Jacob Thorne, the husband of their sister Mary, for the purpose of enabling him to make a sale of the same, and distribute the proceeds among the heirs according to their equitable interests. In 1876 Jacob Thorne and wife, with such others of the heirs as had not conveyed to Thorne, conveyed said lands to Sylvester, the purpose of which conveyance was the same as it was in the conveyance to Thorne. In 1880 Sylvester died, not having executed the share or conveyed said lands, and afterwards the defendant Hamlin D. obtained a conveyance of said lands, from the heirs of Sylvester.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. R. A. Montgomery, with Mr. Q. A. Smith, for appellant.

Messrs. Parkinson & Day, for appellee:

Plaintiff had always insisted that he was entitled to a distributive share of the proceeds of the sale of the land in question. The defendant was aware of this and took the title with that understanding on his part.

With this understanding on the 18th of May 1886, he promised plaintiff to pay him $225 in settlement of this claim. This promise was based upon a good consideration, and such as would support the promise. It was such a claim as defendant saw fit to recognize and compromise.

The precise nature and extent of the claim is not material; it may have been of a legal or equitable nature.

Sheldon v. Rice's Estate, 80 Mich. 299; Stevens v. Tuller, 4 Mich. 387; Gooding v. Hingston, 20 Mich. 439.

Champlin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On a former trial of this case the defendant prevailed, the trial court holding that upon the showing then made there could be no recovery upon any theory, either as for money had and received, or upon an account stated, or upon the special count, unless the contract was proven. Upon a writ of error to this court, the judgment was reversed, and a new trial ordered. 75 Mich. 414. Another trial has been had, and the plaintiff has recovered a judgment, and we are asked to review the proceedings which led to that result. Thirty-one errors have been assigned, only a few of which demand particular attention in an opinion, although all have been carefully considered. The facts, as developed by the testimony upon this trial, are but slightly variant from those which appeared upon the other trial upon the main issues. At the conclusion of the testimony, the court stated to the counsel the theories upon which he submitted the case to the jury, as follows: "The court: I think this case should go to the jury upon two theories, in both of which there is some tendency, in my judgment, in the proof to support the plaintiff's case, as well as proof having an opposite tendency, and what the truth is about it the jury will determine from the evidence. And the one theory is upon the count for the money had and received. Now, to sustain that, I make this statement that you may understand, generally, what the views of the court are previous to the argument: To sustain the 13 L. R. A.

case upon the theory for money had and received, it must appear that parties in their transactions understood and treated the business of procuring these titles by Hamblin as embracing within it an interest for Stephen. That must have been the understanding all round. Now, whether or no such a condition of things as that existed will be left to the jury to determine under the evidence. The plaintiff also claims that an agreement was made on the 18th of May, 1886, by which the defendant, in settlement of the plaintiff's claimed interest in the lands, agreed to pay him $225. Now, to make that a valid agreement, if it is proved to the satisfaction of the jury, it must appear that it was made upon a lawful consideration or a good consideration in law. As applied to this case, it is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that there was consideration for making that agreement, in this: That Stephen Collar claimed to have an interest in the lands, and went there to settle with Hamblin for that interest. It is not essential, as has been stated on all hands in the argument, that he should have had a legal interest. If he had such an apparent or claimed interest in the lands as, under the circumstances surrounding the parties, was esteemed by them a thing which it was worth while for Hamblin to settle or consider of value, then, I think, it would be a good consideration. Whether that was the case or not the jury must determine from the evidence. It is true that, so far as anything appears here, the sheriff's deed had alienated Stephen's interest in the land as a matter of law, and from what appears before me I think that is true. The parties may have not considered that that was so, and, if Stephen claimed an interest, notwithstanding that, in the property, and Hamblin yielded to that claim, and for the purpose of settling it, and avoiding a controversy upon it, agreed to pay him $225 in settlement of that claim, I think that would be a good consideration for the agreement. While the sheriff's deed would, as matter of law, have alienated Stephen's interest in the land, there appears to have been in Sylvester at his death not only the interest which was conveyed by virtue of the sheriff's deed, but also such interest, if any, as could be conveyed by Stephen and his wife by quitclaim of the premises. If the parties regarded the interest acquired by both these conveyances, although the sheriff's deed may have conveyed Stephen's interest entirely, and I think it did, if the parties regarded the interest owned by Sylvester at his death, and by his heirs afterwards, as embracing some equitable interest in Stephen, represented by the quitclaim from Stephen and his wife, or, if they regarded the Secor deed, Secor being the execution creditor, as having been procured in the interest of Stephen, those facts and circumstances should be considered with a view of determining whether or not Stephen did have any equitable interest in the fund."

The defendant's counsel, in the course of their cross-examination of Stephen Collar, attempted to show that the conveyance made by Stephen Collar and his wife to Jacob Thorne on the 28th day of December, 1874, was fraudulent as to his creditors. The court, however, refused to permit the attorneys for the defendant to go into such inquiry. We do not think that the court erred in excluding this testimony. The creditors of Stephen Collar are not before the court, or making any complaint of the conveyance by Stephen Collar to Jacob Thorne, and we do not think that the inquiry is material to the issue before the court.

It appears in the case that a creditor of Stephen Collar proceeded by attachment against him, and levied upon his interest in the lands in question, and obtained a judgment against him in the State of New York, and levied upon and sold his interest in said lands at public auction, by which the judgment was fully satisfied, the judgment creditor being Joseph S. Secor. The land was bid off at the sheriff's sale by one Isaac Secor, and in due time he received the sheriff's deed therefor. It appears also that the proceedings in the attachment suit, so far as service upon the defendant, Stephen Collar, was concerned, was a substituted service, no personal service upon the defendant having been acquired in the State of New York, and it was claimed on the part of the defendant in this suit that the sheriff's deed conveyed to Isaac Secor all the interest which the plaintiff, Stephen Collar, had in such land. The deed of the sheriff bears date the 29th day of December, 1870, being prior in time to the deed of Stephen Collar to Jacob Thorne; and therefore the defendant in this suit claims that, at the time of the execution of the deed to Thorne, Stephen Collar had no interest whatever to convey, and conveyed nothing whatever by such deed.

It appears, further, that Sylvester Collar acquired the interest of Isaac Secor under the sheriffs' deed by purchase and conveyance from him to Sylvester dated the 25th day of April, 1877. He also obtained a deed from Thorne and wife dated December 6, 1876. Stephen Collar contends that the court in the State of New York obtained no jurisdiction in the suit, and that the sheriffs' deed is invalid, and did not extinguish his title to the land. The circuit judge charged the jury that he was of opinion that the sheriff's deed did extinguish the title of Stephen Collar to the land, but further instructed the jury that, if he insisted that he had a claim upon the land after the sheriff's deed, even after he had conveyed to Thorne and he to Sylvester Collar, such claim would constitute a good consideration for the promise of Hamblin D. Collar to pay him the sum of $225 for such interest.

We held, when the case was here before, that where lands were conveyed under a parol trust to sell and convert into money, and divide the proceeds, and the trust had been so far executed by the trustee as to sell the land and receive the money, and such trust had been recognized by him, an action for money had and received would lie to recover such money by the person entitled thereto. Collar v. Collar, 75 Mich. 414. And in Bitely v. Bitely, 85 Mich. 227 (at the April Term of this court) we held also that parol evidence was admissible to prove that land was conveyed to sell and divide the proceeds among the heirs.

In White v. Clewer, 75 Mich. 17, we held that such a trust was not within the provisions of the Statute of Frauds. Such testimony was admitted upon the trial of this case, but upon this trial it appeared, upon the examination of the plaintiff, that there was a writing having reference to four of the conveyances by the heirs to Sylvester Collar which the plaintiff signed, and that it was sent by Henry to the heirs in Kent County; that this writing was for the purpose of fixing up and to sell the place so as to divide the money with the four heirs, namely, Hamblin, Cameron, Mary, and himself. When this fact appeared, such writing was the best evidence. It defined the trust, and all parol evidence respecting the trust, upon which Sylvester obtained the deeds from such heir, should have been excluded. There was no sufficient showing of the loss of such writing as to permit the introduction of parol evidence of its contents. Such parol evidence, when introduced, was objected to, and when it appeared later that there existed such writing, such objections became effective. It appears that such writing did not include or provide for all the heirs, but it did include the plaintiff, and measured the rights of those who were parties to it and Sylvester Collar. The plaintiff also testified that at his talk with the defendant on May 18, 1886, he represented these same four heirs, and wanted to settle only for those four interests. It is very important that it should appear what agreement Sylvester had with those four heirs, and the writing is the best evidence of that. The parol testimony tended to show that the trust which Sylvester assumed was not a trust in land, but a trust arising out of the disposition of land conveyed to him for a specific purpose. It was a trust arising out of the confidence reposed in him by the heirs in conveying their interest to him, without any other consideration to them than that he should dispose of the land, and divide the proceeds pro rata among them. The agreement was executory and contemplated action on the part of Sylvester. He was to acquire the interests of all the heirs, and sell and convert the real estate into money, and pay over to each his pro rata share. So far as the agreement relating to the purchase and disposition of real estate rested in parol, it was void under the Statute of Frauds. Wright v. King, Harr. Ch. 12; Bernard v. Bougard, Id. 180; Trask v. Green, 9 Mich. 358; Newton v. Sky, 15 Mich. 391; Cobb v. Cook, 49 Mich. 11; Pulford v. Morton, 62 Mich. 25; Shafter v. Huntington, 58 Mich. 810.

It was only after Sylvester had proceeded in the execution of the parol agreement, and had obtained title of all the heirs, and converted the real estate into money, that the trust would arise, founded upon equity and good conscience, to pay over the proceeds; and, before such trust could be enforced at law, some new promise must have been made, and his duty to pay over must have been affirmatively recognized before an action could be maintained. Culder v. Moran, 49 Mich. 17.

But what becomes of the remedy of the heirs so deeding, if the grantee dies before performance on his part of those provisions which are void by the Statute of Frauds, and before the property is converted into personality, so that a trust can attach? At such time it is not such a trust as equity will lay hold of, and appoint a new trustee to carry out the parol trusts which are void by the Statute of Frauds. The most that can be said in such a case is that the parties have voluntarily conveyed away their interest in the real estate, and placed it beyond recall. They would have been in the same predicament as if Sylvester Collar, after having obtained the absolute deeds of conveyances from all the heirs, had refused to sell or convey the land, or further perform the parol agreement. The heirs could not have compelled a specific performance, because the parol agreement is void under the Statute of Frauds. Sylvester Collar died before the parol trust attached, and the rights of the heirs to have a performance died with him. It was said by Mr. Justice Campbell in Bulen v. Granger, 56 Mich. 208: "As our statutes have abolished the old doctrine of resulting trusts, a person who deliberately conveys land to a wife or other relative stands in no better condition as to enforcing such a trust than anyone else." The plaintiff could not have maintained this action against the heirs of Sylvester Collar, even though they had sold the fifty-five acres for $3,000 and received the money. The land was incumbered by no trust when it descended to them. It does not become subject to any trust in the hands of the purchaser from them, nor does such purchaser owe to the heirs any duty arising out of the original parol agreement between Sylvester and the heirs. But, if there was an express trust evidence in writing, other considerations obtain, and what the rights and remedies of the parties would be in such a case depends entirely upon the writing; and, until that is produced or established with sufficient certainty, it is impossible to determine whether the present action could be maintained or not. When the case was here before, the opinion was based upon the statement that "in 1880 Sylvester Collar died, not having executed the trust or conveyed said lands, and afterwards the defendant, Hamblin D. Collar, obtained a conveyance of said lands from the heirs of Sylvester Collar, deceased, which included the interest of the plaintiff which had been conveyed to Thorne, and afterwards to Sylvester for the same purpose. . . . It was also proposed to be shown that the defendant obtained the whole title to this land from the heirs of Sylvester, and that he knew his brother had taken the title to the land for the purpose of thus distributing the proceeds, and that, although he had recognized the rights of all the other heirs, and paid them on the basis of the agreement made with the plaintiff, of May 18, 1886, he had not paid the plaintiff, and refused to recognize his rights in any funds, though he has the funds representing that 19 L. R. A.

interest in his hands." Such is not the case disclosed by this record. It is not shown that the defendant acquired conveyances from Sylvester's heirs for the same purpose as Sylvester had obtained deeds from the heirs; nor is it shown that he recognized the rights of all the other heirs to a share of the proceeds of sale of the land. On the contrary, it now appears that the agreement under which Stephen Collar claims an interest through Sylvester was in writing, defining the purposes for which Sylvester received the conveyances entered into between four of the heirs, including the plaintiff, and it was with reference to these same four heirs that the original promise to pay $225 was made on May 18, 1886.

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

The other Justices concurred.

A by-law or constitutional provision which undertakes to make the decision of a tribunal, created of its own members, and therefore interested, conclusive upon a claim of a beneficiary, made pursuant to a certificate, in the nature of a policy of insurance upon the life of a member, is unreasonable, against public policy, and void.

Austin v. Searing, 16 N. Y. 112-123; Bauer v. Samson Lodge, K. of P. 102 Ind. 262.

Such restrictive provisions are repugnant to art. 6 of the Constitution of this State. The judicial power is vested in certain courts, and consists of the power to hear and determine controversies between adverse parties, and questions in litigation.

Story, Const. § 1640 et seq.

This power can only be conferred upon courts.

In Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. ed. 365, even the statute of a State, aimed to restrict the right of insurance companies of other States to remove suits against it to the United States courts, was held unconstitutional and void.

The effect of these restrictive provisions of defendant, if held valid, would be to deprive the claimant of property of the right to a jury trial. A statute having that effect cannot be sustained.

The rights of a member or his beneficiary to be paid any part of the fund provided for the benefit of the widow and orphan is governed entirely by his benefit certificate and the constitution, laws, and regulations of the order. The parties are bound by just such contracts as they make which are free from fraud or illegality. Courts cannot make contracts for parties or render a party liable on a different basis from that upon which his liability is mutually stipulated for.

Lorscher v. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. 2 L. R. A. 208, 72 Mich. 326.

Where one has a claim against an association like defendant, under its laws, which has been disputed and decided adversely by the proper tribunal acting under the laws of the order, a court of law has no jurisdiction as he is concluded by the forum of his choice.

Fitzgerald*, L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 257.

The exact point at issue was before the court in Rood v. Railway Pass. & Freight C. Mut. Ben. Asso. 31 Fed. Rep. 62, where the court said it was certainly competent for the members of this association to agree among themselves that the action of their board of directors in reference to any claim presented against the association should be final. This view has been practically adopted by our court.

Van Poucke v. Netherland St. V. De P. Soc. supra; Lorscher v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 2 L. R. A. 208, 76 Mich. 326.

Plaintiff not being a member of the order cannot assail this law, as she can recover only under the provisions regulating the membership of her deceased husband. This attack cannot be sustained, because if it was admitted that the rule of the association is bad as a by-law, it may be good as a contract.

Ang. & A. Corp. par. 342; Austin v. Searing, 16 N. Y. 112; Goddard v. St. Louis Merchants Arch. 78 Mo. 609.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was tried by the court, and the finding contains the following material facts: Defendant is a mutual benefit association incorporated under Act 89, Pub. Acts 1883, for the improvement morally, socially, and intellectually of its members, and for the purpose of establishing a benefit fund, from which shall be paid a certain sum to the member, or his widow, or certain other relatives, as [he may direct, and as the endowment laws of the order provide. Its constitution provides for a great camp, composed of certain officers and one representative from each of the subordinate tents in the State. This Great Camp meets annually, and its members are selected annually. Three of the principal officers constitute the executive committee. Article 18, § 2, of its laws reads as follows: "The executive committee shall have power to pass on all death claims, and if in their judgment any such claim is not on its face a valid one, they shall notify the beneficiary or beneficiaries of the deceased members thereof, and give them, or their attorneys, an opportunity to appear before such committee within sixty days thereafter, and present such evidence as they may have to establish the justness or validity of such claim, and the said committee shall try, hear, and decide upon the justness or validity of such claim, and such decision shall be binding upon such claimant, unless an appeal is taken to the Great Camp. The notice of the appeal from the decision of the said committee must be filed with the great record keeper within sixty days thereafter. The decision of the Great Camp, in all such cases, shall be final, and no suit in law or equity shall be commenced or maintained by any member or beneficiary." Plaintiff's husband, now deceased, became a member of the defendant, and received what is termed a "half endowment certificate," which entitled him to receive one assessment on the membership not exceeding $1,000, as a benefit to his wife, upon satisfactory proof of his death, and the surrender of the certificate, provided he shall have, in every particular, complied with all the rules and regulations of the order. Upon his death plaintiff presented her claim to the committee, which decided against it on the ground that at the time of his death he was not a member in good standing, but had been duly and regularly suspended therefrom, in accordance with the rules and regulations thereof. She then appealed to the grand camp, which also disallowed the claim, after a full examination and hearing. She then brought this suit, and judgment was rendered therein against her.

It is claimed on behalf of plaintiff that the provision above quoted, which makes the decision of the Grand Camp final, is contrary to public policy, and void, in that it ousts the court of jurisdiction. No charge is made that either the committee or the grand camp acted fraudulently, or in any manner contrary to the rules and regulations of the order. I am unable to see any difference between the present case and that of Van Poucke v. Netherland St. V. De. P. Soc. 63 Mich. 378, 6 West. Rep. 162. These organizations are purely voluntary, and it may well be considered by their members important that claims of this character should be determined by methods more inexpensive than resorts to the courts. This reason is well expressed by my Brother Champlin in the case above cited. Plaintiff seeks to maintain a distinction between that case and the present one, in that the plaintiff was himself a member claiming for "sick benefits," while the plaintiff here is not a member, and had no voice in the selection of members of the tribunal. Her right depends solely upon the voluntary act of her husband in becoming a member. Her right to receive the benefit depended upon his complying with the constitution and rules to which he assented, and which became a part of his contract. I can see no reason why a different rule should apply to plaintiff than to a member making a claim for benefits. Similar provisions have been sustained by the courts. Anacosta Tribe No. 12 I. O. of R. M. v. Murbach, 18 Md. 91; Toram v. Howard Ben. Asso. 4 Pa. 519; Black & White Smith's Soc. v. Vandyke, 2 Whart. 309; Woolsey v. Independent O. of O. F. Lodge No. 23, 61 Iowa, 492; Rood v. Railway Pass. & Freight C. Mut. Ben. Asso. 81 Fed. Rep. 62.

NOTE.—Conveyance of mineral beneath surface of land.

The minerals beneath the surface of land may be conveyed by deed, distinct from the right to the surface, and are a corporeal hereditament passing by deed. Lee v. Bumgardner, 86 Va. 315.

A demise of coal under the surface of a specified piece of land is a sale of the coal. Fairchild v. Fairchild (Pa.) 7 Cent. Rep. 873.

The grant of a right to mine coal in the land of the lessor and remove it therefrom is a grant of an interest in the land itself, and not a mere license to take the coal. Hope's App. (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 43.

Where grantee contracted to pay a specified price per ton, the instrument was a sale of the coal notwithstanding the parties contracted as "lessor and lessee." Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 109 Pa. 583, 1 Cent. Rep. 102.

Such interest of the lessee is property liable to sale on judgment and execution, as real estate. Hyatt v. Vincennes Nat. Bank, 113 U. S. 408, 28 L. ed. 1000.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Lackawanna County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin the use of tunnels under complainants' land for the mining of coal underlying lands adjoining those of complainants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John S. Harding and Garrick M. Harding, for appellants:

The great rule of interpretation, with respect to deeds and contracts, is to put such a construction upon them as will effectuate the intention of the parties, if such intention be consistent with the principles of law.

Hollingsworth v. Fry, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 845, 1 L. ed. 860; Staver v. Staver, 9 Serg. & R. 450; Doe v. Burt, 1 T. R. 701.

As the coal was mined out and removed, there resulted an "open way" a "space," or a "chamber," through, under and across the plaintiff's property. The roof above, the floor below, the "chamber" between, each and all were real estate. One may own a chamber even in a house as his separate real estate.

Plaintiffs were the owners of this real estate. It cannot be said that they conveyed it away when they executed the so-called lease.

If the plaintiffs were reversioners of the "chamber," they certainly could maintain an action for the violation of any of their rights in connection with it. The degree of damage was wholly immaterial.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not at all questioned, but is expressly conceded, by the learned counsel for the appellants, that the agreement between these parties is an absolute sale to the defendant of all the merchantable coal underlying the tract of land in question, and that the surface of the land and the minerals beneath it may be severed in title and become separate tenements. This doctrine has been so frequently decided by this court, and in such varying circumstances, that a mere reference to some of the leading cases will be all that is necessary, for the present occasion. Caldwell v. Fulton, 81 Pa. 475; Caldwell v. Copeland, 87 Pa. 427; Scranton v. Phillips, 94 Pa. 15; 13 L. R. A.

Sanderson v. Scranton, 105 Pa. 469; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 109 Pa. 583, 1 Cent. Rep. 102.

In the opinions delivered in the foregoing and other cases, we have emphatically decided that the coal or other mineral beneath the surface is land, and is attended with all the attributes and incidents peculiar to the ownership of land. We have held the mineral to be a corporeal and not an incorporeal hereditament; that the surface may be held in fee by one person and the mineral also in fee by another person; that the mineral may be subject to taxation as land, and the surface to an independent taxation as land, when owned by a different person; that possession of the mineral may be recovered by ejectment and title to it may be acquired by adverse possession under the Statute of Limitations, though not by prescription because it is not an incorporeal right. In short, we have for nearly half a century judicially regarded the ownership of mineral, where it has been properly severed from the surface, as the ownership of land to all intents and purposes. Said Strong, J., in Caldwell v. Fulton, supra: "Coal and minerals in place are land. It is no longer to be doubted they are subject to conveyance as such. Nothing is more common in Pennsylvania than that the surface right should be in one man, and the mineral right in another. It is not denied in such a case that both are landowners, both holders of a corporeal hereditament." Woodward, J., in Caldwell v. Copeland, supra, said: "There is no more reason why mines in another's land, whether opened or unopened, may not be held by a deed duly acknowledged and recorded, than why land in its most ordinary significance may not be so held. In other words, mines are lands and subject to the same laws of possession and conveyance."

In the litigated cases the contentions have been rather upon the interpretation and legal effect of the instruments under which the questions have arisen, than upon the doctrine itself. No such contention arises here as counsel have very candidly conceded, what was indeed inevitable, that the instrument between the present parties came nearly within the adjudged cases and created an estate in fee simple in the defendant in the coal underlying the plaintiff's surface. It includes "all the merchantable coal" under the surface, "with the sole and exclusive right to mine and remove the same," and with this habendum: "To have and to hold the coal in and under said land unto the said party of the second part, its successors or assigns, until the exhaustion thereof under the terms of this indenture."

It is not possible that there can be any question that this is an absolute grant in fee simple of all the coal under the surface of the tract.

But it is contended with great earnestness and ability by the learned counsel for the appellants, that nothing more than the coal passed to the defendant under the agreement, and as to the chamber or space left by the removal of the coal under the mining operations of the defendant, the plaintiffs were still owners in fee, or reversioners, with a right which could not be invaded by the defendant, except for the purpose of removing the coal that underlaid the surface. This brings us to consider the precise character of the present proceeding and the particular question that arises under it. The proceeding is a bill in equity to restrain the defendant from removing coal belonging to them on another tract adjoining this tract on the north, by moving the same through a tunnel or way made by the defendant through one of the underlying veins of coal across the tract to the other land of the defendant, two hundred feet below the surface, of considerable breadth, and twelve feet in height. It is alleged in the bill that this way was produced by the mining operations of the defendant in accordance with the contract, and that the defendant, having acquired the adjoining property after the agreement with the plaintiffs was made, has been and is taking out coal from the adjoining tract through and over this tunnel or way, and this is claimed to be an illegal use of the plaintiffs' property which they ask to have restrained. The argument is that it was not within the intention of the parties that such a right should be granted or exercised, and that, whether it was or not, the plaintiffs have such a property in the chamber or space left by the mining operations that it cannot be used without their permission. There is nothing in the instrument, or in the circumstances surrounding it, which can give any force to the argument from intention. We cannot know what was the intention of the parties except from the terms of their contract. The defendant demurred to the bill for want of equity. No testimony of any kind has been taken. The bill makes no averment of any intention of either of the parties but simply sets out the contract, and the acts of the defendant in executing its terms. Of course there are no surrounding facts that we can consider. There are none in the bill except such as are subsequent to the contract, and these amount only to an allegation of the subsequently acquired interest of the defendant in the adjoining property, and the removal of coal therefrom through the way made by the removal of the coal under the tract.

The proposition that the plaintiffs have a fee in the chamber or space left by the removal of the coal antagonistic to the right of the defendant to use it, is a novel one. No authority is cited to support it, and it seems quite incongruous with the admitted ownership and estate of the defendant in the coal displaced. Under all the decisions, the coal in place was absolutely owned in fee simple by the defendant. In a state of nature the coal necessarily occupied space. How could the defendant own the coal absolutely and in fee simple, and not own the space it occupied? Or how is it possible to conceive of such a thing as the ownership of the space independently of the coal? If the coal in place is a part of the very substance of the soil, more corporeal than the surface, as was said in Caldwell v. Fulton, how can the law regard the space which the substance occupies as other than the substance itself?

Of course such an idea is incapable of practical application except upon the theory that the coal is not a corporeal substance to be sold and delivered, but that only an incorporeal right to remove it passes to the grantee under a conveyance. And such is the real nature of the appellants' argument. It could not be otherwise. Certainly if such were the nature of the defendant's right, the argument and the authorities cited in support of it, would be applicable and of controlling force; but it is a sufficient reply to all of them to say that all the decisions are directly the other way and that they all establish that a conveyance of the coal in fee carries everything with it, just as fully and completely as a conveyance of the soil above. We said in Caldwell v. Fulton: "It is a common thing in the mineral districts of Pennsylvania for the surface to belong to one owner, and the coal which it covers to another. Both the surface and the coal are held by deeds executed and delivered and recorded in the same manner; and there is no more reason for considering the coal an incorporeal hereditament because it has not been opened, than there is for considering the soil such because it has not been ploughed. Still less reason is there for calling it an incorporeal hereditament if the deed happen to describe the grant as a right to enter, dig, and carry away all the coal, instead of describing the coal without the customary circumlocution. In all these cases, where the right rather than the thing is described, nobody is at a loss to know what is intended to pass. It is the thing that is bought and sold. And when that is a coal bed, it is an abuse of language, and an unnecessary application of legal distinctions, to call it an incorporeal hereditament." If, then, the coal in place is a pure corporeal hereditament, the title in fee simple to which passes to a purchaser by apt conveyance, there would be no more propriety in claiming a title in the grantor to the space it occupies, than there would be in claiming a similar right in a vendor of the surface to the space developed by the vendee in digging the cellar and foundations of a house. We are altogether unwilling to adopt any such view of the rights of the parties in either of such cases. By the necessity of the case the appellants argue that the defendant's right in the chamber or way is only an easement, and then cite authorities that an easement can only be exercised to the extent of the grant. But as we have already seen this is in direct hostility to all the authorities on that subject. If the subject be further considered upon principle, it will be found difficult to understand that any property right of the appellants is invaded by the action of the defendant. According to the averments of the bill the tunnel or way is cut through a vein of coal, two hundred feet below the surface and is twelve feet high, and it extends in the vein all the way from the one side to the other of the tract. In this way or chamber the plaintiffs, as owners of the surface, have no right or title. They have no access to it, they cannot use it, they are in no manner obstructed or injured by

it. Nor can we understand how they are or can be injured in any other way. It is of no avail to say generally in the bill that they are injured. The injury must be stated specifically so that a court may know what it is. This is not done and we know not what the injury complained of is. How, then, can we enjoin the defendant? We are asked to enjoin against the removal of coal from the adjoining tract, but this is a matter with which the plaintiffs have no concern. They do not pretend to have any title or interest in that coal. They ask to enjoin removing that coal through the chamber or way made by the defendant through its own property, to wit the coal sold to them by the plaintiffs. Why or for what reason should we do this? The plaintiffs would gain nothing which they do not now have, if we did. No complaint is made in the plaintiffs' bill of either the deprivation or injury of any right growing out of the contract. The plaintiffs cannot possibly use any part of the space left by the removal of the coal, and hence they are not obstructed in the slightest degree. The right to use that space is exclusively in the defendant and that use is not, and cannot be, questioned by the plaintiffs. It is not alleged that the defendant has failed to perform any duty imposed upon it by the contract. We are bound to assume, therefore, that all the coal which the defendant agreed to take out or pay for each year has been taken out or paid for. In no circumstances would the case be a proper one for an injunction.

But upon the authorities the case is entirely with the defendant. The question has arisen in several cases in the British courts, and the right of the owner of the coal to use the tunnel or way to carry other coal through it than that underlying the land of the surface owner has always been affirmed. The subject is thus presented in MacSwinney on Mines, page 67: "The owner in fee simple or tail of lands containing mines or quarries has an absolute right to use them, and the chamber which encloses them, and the space or shell which the working of the minerals creates, and the subsoil generally, in any manner which he thinks proper. And where the owner in fee simple of lands grants them, excepting the underlying mines, he has, with respect to those mines, a similar right. And as by excepting the mines he ipso facto excepts the chamber which encloses them, he has a similar right with respect to that chamber, and with respect to the space or shell which the working of the minerals creates. The containing chamber is not purely and solely a species of property which can only be made profitable by the removal of the inclosed minerals, with the incidental rights of using all proper means for obtaining them. It is a species of property which is as free as other property from restrictions as to its mode of use. The grantor may therefore use the space or shell created by his previous working of the inclosed minerals as a thoroughfare for the carriage of minerals gotten out of his adjoining land. And if, instead of working the inclosed minerals and then utilizing the space or shell thereby created, he prefers to cut a passage through those minerals for the express purpose of using it, and to accordingly use it as a thoroughfare for the carriage of other minerals, he is entitled to do so."

In Hamilton v. Graham, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 166, there was an exception in a free charter in favor of the Duke of Hamilton and his heirs of all the coal and limestone within the lands granted. He was the owner of three estates, Clydesmill, Cambuslang, and Morristown, and one Graham had become the owner of the surface of Cambuslang. The Duke leased the coal in Clydesmill and a portion of the coal under Mr. Graham's surface in Cambuslang, and his lessees at once made use of a passageway through the coal underlying Graham's surface, for the conveyance of other coal and limestone mined from the estates of Clydesmill and Morristown, and this coal and limestone the Duke owned by virtue of the reservation, or exception out of the grant of the surface. Mr. Graham brought an action to stop the further use of the passage but it was held on appeal to the house of lords that this was a rightful use of the passage. Lord Westbury, delivering his opinion, said: "You may approach it laterally from another estate, for the purpose of mining the minerals. You may use the strata which you have reserved to yourself, or rather declared to remain in yourself, in any manner consistent with ownership. You may traverse it from any adjoining land you have. You may create a road or tunnel through it. And you may, through that road or tunnel, carry either the minerals or any other proceeds of an adjoining estate. You therefore have, for there is nothing to restrain you, the same universal right and unlimited power of enjoyment of the estate that remains in you, as you had antecedently to the grant of the dominium utile, the enjoyment of which that grant of the dominium utile in no respect impairs or affects." Lord Colonsay, in the same case, said: "It is a great mistake to say that the Duke has no right to use these minerals except for the purpose of bringing them to the surface. He may use them in the way which is most beneficial to himself. . . . There is no doubt that the Duke of Hamilton was not entitled to increase the burdens upon the servitude on the surface by bringing the minerals from the other property over the surface. The surface was the servient tenement and the minerals under that tenement were the dominant tenement in regard to that particular right of servitude. But the principle does not apply in regard to the right of property, and to say that he is carrying the minerals through the property of the pursuer is another mistake. He is carrying them through his own property and not through the property of the pursuer at all. There is a want of keeping in view the distinction between the right of property and the right of servitude here, which seems to me to have led to an erroneous judgment in the case. I conceive that so long as there is any of the mineral property which the Duke of Hamilton has, he is entitled to use any of that property in the mode which is most beneficial to himself." The Lord Chancellor also said, referring to his opinion in the case of Proud v. Bates, 34 L. J. Ch. 406: "As to the excepted mines, I held that the owner had an absolute right to do as he pleased with them, and that he therefore had a right to carry his coal through them."

In this last-mentioned case of Proud v. Bates a lease was made of the waste land of the manor with an exception of the mine and quarries with full power to win and work the same. A way available for the carriage of minerals lay exclusively within the excepted mines and the lord claimed the right to carry through this way minerals worked on other property than that embraced in the lease. The court held that he had an absolute right to do what he pleased with the excepted mine and therefore he had a right to carry through them minerals from wherever gotten. Vice-Chancellor Wood, in delivering his opinion, said: "Now whether the word 'mines' be used, as it often was, in the sense of minerals, the thing dug out of the mine or that which contains the minerals, that which contains cannot be less than the thing contained; and therefore there is no doubt that the whole containing chamber which has the minerals is 'the mine', and so far as the mines are concerned there can be no question that they are altogether out of the demise; and as to them the representatives of the lessee are of course entitled to use them for any purpose whatsoever and at any period. Lord Campbell's decision in the cause of Bowser v. Maclean, supra [2 DeG. F. & J. 415] in this court, completely explains what the right view is. He says, 'With regard to copyholds, the copyholder has the whole right in him but subject to the right of the lord to work the mines, and the lord cannot use an underground way for the purpose of passing through any portion of the copyhold premises. But as to that which is excepted out of a demise by contract, of course the owner can use whatever he excepts in any way he thinks fit.'"

In Eardley v. Granville, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 826, Jessel, M. R., says: "If a freeholder grants lands excepting mines he severs his estate vertically, i. e., he grants out his estate in parallel horizontal layers, and the grantee only gets the parallel layer granted to him and does not get any underlying mineral layer or stratum. That underlying stratum remains in the grantor." Referring to the case of Hamilton v. Graham, he said: "I decided that the same law applies to Scotland which applies to England. In a case like that the word 'mines' meant subsoil containing the minerals, and not merely the minerals themselves."

The appellants reply to these cases by saying they were cases of exceptions out of grants, and the mines reserved or excepted were the property of the grantors and never were conveyed; hence they held everything not granted by their original title. But the distinction is without force. There is no substantial difference between a title by exception out of a grant, and a title by direct grant of the same subject. In the case of an exception the grantor retains the whole title which he already holds and in the case of a direct grant the grantee holds the whole title granted, and the ownership is as absolute in the one case as in the other. We have held that a grant of all the coal underneath a tract of land is an absolute conveyance in fee simple of all the coal, and no greater title than that could be acquired by an exception to the same effect in a grant of the surface. The books make no distinction. Thus in Washburn on Real Property, vol. 3, p. 432, it is said: "As an exception is the taking of something out of the thing granted, which would otherwise pass by the deed, it may be said in general terms that it ought to be stated and described as fully and accurately as if the grantee were the grantor of the thing excepted, and the grantor were made the grantee by the exception."

In Bowser v. Maclean, 2 De G. F. & J. 415, the Lord Chancellor said: "I am inclined to think that a mistake has been committed in not distinguishing between a copyhold tenement with minerals under it, and freehold leased land with a reservation of the minerals, or freehold land where the surface belongs to one owner and the subsoil containing minerals belongs to another, as separate tenements, divided from each other vertically instead of laterally. If this had been such freehold land the owner of the surface could not have complained of the making or of the excess in using a tramway through the subsoil."

In Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. 197, we held that where a deed in fee of land was made, the grantor "saving and reserving, nevertheless, for his own use, the coal contained in said piece or parcel of land together with free ingress and egress by wagon road to haul the coal therefrom as wanted" the saving clause operated as an exception of the coal, and therefore that the entire and perpetual property therein remained in the grantor. The whole reasoning of the opinion puts the case upon exactly the same footing as if the words of the exception had been contained in a specific grant of the coal, and Fulton v. Caldwell and kindred cases were cited as authorities for the ruling.

In MacSwinnery on Mines, p. 68, the author says: "Similar principles apply where the owner grants it (the surface) by way of lease excepting the mines, or where he grants the mines in fee simple, and excepts the surface."

In Bainbridge on Mines and Minerals, *34, the author says: "The severance of mines is usually effected by exceptions in deeds of assurance, which transfer the freehold in the surface and reserve the mines. An exception is distinguished from a reservation by its being part of the thing granted and in existence at the time of the grant, while the latter is a right of new creation arising out of the subject of the grant. They are different in legal effect, but in their creation 'there is no magic in words,' and if the meaning is clear, either of the above expressions will operate for the purpose designated. They are also construed exactly in the same way as actual grants. In either case the law favors their construction by giving them all proper and necessary incidents."

There is no averment in the bill that all the coal in the vein has been taken out, or that the tunnel is opened on the bed rock underneath the vein; on the contrary it is alleged that the tunnel has been cut through the coal, by which we understand it is in the very body or substance of the coal which was bought by the defendant. It follows, hence, that the tunnel or way is exclusively within the defendant's own property, and is subject to such use as any owner may desire of property belonging to himself. Upon the whole case we think the disposition of it made by the learned court below was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

M. B. LEE, Appt.,

v.

A. E. HAWKS.

(.....Miss......)

A stipulation in a written lease giving the tenant the right to cut and use trees growing on the leased premises may be waived by parol.

(May 25, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for De Soto County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for trespass in cutting timber. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Powell & Powell for appellant.

Mr. A. M. Solomon, for appellee:

Under the Statute of Frauds a verbal agreement could not be shown to contradict the written contract of lease, which had more than two years to run.

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 303, 305.

Defendant having, by a written contract, acquired a right to the timber which was not severed from the soil, the alleged sale or transfer of the trees to plaintiff under a verbal con-

NOTE.—Parol evidence to show waiver.

The proposition of the principal case that parol evidence is competent to show a waiver of a right secured under the recitals of the written contract is enunciated in both early and late decisions. Erwin v. Saunders, 1 Cow. 249; Robinson v. Batchelder, 4 N. H. 40; Richardson v. Hooper, 13 Pick. 446; Porter v. Stewart, 2 Aik. 417; Cabe v. Jameson, 32 N. C. 198; Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 238; Goss v. Nugent, 5 Barn. & Ad. 66; Blood v. Enos, 12 Vt. 625; Grafton Bank v. Woodward, 5 N. H. 90; Ratcliff v. Pemberton, 1 Esp. 36; Reed v. McGrew, 5 Ohio, 375; Keating v. Price, 1 Johns. Cas. 22; Cummings v. Arnold, 3 Met. 486.

This rule is laid down by Lord Denman in Goss v. Nugent, supra, as a well-established principle. In these terms: "After the agreement has been reduced to writing, it is competent for the parties, at any time before breach of it, by a new contract not in writing, either altogether to waive, dissolve, or annul the former agreement, or in any manner to add to, or subtract from, or vary, or qualify the terms of it, and thus to make a new contract" (Harvey v. Graham, 5 Ad. & El. 61), and this principle has been adopted in this country. See Emerson v. Slater, 68 U. S. 22 How. 41, 16 L. ed. 365; Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 238; Snow v. Ware, 13 Met. 42; Vicary v. Moore, 2 Watts, 451; Cummings v. Arnold, 3 Met. 486; Fleming v. Gilbert, 3 Johns. 528; 1 Phil. Ev. Cow. & H. ed. 563.

While it is generally true that all prior and contemporaneous negotiations are merged in the written agreement of the parties, and parol evidence could not be received of such negotiations, to vary, contradict, or alter the terms of the written agreement to ingraft a new condition, yet there is another rule equally important which allows a collateral agreement made prior to or contemporaneous with a written agreement, but not inconsistent with or affecting the terms, to be given in evidence. Brakine v. Adeane, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 756; Morgan v. Griffith, L. R. 6 Exch. 69; Johnson v. Oppenheim, 55 N. Y. 280.

It is quite necessary to remark that where on a consideration independent of a written instrument 13 L. R. A.

a certain thing is to be done or omitted, parol evidence of such contemporaneous or antecedent agreement is admissible. Lewis v. Seabury, 74 N. Y. 409; Rice, Ev. p. 313.

Fleming v. Gilbert, 3 Johns. 528, was an action on a bond conditioned that the defendant would procure for plaintiff a certain bond and mortgage, and discharge the same of record. The defendant did procure them, offering to do whatever was necessary to discharge them, but the plaintiff agreed by parol to waive a performance if the defendant would do another thing, which he afterwards did. It was held that evidence of the substituted performance constituted a defense. Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 238, and Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 Johns. 330, are similar in principle. These cases go upon the ground that he who prevents a thing from being done by saying he will accept something else for it, shall not, after such acceptance, avail himself of the nonperformance he has occasioned. Long v. Hartwell, 34 N. J. L. 116.

Batterman v. Pierce, 3 Hill, 171, sustains the defense to a note given upon the sale of a lot of wood on plaintiff's land, which was based upon the proof that the plaintiff had verbally agreed, prior to the sale, that if anything occurred to the wood he would be accountable, and would guarantee the purchasers against any damage in consequence of his acts. The principle of the decision was that there were mutual stipulations between the parties, all made at the same time and relating to the same subject matter, and the whole engagement was open to proof. The cases of Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74; Van Brunt v. Day, 81 N. Y. 251, and Brigg v. Hilton, 1 Cent. Rep. 307, 99 N. Y. 517, fully sustain the proposition that in such a case, where the agreement of the plaintiffs rested in parol, it is open to proof. The rule which rejects parol evidence, when offered with respect to a contract between parties and put into writing, has no application to a case where, of the original agreement which has been executed a part only is in writing. Routledge v. Worthington Co. 119 N. Y. 562.

That a party may waive a provision in a contract, see note to Hathaway v. Lynn (Wis.) 6 L. R. A. 552.

tract was within the Statute of Frauds. This was transferring an interest in land.

Harrell v. Miller, 35 Miss. 700; 1 Benjamin, Sales, p. 158, and notes.

The original written contract could not be varied by a subsequent parol agreement.

1 Benjamin, Sales, p. 227, and notes.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It may be admitted that a contract for the sale of growing timber is within the Statute of Frauds, and must be in writing, but this does only touch the point involved in the ruling of the court below by which the parol evidence offered was excluded. This suit is for the recovery of damages for trespass in cutting certain trees on lands belonging to plaintiff, and is not an action on a contract required to be in writing. The contract of lease, under which defendant went into possession of the premises for a term of three years, was read to the jury in the examination of the plaintiff, on the trial of the cause, by which it was shown that the defendant acquired the right to cut and use the trees in question. As this alone would have defeated a recovery by plaintiff, he then offered to prove a parol agreement, made subsequent to the execution of the lease, by which for a valid consideration, as was offered to be proven, the defendant waived his right to cut and use the timber, by way of meeting the defense made for the defendant by the contract of lease. In effect, the matter stands as if plaintiff had sued for the trespass, and defendant had pleaded justification under the written contract, and plaintiff had then offered to prove the parol agreement by way of defense to the plea. The Statute of Frauds debars one of an action on a contract, in certain cases, unless the contract be in writing; but a parol agreement to annul or waive a particular stipulation in the written contract which has been mutually assented to and fully performed, may be offered in evidence in defense of an action for a breach of the original written contract. An action may not be maintained, in cases within the Statute, upon a contract not in writing; but a defense may be made by showing an executed parol agreement waiving or annulling a particular provision of the written contract. The subject is not free from difficulty, and the discussions by text-writers, and the opinions of courts in reported cases, are full of subtle distinctions and refinements, nor is the current of authority clearly bent in any direction. The views briefly advanced hereinbefore are supported by some excellent authorities, and are agreeable to reason and justice. Benjamin, in his admirable work on Sales (p. 229), states the rule with his usual clearness: "Parol evidence to prove, not a substituted contract, but the assent of the defendant to a substituted mode of performance of the original contract, when that performance is completed, is admissible." See Stowin v. Seamens, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 255, 19 L. ed. 554; Jackson v. Litch, 63 Pa. 451; Long v. Hartwell, 84 N. J. L. 116; Reed, Stat. Fr. § 239.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

CENTRAL RAILROAD & BANKING CO. of Georgia, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Maud A. RYLEE, by Next Friend.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. A deed made in 1869 to the defendant company, or its predecessor, conveying the land on which the yard of the Company is located, was irrelevant. An exception in the warranty of title which that deed contained would be no evidence that the public or any individual had a right of way or used the premises as a pass-way at the time the accident occurred, the exception merely excluding from the warranty, rights, if any, that may have grown up previous to the execution of the deed. Other evidence tending to show how the premises were used before they became the railroad yard of the Company was irrelevant, and therefore inadmissible.

2. Though the analogies of criminal law touching presumptions as to the age of discretion are properly regarded by a court in ruling upon a demurrer where contributory negligence by an infant is involved (as was decided by this court in Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 84 Ga. 320), it is doubtful whether these analogies have relevancy on the trial of the case before the jury. It would seem the better rule would be for the jury to deal with

NOTE.—Negligence in passing between or under cars.

To pass between cars while a train is temporarily stopping at a station is a risk which a person has no right to take, and which will prevent any right of action against the railroad company if he is caught and injured by so doing. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pinchin, 11 West. Rep. 247, 112 Ind. 522; O'Mara v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 18 Hun, 192; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Copeland, 61 Ala. 376; Stillson v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 87 Mo. 671; Lewis v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 38 Md. 588.

In the case last cited this rule was applied where a child eight or nine years old was injured while attempting to pass through an opening not more than twenty inches wide several feet from the line of a street which was blocked by a train. But in a Pennsylvania case it was held that a recovery 18 L. R. A.

might be had against a railroad company for an injury to a child by the starting of a train without warning while he was trying to pass under it. Philadelphia & W. B. R. Co. v. Laver, 3 Cent. Rep. 361, 112 Pa. 414.

Implied license to go upon railroad track.

Long acquiescence in a custom of the public to pass over a railroad track amounts to a license by the railroad company, and makes it liable for the lack of ordinary care toward persons thus upon the track. Swift v. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. 123 N. Y. 645; Bryne v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Cent. Rep. 362, 104 N. Y. 362; Barry v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 92 N. Y. 239; Taylor v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 4 Cent. Rep. 623, 113 Pa. 162; Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 9 each case on its own facts; unhampered by presumptions of law either for or against the competency of the child. In the present case, however, the charge of the court on this subject, if erroneous, was harmless.

3. Only express consent would serve to license a thoroughfare under stationary cars. Mere knowledge by a railroad company or its servants that numerous persons, including children, without any public or private right of way, passed daily and hourly through its yard, situate in or near a populous part of the city, and crawled under stationary cars occupying its tracks, will not render it liable for an injury accruing to a child by a sudden and involuntary movement of a long line of such cars, resulting from the negligence of the company's servants in handling other cars several hundred yards distant from the scene of the accident, such other cars rolling against the standing cars and setting them in motion while the child was passing under one of them.

4. The other grounds of the motion are not cause for a new trial.

ERROR to the City Court of Atlanta City to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Calhoun, King & Spalding and J. T. Pendleton, for plaintiff in error:

A railroad company owes no duty to persons who have no right to be upon its tracks, except not to intentionally injure them. This is true, although it may have permitted people to cross the tracks without objection, where there was no public crossing, thus giving an implied license to do so. The licensees who avail themselves of the license must take the risk of danger.

her action against the defendant for damages. So far as specifically enumerated, the facts in the declaration (excluding certain mere conclusions therein stated, and which, in connection with the specific facts alleged, made the declaration good against a demurrer) were substantially proved, and were as follows: The defendant Company had a yard in which it left stationary cars. Two streets ended at this yard, but there was a pass-way from one of these streets to the shops of another railroad company; and this pass-way was used by men, women, and children at all hours of the day, and was so used with the knowledge of the defendant. The places at which the people were accustomed to pass were, at the time of the injury, occupied by stationary cars, and "the line of cars stretched as far as the eye could see." The plaintiff was under nine years of age, and was going to the shops of another railroad to carry a meal to one of the employes. When she reached the place where people usually crossed she found it occupied by these stationary cars. There was no way for her to cross except by passing under the cars. Children in the neighborhood were in the habit of passing beneath the cars while standing at the place. In attempting to pass under one of the stationary cars she was injured. Th injury was occasioned by the employes of the defendant "kicking" other cars from a quarter of a mile above where the child was, and out of sight, and these cars ran down and "kicked" the stationary cars, so as to cause them to move, and the one under which the child was ran over her leg. The plaintiff further proved that people were in the habit of crossing at this place before the Railroad Company established its yard. The plaintiff also introduced the deed by which the defendant Company obtained title to this property, dated in 1869, in which it was recited that the Company then claimed and had possession of the premises therein described, which were also claimed by the vendors, who had brought ejectment against the Company, which, to settle the action, and to obtain an undisputed warranty title to the premises in fee simple, had, by way of compromise, and without surrendering its former claim or conceding the invalidity thereof, agreed to pay the vendors $2,000, for which consideration the vendors warranted the title to the premises against the claims of all persons whatsoever; but this warranty was not to extend to any right the Western & Atlantic Railroad and certain other named persons might have to remove the buildings, tracks, or other structures erected by them on the premises, "nor to any right of way the public may have acquired in streets, ways, or roads over, across, or upon said premises." The defendant objected to the admission of this deed in evidence, "because it showed no use by the public of a pass-way across its tracks, and because, if it did, it showed a right to use by the public, whereas this suit is to recover on the ground of permissive use by the defendant." The objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted. A witness for the plaintiff testified that he had lived on Mechanic Street since 1863; that it was a common wagon-way until about 1870. From 1855 to 1860 there was no obstruction across the old Monroe track. "We passed on just as though it continued a street. We walked on it, and drove on it, and rode on it." The defendant moved to rule this out, because it did not show a permissive use by the defendant to pass over its tracks, but referred to a use at a time prior to the occupancy of the place by tracks, and before its ownership by the defendant. This objection was overruled, and the defendant assigns error thereon.

1. Counsel for the plaintiff insisted that the deed was admissible because the exception in the warranty showed that at the time the Railroad Company bought the land people were using the place as a pass-way, and thus brought home knowledge to the Company of this fact. The deed was clearly inadmissible and irrelevant. While the warranty in the deed was a limited one, it was not the purpose of the grantors in making the limitation to assert or to give notice to the grantee that the public had acquired the right to pass over the land. The grantors only intended to limit their liability in case it should subsequently appear that the public asserted a right to use the land as a pass-way. The limitation in the warranty does not give notice, nor was it intended to give notice, to the grantee that the public had acquired or were exercising the right of passage over the land. The other evidence tending to show how the premises were used before they became the railroad yard of the Company was also irrelevant and inadmissible. The Company could not be bound by the use made of the premises by the permission or acquiescence of its former owner. The Company purchased it for the purpose of laying tracks and running cars thereon, and for the purpose of keeping other cars standing on it when not in use,—a purpose totally inconsistent with the former use by the public. The purpose for which the Company purchased the land, to wit, to lay tracks, and keep standing cars thereon, destroyed the former use by the public. It was, in effect, a notice to the public that the land could not be used longer as a pass-way. It seems, therefore, it would be absurd to hold that the Company was bound to recognize the former use made of this land by the public.

2. The judge charged the jury that "the law declares that an infant under the age of ten years prima facie does not have sufficient capacity and discretion and knowledge of right and wrong to make her responsible for her conduct and acts, unless it is clearly shown that she had such capacity and discretion. The presumption is that she did not have sufficient capacity to be sensible of danger, and to have the power to avoid it, and this presumption continues until overcome by proof showing the contrary." This charge was excepted to by the defendant, and assigned as error in its motion for a new trial. Where a child under fourteen years of age is injured, and brings his action for the injury, and there is a demurrer to the declaration on the ground that the allegations therein show that the child did not observe due care, or could have avoided the injury by the observance of such care, the court may overrule the demurrer on the ground that prima facie the child did not have sufficient knowledge or capacity to know what was due care, or sufficient capacity to have avoided the injury by its observance, and may invoke the analogy of the criminal law, and hold that the presumption is that the child did not know or did not have sufficient capacity, as was held in the case of Rhodes v. Georgia & R. Bkg. Co., 84 Ga. 820. But where there is no demurrer, and the case is submitted to the jury, there is no presumption one way or the other, and the jury must find from the evidence whether the child had sufficient capacity at the time of the accident to know the danger, and to observe due care for its own protection. If it has such capacity, and voluntarily goes into danger or to a dangerous place, it cannot recover; otherwise it can. Western & A. R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 88 Ga. 512.

It depends altogether upon the capacity of the child at the time of the injury. The better rule would be for the jury to deal with each case upon its own facts, unhampered by presumptions of law either for or against the competency of the child. In the present case, however, the charge of the court on this subject, if erroneous, was harmless.

3. It was argued by counsel for the defendant in error that the fact that the people were allowed to use this place as a pass-way to go under these cars when they were stationed upon the track was a license by the Company for them to do so, and the Company was therefore bound, before it moved the stationary cars, to give the public notice; and, not having done so in this instance, it was guilty of such negligence as would authorize the plaintiff to recover. It is such gross negligence and want of care and so reckless an act for persons to attempt to pass under cars which are left standing upon the track and are liable to be moved at any moment, that we do not think a license can be implied from the fact that the Company had knowledge that people were in the habit of passing under the cars there. Where, under such circumstances, a person attempts to pass under the cars and is injured, before he can recover upon the theory that he had a license to pass under the cars, he must prove to the satisfaction of the jury an express license from the Company. It would be unreasonable to hold the Company bound by an implied license or permission when the Act is of such a negligent character. It would be unreasonable to hold the Company bound by an implied license when it is occupying the track with its own cars. It would be unreasonable to hold that it had agreed that others might have a joint occupancy of the tracks at the time the Company was using them for its own purposes. The joint use by the Company and by the public of the tracks at the same time would be so inconsistent and so dangerous that the law will not imply a license from the Company to the public for such joint use. The placing of stationary cars in its yard on the tracks where people are accustomed to pass is notice to the public not to attempt to pass while the cars remain, and if a person undertakes to pass under the cars he does so at his peril. It is different where the public pass over a track which is occupied by a railroad company with its cars only a few times a day, and then when the track is not being used by the company. In a case of that kind, where the railroad company permits people to pass over its track when not in use by the company, the permission may amount to an implied license; but where the company is in continuous occupation of its tracks, either in running its cars or in keeping stationary cars thereon, a license will not be implied.

The facts of this case show that the cars constantly occupied these tracks; that this stationary train was more than a quarter of a mile long; and that at the upper end of the train the servants of the Company, negligently perhaps, kicked another train of cars against the stationary train and set it in motion, and thus injured the plaintiff. We do not think the mere knowledge by the Company or its servants that numerous persons passed daily and hourly through its yard, situated in a populous part of the city, and that they crawled under these stationary cars, will render the Company liable for an injury occurring to this child, under the facts above stated.

4. The other grounds of the motion are not cause for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

v.

STANDARD LIFE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE CO.

(....Vt.....)

An injury received by slipping on the frozen ground while returning from a hunting expedition or a visit of pleasure to one in an adjoining town on Sunday is within the provisions of an accident insurance policy exempting the insurer from liability where the violation of law is either the proximate or remote cause or condition of the injury, under statutes prohibiting hunting and traveling, except from necessity or charity, on Sunday.

(April 14, 1891.)

(Wis.) 9 L. R. A. 686; Paul v. Travelers Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 8 L. R. A. 443; Union Mut. Acc. Assn. v. Frohard (Ill.) 10 L. R. A. 883.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Burlington City Court, made during the trial of an action brought to recover upon two policies of accident insurance which resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Seneca Haselton and L. F. Englesby, for defendant:

The insurance for which the plaintiff paid did not cover injuries resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from any violation of law on the part of the insured, whether such violation of law be regarded as a cause or a condition. Plaintiff's injury manifestly resulted from his gross violation of sections 4315 and 4316 of the Revised Laws with reference to the observance of Sunday.

In cases in which a wrong-doer has sought to escape responsibility for his tort to a Sunday traveler or laborer, some of the most eminent courts in this country, notwithstanding the resulting hardship, have held that the Sunday travel or labor was the direct and immediate cause of the injury.

Day v. Highland St. R. Co. 135 Mass. 113, and cases there cited; Cratty v. Bangor, 57 Me. 428. See also Baldwin v. Barney, 13 R. I. 392; Platz v. Cohoes, 89 N. Y. 223; Johnson v. Irasburgh, 47 Vt. 28; Travelers Ins. Co. v. Seaver, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 531, 22 L. ed. 155, should be decisive of this case.

Messrs. W. L. Burnap and J. J. Enright, for plaintiff:

The only inquiry is, Did the plaintiff's injury result from any violation of law?

If the provision in the policy is susceptible of more than one construction, that one is to be adopted which will support the validity of the contract, and it will be strictly construed against the insurer.

Darrow v. Family Fund Soc. 6 L. R. A. 495, 116 N. Y. 537.

Conceding that a violation of some law was in progress at the time of the hurt, a relation must exist between such violation and the injury, to make the defense available; the injury must have been caused by the violation of law.

Bradley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 45 N. Y. 422.

The policy is not to be avoided because the assured had, just previous to the accident, been violating some law, unless the natural or direct operation of such violation caused the accident.

The hunting expedition and the visit, if brought within the range of consideration at all, were the remote and not the proximate cause.

In Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Buck, 2 L. R. A. 524, 116 Ind. 566, the court says: "It is quite true that a plaintiff will in no case be permitted to recover where it is necessary for him to prove his own illegal act as a part of his cause of action, or where an essential element of his cause of action is his own violation of law."

Holt v. Green, 73 Pa. 198; Hall v. Coppell, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 558, 19 L. ed. 248; Steele v. Burkhardt, 104 Mass. 59; McGrath v. Merwin, 112 Mass. 467.

But where he can prove his cause of action without proving he was violating the law, even 18 L. R. A.

though it appears incidentally that he was at the time acting in disobedience of some statute, unless his illegal act was the efficient or proximate cause of the injury complained of, a recovery may be sustained nevertheless.

Cooley, Torts, 178.

No violation of law was in progress at the time. The plaintiff was not hunting when he was hurt; he was walking home after having been visiting.

It was not because he was walking on Sunday that he was hurt. Had he received his injury while fighting, or committing a breach of the peace, or a burglary, it would be different, and within the line of cases where this defense has been permitted, as in —

Travelers Ins. Co. v. Seaver, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 531, 22 L. ed. 155. See Goetzman v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 3 Hun. 517; Murray v. New York L. Ins. Co. 96 N. Y. 614; Cluff v. Mut. Ben. L. Ins. Co. 13 Allen, 308.

The words "violation of law" mean "crime." Cluff v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 99 Mass. 326.

In using the term "violation of law" the Company could not have contemplated any violation not in itself importing personal peril—involving the doing of something which human experience has shown to be fraught with peril to the person.

Murray v. New York L. Ins. Co. supra.

Thompson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit on two policies issued by defendant to plaintiff insuring him against accidental injuries. If the plaintiff has any ground of recovery, it rests wholly on these contracts of indemnity. A contract of insurance is to be construed according to its terms and the evident intent of the parties as gathered from the language used. All conditions involving forfeitures, as well as all exemptions, are to be construed strictly against the insurer, and most favorably for the insured. Yet the language of the contract is to be construed as a whole, is to receive a reasonable interpretation, and the risk is not to be extended beyond what is fairly within the terms of the policy. May, Ins. 2d ed. §§ 172, 175; Brink v. Merchants & M. Ins. Co. 49 Vt. 442; Mosley v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 55 Vt. 142; Darrow v. Family Fund Soc. 116 N. Y. 537, 6 L. R. A. 495; Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Scottish Union & N. Ins. Co. 84 Va. 116.

Each policy contains the following clause: "This insurance does not cover . . . injury resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from any of the following acts, causes, or conditions, or when effected by any such act, cause, or condition, or under its influence." Then follows an enumeration of such acts, causes, or conditions, among which is "violation of law" by the insured. The injury for which plaintiff seeks to recover is an injury to his knee sustained by him on Sunday, January 20, 1899. The plaintiff and a companion, about 9 o'clock in the forenoon of that day, took guns and ammunition, and set out from Burlington on foot for Colchester on a hunting expedition. They traveled on the highway six or seven miles, and then took dinner with a Mr. Choates. After dinner they engaged in hunting with Choates, who went with them as far as a Mr. Thayer's, where they stopped a short time. Here Choates left them, and the plaintiff and his companion started for home through a field, and, while crossing frozen plowed ground in the field to get to the highway, the plaintiff's foot slipped upon the frozen plowed ground, and his knee was injured. At the time of slipping he was carrying his gun. The accident occurred between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The defendant contends that the facts of the case bring it within the provisions of the policy in respect to violations of law, and that, therefore, the plaintiff cannot recover. Rev. Laws, § 4815, prohibits traveling on Sunday, except from necessity or charity, or visiting from house to house except from motives of humanity or charity, or for moral or religious edification. Rev. Laws, § 4816, prohibits hunting, shooting, pursuing, taking, or killing wild game, or other birds or animals, on Sunday. A person violating the provisions of either of these sections is to be fined. At the time of the accident, the plaintiff was engaged in hunting. He had his gun with him, and was ready to shoot any game he might see, whether in the field or on the highway on his way home. He started out to secure game wherever he might find it, and it does not appear that at the time of the accident he had abandoned this purpose. In hunting he was violating the law of this State. The traveling of the plaintiff was as much a part of his act of hunting as carrying his gun and ammunition or shooting or capturing game when the opportunity occurred in the course of the hunt. Without walking, the plaintiff could not have engaged in his hunt. Thus the accident was caused directly by plaintiff's violation of the law in hunting. The effect of the violation of the Sunday Law upon a person's right to recover for injuries received in the course of such violation has generally arisen in cases in which the defendant sought to escape responsibility for his own tort to a traveler or laborer. On this question the decisions have not been uniform. Some courts have held that the immediate cause of the injury was the travel or labor on Sunday, and that the plaintiff could not recover. Of this class of cases are Day v. Highland St. R. Co. 185 Mass. 118; Cratty v. Bangor, 57 Me. 428. Other able courts have held that a Sunday traveler or laborer, injured by the wrongful act or neglect of another, might recover upon the ground that the violation of the Sunday Law by the injured party is in the nature of a condition, rather than an immediate cause of the injury. To this effect are Baldwin v. Barney, 12 R. I. 392; Platz v. Cohoes, 89 N. Y. 219; Sutton v. Wauwatosa, 29 Wis. 21.

In Johnson v. Irasburgh, 47 Vt. 28, the court avoided the line of reasoning adopted in each of these classes of cases, by holding that a town was not bound to maintain a safe and sufficient highway for unlawful travel on Sunday or any other day, and that a person using the highway in violation of the Sunday Law was there at his own risk, there being no duty or liability on the part of the town in respect to the highway except that imposed by statute. The plaintiff's right of recovery rests in contract; and not in tort. No act or neglect of the defendant caused or contributed to the plaintiff's injury. Were the reasoning in Baldwin v. Barney, supra, to be adopted, it would not avail the plaintiff, for, if being engaged in the unlawful expedition was not the immediate cause of his injury, it was certainly the condition causing it. The provision quoted from the policy excluded liability from any injury of which a violation of the law was the cause or condition producing it. It also expressly provides exemption from liability where violation of law is either the proximate or remote cause or condition producing the injury. In short, it is so drawn as to exempt from liability under the reasoning and the holding of the courts in both classes of cases cited.

The plaintiff contends in argument that he was not engaged in hunting at the time he received the injury, but was walking home after he had been visiting. Were this claim conceded, we do not see how it gives plaintiff any better ground for recovery. He was not out simply for open air and gentle exercise, without any object of business or pleasure, as in Hamilton v. Boston, 14 Allen, 475, but was traveling several miles and from town to town, on this theory, to make a visit for pleasure.

In Cratty v. Bangor, supra, the plaintiff was traveling on foot on Sunday with other persons to make a visit of pleasure to a friend, and it was held that he was traveling in violation of a statute prohibiting traveling on Sunday, unless for charity or necessity. The court further says that "no distinction is made between those who travel within town and those who travel from town to town." In going from Burlington to Colchester, and back, a distance of twelve or fourteen miles, to visit Choates for pleasure, or to hunt, the plaintiff was clearly violating the provisions of Rev. Laws, § 4815, prohibiting traveling on Sunday. Every step he took in making that trip was in and of itself a violation of law. In taking one of those steps he slipped and was injured. We think it would savor too strongly of hair-splitting refinement to hold that the injury was not directly caused by the violation of the law in traveling. But, in this view of the case, the exception in the policy exempts the defendant from liability, whether the traveling is held to be the cause or only a condition producing injury, or influencing it, directly or indirectly. The liability to accident must be greatly enhanced in the case of a person who, like the plaintiff, engages in hunting or traveling about the country on Sunday, in open violation of law, as compared with one who observes the law. The defendant has a right to say that it would not assume such increased risk. The defendant not having contracted to indemnify the plaintiff for the injury which he received, he cannot recover.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for defendant.

Moses M. KELSEY, Admr., etc., of James Roberts, Deceased,

v.

John KELLEY et al., Appts.

(.....Vt.....)

1. The separate estate of a married woman cannot, in favor of her deceased father's creditors, be charged with an amount which he was compelled to pay as surety for her husband.
2. The cost of repairs gratuitously made by a father on his married daughter's house while he was living with her, for his own benefit and without any expectation of payment or substantial benefit to the property, cannot after his death be charged against her separate estate for the benefit of his creditors.
3. Where a father advanced his married daughter money with the expectation that himself and his wife would live with her and be cared for in her family during their lives, and, after so living with her until, at a fair price for board, the amount would be exhausted, the parties entered into another agreement as to future support, the court will, after the mouth of the daughter has been closed by the death of the father and mother, consider the board as the full equivalent for the money furnished as the parties then treated it.
4. Although a conveyance of property in consideration of future support is void as against creditors, yet it will not be set aside at their instance after support has been furnished in reliance on it, which in value exceeds that of the property conveyed.

(March 26, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Orleans County in favor of complainant in a suit brought to charge the separate estate of defendant Malina Kelley with money received by her from her father during his lifetime. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. C. A. Prouty and Edwards & Burke, for appellants:

To charge the separate estate of a married woman, it must affirmatively appear that credit was given her estate.

Priest v. Cone, 51 Vt. 495; Dale v. Robinson, 12 Vt. 384; Sargeant v. French, 54 Vt. 384.

Considering that the conveyance for future support would be voidable as to a prior debt when made, it was voidable at that time because no valuable consideration passed. Afterwards a valuable consideration did pass; and from the date of the passing of that consideration, the conveyance ceased to be voidable.

It is important to notice the distinction between this conveyance and one fraudulent in fact. In the latter case the transaction is void as to both prior and subsequent debts.

McLane v. Johnson, 48 Vt. 43.

In the former case it is only void as to existing debts.

Brackett v. Waite, 4 Vt. 389; Rutland & B. R. Co. v. Powers, 25 Vt. 15. See also Foster v. Foster, 56 Vt. 551; Church v. Chapin, 35 Vt. 223.

If a voluntary conveyance be made, which is voidable when made because voluntary, and subsequently a good consideration passes, the deed ceases to be voidable from the passing of such consideration.

Jones v. Bryant, 18 N. H. 59; Rucker v. Abell, 8 B. Mon. 556; Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 25; Verplank v. Sterry, 13 Johns. 585; Sterry v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 258, 1 L. ed. 182.

It has even been held that where the original conveyance is fraudulent in fact, the transaction may be purged of its taint by the passing of a subsequent valuable consideration, provided the consideration be paid before the bringing of the suit to set aside the conveyance.

Thomas v. Goodwin, 19 Mass. 140; Hutchins v. Sprague, 4 N. H. 469.

This conveyance was not void. It was merely voidable.

Walt, Fraud. Conv. § 317. See Allen v. Mower, 17 Vt. 68.

Messrs. Dickerman & Young, for appellee:

Orator is entitled to a decree, as rendered below, for the amount of the Hopkinson note of $600, delivered to defendant Malina by the deceased, March 23, 1894, in consideration of the bond for the future support of said Roberts and wife through life. Therefore the transaction was fraudulent and void in law as to creditors and gave defendants no right or title to the money received on the note as against them so long as their claims remained unpaid.

NOTE.—Voluntary conveyance; consideration.

A voluntary conveyance may become valid, and even a fraudulent grant may be purged of the fraud, by matter ex post facto, whereby the fraudulent intent is abandoned and the grant confirmed for a good and valuable consideration. Oriental Bank v. Haskins, 3 Met. 322; Thomas v. Goodwin, 12 Mass. 140; Crowninshield v. Kittredge, 7 Met. 324; Harvey v. Varney, 36 Mass. 120.

So a voluntary deed has been made good by a subsequent marriage. Andrews v. Jones, 10 Ala. 400; Bunnell v. Witherow, 29 Ind. 123; Smith v. Allen, 5 Allen, 454; Armfield v. Armfield, Freem. Ch. 311; Jones' App. 62 Pa. 324; Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628; Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 33.

A valuable or meritorious consideration is founded on something deemed valuable, as money, goods, services and marriage; and a voluntary or good consideration is founded upon natural love and affection between near relatives by blood. Wickes v. Clarke, 8 Paige, 161, 4 L. ed. 384; Van Derveer v. Wright, 6 Barb. 549.

Consideration of support and maintenance.

A grantee by accepting the deed and entering into possession under it is bound by the agreement providing for the support of the grantor. Hutchinson v. Hutchinson, 46 Me. 154; Exum v. Canty, 34 Miss. 523; Spalding v. Hallenbeck, 30 Barb. 292; Shontz v. Brown, 27 Pa. 123; the case of Jackson v. Florence, 16 Johns. 47, distinguished where the provision for support raised no obligation on the grantee. 2 Devlin, Deeds, § 407. See Henderson v. Hunton, 26 Gratt. 925.

Where, after executing a lease in consideration that lessees should occupy the premises and support the lessor during life, the lessor executes a deed to the lessees in fee, providing that if the latter conform strictly to the agreements in the lease the deed shall remain in full force and effect and take effect at the grantor's death, the grantees are entitled to retain the possession so long as they comply with the covenants to support and care for the grantor; and it is immaterial whether the legal title passed in present or not. Stanton v. Allen, 32 S. C. 597.

Crane v. Stickle, 15 Vt. 252-257; Jones v. Spear, 21 Vt. 426-481; Worthington v. Jones, 23 Vt. 549; Church v. Chapin, 35 Vt. 228; McLane v. Johnson, 43 Vt. 48.

The master finds that "Roberts . . . went to live with defendants," not with defendant Malina. Consequently it is presumed that Mr. Roberts and wife boarded with defendant John Kelley. Therefore Mr. Roberts had the right to have any debt, either or both defendants owed him applied in payment pro tanto of his board. Where there are mutual accounts and no application is made by the parties, the court will apply the first credit or payment in satisfaction of the first debit or charge.

Pierce v. Knight, 31 Vt. 701; St. Albans v. Failey, 46 Vt. 448; Langdon v. Bowen, 46 Vt. 512.

This rule would apply the claim for board in satisfaction of the amount paid upon the suretyship obligations.

See Roberts v. Kelley, 51 Vt. 37.

All transactions which precede the date of the bond for support stand as mutual debits and credits, and should be treated as an open book account. Interest should be allowed upon the account.

Langdon v. Castleton, 30 Vt. 285; Spencer v. Woodbridge, 33 Vt. 492; Goodnow v. Parsons, 36 Vt. 46; Davis v. Smith, 43 Vt. 52.

Ross, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The original bill proceeds upon the ground that the defendant wife had, in the lifetime of the intestate, her father, received from him various sums of money or loans, which she had not fully repaid, and the orator, as administrator, brings the bill to have the balance due ascertained, and made a charge upon the wife's real and personal property, that it may be available to him in the payment of the debts proved against the estate. He brings the bill in the interest of the creditors. After the master's report was filed, showing that none of the claimed sums were received by the wife as loans, the orator was allowed to amend his bill, by setting forth that she received the various sums charged in the original bill, which were found established by the master, under such circumstances that it would be fraudulent in law to allow her to retain the sums so received against the creditors, who have proved their debts against the father's estate. When these transactions transpired, to lay the foundation for a charge in equity upon the wife's separate property, the money must have been advanced upon the credit of the separate property, and for its benefit, or for the personal benefit of the wife. Dale v. Robinson, 51 Vt. 20; Priest v. Cone, Id. 495.

1. Considering the scope of the bill, and the requisites necessary to constitute a charge in equity upon the wife's separate property, it is evident that the $200 paid by the intestate as surety for the defendant husband cannot be considered. The scope of the bill, as amended, and the principles of equity law applicable to charging the wife's separate estate, do not permit a general accounting of all matters existing between the intestate and the defendants. They include such matters only as the wife is interested in and as fall within the principles of the cases supra. It is not found that this sum was paid by the intestate upon the credit of the wife's property, or for its benefit, or for the wife's benefit; but it is found to have been paid by the intestate only as surety for the husband, and that it had no connection with the subsequent dealings between the intestate and the defendants, in which the wife or her property was interested.

2. The facts found by the master dispose of the $468.25, which the intestate let the wife have in money, and which he expended in repairs upon the house, in 1874. During that year the intestate and his wife boarded with the defendants. He let them have $200 in money, and laid out in repairs on the wife's house $289.25. The master has found that the board of the intestate and his wife was more than enough to pay the $200, which, he finds, the intestate expected would be taken up in board, and that the intestate made the repairs "to suit his own taste and convenience, consulting no one about them;" and that "it was not understood by either party that any money was to be paid the intestate for the repairs; and that what was not paid in board was done by the intestate and for his benefit." These facts fully sustain the disallowance of any part of this item by the master, especially when he has not found that the repairs materially enhanced the value of the premises or were necessary. The facts found show that at this time the property owned by the intestate was more in value than required to pay all the debts proved against the estate. These facts leave no ground for the contention of the orator that the balance of this item which remained unpaid by the board furnished the intestate and his wife should enter into the accounting in connection with the subsequent items. The law does not imply a promise to pay for repairs made as these were, without expectation of payment, and without it being found that they were of a substantial benefit to the property.

3. In the spring of 1879 the defendant wife purchased a farm; and the intestate paid $1,000 towards it, with the expectation that he and his wife should live with and be cared for by the defendants. From that time to the time of the death of the intestate and his wife they did live with and were cared for by the defendants. At different times between the spring of 1879 and November, 1884, but at what times or in what sums is not found, the intestate furnished the defendant wife $200, which was invested in personal property, for her benefit, to be used on the farm. The master has not found that any part of the $200 was furnished subsequently to the arrangement made in March, 1884. He treats the $200 in the same way he does the $1,000, and has found no fact to show that it should be treated otherwise, except that he says that no evidence relating to interest upon any item was introduced; and that, as the particular times and amounts at and in which this item was furnished are not shown, he allows it as of November 4, 1884. From the manner in which the master has treated the $200, and from the facts he has found in regard to it, we do not think there is any just ground for the contention of the orator that this sum should be treated as furnished after the arrangement of March, 1884. If the master had so regarded it he would not have treated it in connection with and in the same way he has treated the $1,000. Further than that, the intestate and his wife expected to live with and be cared for by the defendants. "All the transactions between the parties seem indefinite and without design. It was one of those frequent, unfortunate, and indefinite transactions which occur among relatives." He finds that at a fair price for boarding the intestate and his wife, in March, 1884, this $1,200 had been more than overpaid; and the husband told the intestate that the money was all exhausted, and the intestate soon after entered into a further arrangement in regard to the future support of himself and wife. After the death of the intestate and his wife, and after the mouths of the defendants have become closed by the Statute, it would be hazardous for the master or court to attempt to treat the matter of the $1,200 and board differently from what the parties then treated it, or the board as a full equivalent for the money furnished. We think they should be so considered.

In March, 1884, the intestate advanced to the defendant wife $600 more by way of the Hopkinson note, which was used to make a further payment towards her farm, and took a bond from the defendants for the support of himself and wife during their natural lives. During the period covering all these transactions the defendant husband was insolvent. The defendants fully performed the condition of the bond, and, as found by the master, at an expense of more than the $600 received therefor. The debts proved against the estate and represented by the orator were all contracted by the intestate before the transactions of 1879. By that transaction, and the transaction of 1884, the intestate disposed of substantially all his property for the support of himself and wife, without making any provision for the payment of these debts. The orator contends that this disposition of the property was in law fraudulent, as regards these creditors, although good between the parties, and although the defendants' agreement to support the intestate and his wife was, as between the parties, an ample and valid consideration for the money advanced. This contention is fully supported by the authorities cited. Crane v. Stickles, 15 Vt. 252; Jones v. Spear, 21 Vt. 426; Worthington v. Jones, 23 Vt. 549; Church v. Chapin, 35 Vt. 223. The other case cited (McLane v. Johnson, 43 Vt. 48) is one of fraud in fact, and not in law, and not applicable. The other cases proceed upon the ground that it is the legal duty of a debtor to pay his debts rather than provide for the future support of himself and family, and that existing creditors may avail themselves of property conveyed for future support for the payment of their debts. The creditor can avoid such conveyances only because the debtor has no other property out of which payment can be enforced. In none of these cases, and in no case to which our attention has been called, has it been held that the creditor could wait until the support had been furnished, and the contract fully executed by both parties, and then recover enough of the value of the property conveyed for the support to pay his debt. In all the cases cited the identical property conveyed in consideration of future support, or some of it, was taken and appropriated by the creditor, except the case in 15 Vt.; and in that case it is said: "Perhaps the judgment of the county court would have been more technically correct if it had adjudged them trustees for the specific articles of personal property which they had received of the defendant, instead of adjudging them trustees generally," plainly indicating the course of proceeding which was followed in the other cases. This is a case in equity, in which the orator must do, as well as receive, equity. The master has not found that these transactions between the intestate and these defendants were tainted with fraud in fact, nor does the bill charge fraud in fact. If now, after the defendants have fully supported the intestate and his wife, at an expense greater than the money received, the orator can compel a return of the money received sufficient to pay the creditors represented by the orator, these defendants are left with a debt of an equal amount, also provable against the estate represented by the orator. Why should the creditors represented by the orator receive payment more than the defendants? The defendants have been guilty of no wrong in supporting their father and mother, nor was it any more of a wrong for them to receive payment for such support than for the creditors represented by the orator to receive payment for their debts. These creditors did not know of the existence of the property received by the defendants for the support, and did nothing on the strength of its existence. On the other hand, the defendants knew of it, and furnished the support for it. If they had furnished the support before receiving payment therefor, and then received the same property which they did receive, no one would claim that the orator could recover the property back, to pay the creditors represented by him. If the creditors represented by the orator had intervened before the defendants had furnished the support, they would have had the better right to the property, and the defendants have sustained no damage. Their intervention would have relieved the defendants from this contract to furnish further support. The consideration for this contract further to support would have been taken away. The defendants, until they had furnished the full support, were like a purchaser bona fide in every respect, except he had not fully paid the contract price of the property purchased. Where he must be a bona fide purchaser for value, to be protected in his purchase, if otherwise a bona fide purchaser, he is protected only to the extent he has paid value. But although he does not pay full value at the time of the purchase, if such payment is made in full before he is made aware of the infirmity of his purchase, he is fully pro-

ted. We think this principle applicable between the orator and these defendants, especially the wife, on the facts of this case. Conveyances of property to secure future support, until the support is furnished, have the infirmity of voluntary conveyances, or conveyances for which a full, valuable consideration is not paid at the time the conveyance is made. It is well settled that supineness of a creditor to attack and have such conveyances set aside may defeat his right. Egleberger v. Kibler, 1 Hill, Eq. 113, 26 Am. Dec. 192. Such conveyances may be validated by ex post facto acts. Verplank v. Sterry, 12 Johns. 536, 7 Am. Dec. 348.

While these cases are not analogous in their facts to the facts in the case at bar, we think this case is controlled by the same equitable principles. When this suit was brought, in principle the defendants stood related to the money received for the support of the intestate and wife in equity, just as they would if they had first furnished the support, and then received the money in payment therefor. The intestate then might well prefer them, in making payment of his debts, to the creditors represented by the orator. We notice nothing in the testimony excepted to that was inadmissible in substance.

The decree of the Court of Chancery is reversed, and the cause remanded, with a mandate to dismiss the bill, with costs to the defendants.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Charles H. DILLABY

v.

Betsey A. WILCOX, Appt.

(....Conn.....)

A verbal promise by the administrator of an estate holding a mortgage against a third person to pay taxes assessed against the mortgagor if the collector will not levy on the mortgaged property, upon which he has no lien, is within the Statute of Frauds and not enforceable.

(January 19, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for New London County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover certain taxes which it was alleged defendant had agreed to pay. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. Lucas for appellant.

Messrs. J. Halsey and W. A. Briscoe, for appellee:

The promise of the defendant was an original undertaking and therefore not within the Statute of Frauds. While it is true that the taxes in question were not a specific lien upon the personal property, nevertheless the plaintiff had a right to levy upon the equity of redemption in said property and to sell it for the taxes. In consideration of his promise to relinquish such right, the defendant undertook to pay the taxes when the property should have been sold under foreclosure.

See Browne, Stat. Fr. § 204; Burr v. Wilcox, 18 Allen, 273.

Forbearance at the request of the defendant, or any act done at defendant's request and for her convenience or to the inconvenience of the plaintiff, is a sufficient consideration for the promise.

Burr v. Wilcox, supra.

Seymour, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in this case was collector of taxes for the town, city, and central school-district of Norwich, and had in his hands warrants for the collection of taxes assessed in favor of each of them upon property of one Gordon Wilcox. The defendant and her mother were the administrators of the estate of William Wilcox, deceased, and, as such, held a mortgage on certain personal property of Gordon Wilcox, consisting of printing presses and material in the possession of and used by him in Norwich. The plaintiff was unable to procure payment of the taxes from Gordon Wilcox, and applied to the defendant for the payment thereof, and threatened to levy upon said mortgaged property unless they were paid. The defendant promised the plaintiff that if he would forbear to levy upon the property she would pay the taxes as soon as the property should be sold under the judgment of foreclosure which she and her mother, as administrators aforesaid, had obtained upon the mortgage. The plaintiff, in consideration of this promise of the defendant, promised to forbear, and did forbear, to levy upon the property, and the same was sold under the judgment of foreclosure, and was bid in for the defendant. The defendant, after the sale, refused to pay the amount of the taxes to the plaintiff, and they have not been paid. The suit, it will be observed, is against Mrs. Wilcox personally. No pleadings subsequent to the complaint appear to have been filed, but the finding shows that the defendant denied that she made the promise upon which the action was brought. She also claimed that the promise declared on was within the Statute of Frauds, and, not being in writing, no recovery could be had upon it; and, further, that there was no consideration for the promise, and asked the court so to rule; but the court refused so to do, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals. Was the promise, which the court finds was made, within the Statute of Frauds? The Statute provides that "no civil action shall be maintained upon any agreement whereby to charge any executor or administrator upon a special promise to answer damages out of his own estate, or against any person upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, . . . unless such agreement, or some memorandum thereof, be made in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith or his agent." Gen. Stat. § 1866.

The first clause has reference to promises by an executor or administrator to answer out of his own estate for a claim against his decedent,—some liability resting upon the executor or administrator strictly in his representative character, and which, but for the promise, he would have been liable to discharge only in due course of the administration of the estate. To change the expression, this clause of the Statute covers a special promise made by the executor or administrator to pay, out of his own estate, what (being the legal representative of the party originally liable) he is already, in that representative capacity, under a liability to pay, to the extent of the property which has come into his hands. "The particular object of this provision," says a recent writer upon the Statute, "was evidently to guard executors and administrators against being held to a personal liability to pay debts, legacies, or distributive shares in consequence of a willful or mistaken perversion of expressions of encouragement which they may have used in conversation with claimants, and which were not justified by the ultimate result of administration of the assets in their hands." Throop, Verb. Agr. p. 87. However that may be, the suggestion illustrates the nature of the promise referred to in this section. The promise proved, in the case before us, was to answer for the debt or default of Gordon Wilcox, a third party, and is a promise to which that clause has no reference. The suggestion that the defendant, if compelled to pay the judgment, can repay herself out of the assets of the estate, does not tend to bring the promise within the clause. Most of the personal obligations of an executor contracted in the course of his administration, says the court in Chambers v. Robbins, 28 Conn. 550, are proper charges against the estate in the final settlement of his account, but they are none the less his private debts, for which he is alone liable in his private capacity. In Pratt v. Humphrey, 22 Conn. 317, a leading case upon this clause, the promise was to pay a debt due from the estate of which the defendants were administrators,—an entirely different case from the one at bar.

The second clause of the Statute relates to the special promise of any person to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another. An immense amount of litigation has arisen over its construction. It is impossible to reconcile the decisions which have been made under it. Almost any theory of its scope and meaning can find some case to support it. The most careful text-writers have acknowledged their inability to find anything like uniform rules of construction in the conflicting decisions which have been rendered. It has even been stated that the law upon it is in a state of hopeless confusion. It is all the more satisfactory, therefore, that our own court seems, so far at least as the points involved in this case are concerned, to have found and adopted a rule which has proved satisfactory,—a rule which, we think, substantially settles the question before us. The promisor, to briefly restate the facts, was one of the administrators of William Wilcox's estate,—a fact, as we have seen, of no significance, unless to show a motive for her promise, founded on a fancied advantage to the estate of her decedent. The promisee was the collector of taxes, threatening to levy on personal property upon which he had no lien, and on which William Wilcox's estate held a mortgage. The levy, if made, would of course have been subject to such mortgage. The party for whose debt or default the promise to answer was made was a delinquent tax-payer, who, after the promise, continued liable for the taxes until paid. The suit, then, is by a tax-collector against a defendant, who, in consideration of the plaintiff's forbearance to levy for a third person's tax on personal property on which an estate of which she was one of the administrators had a mortgage, promised to pay taxes due to Norwich town and city and a school-district of the town from said taxpayer, the mortgagor of the property. In Packer v. Benton, 35 Conn. 343, it was held that "where a person, not before liable, agrees to pay the debt of a third person, and, as a part of the arrangement, the original debtor is discharged from his indebtedness, the agreement is not within the Statute of Frauds. Otherwise, if the original debtor continues liable." We shall quote somewhat extensively from that case, as the rule therein established has subsequently been applied in Pratt's App., 41 Conn. 191, and in Gridley v. Sumner, 43 Conn. 16, and is, as already suggested, decisive of the case now before us. Judge Butler writes the opinion, and after contrasting the facts then before the court with those in Clapp v. Lavton, 31 Conn. 95, he says (p. 349): "Here the contract was tripartite, between the debtor, a creditor, and a third person; and it contemplated the discharge of the original debtor, and a new obligation by the third party to the particular creditor. Such new obligation and indebtedness is not within the Statute of Frauds. In Turner v. Hubbell, 2 Day, 457, the distinguished counsel for the defendant in error deduced, from the cases which had then occurred under this branch of the Statute, the following definition of the promise intended by it, to wit, 'an undertaking by a person not before liable, for the purpose of securing or performing the same duty for which the party for whom the undertaking is made is, at the same time, liable;' and it was adopted by the court. With a single modification, that definition furnishes as perfect a test as has ever been, or, we think, can be devised. . . . The foregoing definition may be modified, therefore, so as to read: 'An undertaking by a person not before liable, for the purpose of securing or performing the same duty for which the party for whom the undertaking is made continues liable.' Applying this test to the case in hand, it is obvious that the objection of the defendant ought not to prevail. It was the purpose and effect of the tripartite contract in question to discharge the original debtors in consideration of their giving up their property to the defendant, as well as to operate the defendant in consideration of that discharge. . . . As the original debtors did not continue liable, an essential element of the test was wanting, and the contract was not within the Statute."

In the case now before us all the essential elements of the test are present, and bring the promise within the Statute. The case of Packer v. Benton does not discuss the questions which might arise in that class of cases, where the defendant, for his own use and advantage, procures from the plaintiff the surrender, release, or waiver of a lien or security which the latter holds for a debt due him, upon the promise to pay the debt. In such cases it has been held, in a large number of cases, that the promise is not within the Statute, though the original debt is not discharged, on the ground that the transaction amounts to a purchase from the creditor of such lien or security for a price which is the amount of the original debt, and that the relinquishment of the lien or security has inured to the defendant's benefit. In the leading case of Fullam v. Adams, 87 Vt. 391, it is held that "a verbal promise to pay the debt of another, where the original debt still subsists, is never legally binding, except where the promisor has received the funds or property of the debtor for the purpose of being so applied, so that an obligation or duty rests upon him, as between himself and the debtor, to make such payment, whereby his promise, though in form to pay the debt of another, is in fact a promise to perform an obligation or duty of his own." Poland, Ch. J., who writes the opinion, says (p. 397) that the cases which decide that where a creditor holds a security and surrenders it to a third person, for his benefit, upon his promise to be answerable for the debt, stand really upon the same substantial principle.

It is stated in the text of the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, in loco, that, in a large and increasing number of the States of the Union, the promise, although made upon a new consideration of benefit to the promisor, is held to be collateral, whatever the intent of the parties, if the original liability remains; and a very large number of authorities are cited in support of the proposition. It is to be noticed, as illustrating the difference in construction already alluded to, that, in a recent case in New York (White v. Rintoul, 108 N. Y. 222, 10 Cent. Rep. 704) it is stated, though under a semble, that a promise to pay a debt of another, antecedently contracted, where the primary debt still subsists, is original, and so valid, within the Statutes of Frauds, although not in writing, when it is founded on a new consideration moving to the promisor, and beneficial to him, and when by the promise he comes under an independent duty of paying, irrespective of the liability of the principal debtor. Curiously enough, this intimation of an opinion—for it amounts to nothing more, as reported—is made in a case where the defendant was a creditor of a firm, and was secured by a chattel mortgage. The plaintiff was the holder of two notes of the firm, which were nearly matured. The defendant disclosed the fact that he held the mortgage, and promised to pay the notes if the plaintiff would forbear for a time. It was held that the promise was within the Statute. The court says: "The plaintiff contends that the defendant had a direct personal interest in procuring a forbearance to sue the firm, which he explains in his brief by saying that 'if the plaintiff pressed the collection of his notes, and did not wait till the then next summer, the defendant would lose his money, which had been loaned to the firm.' But I do not discover a single fact in the case which tends to any such conclusion. . . . It was a fear without a foundation; a state of mind, and not a result of existing facts seen in their legal bearing. Delay on the part of the plaintiff is not shown to have been of the slightest consequence to the interest of the defendant." No more do we see in the case before us a single fact which shows that a levy by the collector, subject, as it must have been, to the mortgage, could have injured the defendant or the estate she represented. If she thought so, "it was a state of mind, and not a result of existing facts seen in their legal bearing;" and the decision of the case from which we are quoting seems to unmistakably favor her defense, though the dictum seem adverse. It is said in Browne on the Statute of Frauds, § 214e, that "the mere passing of a new and independent consideration between the plaintiff and defendant does not take the case out of the operation of the Statute; and, so far as some of the decisions depend upon the contrary, they cannot be regarded as law. Every contract of guaranty requires a consideration moving from the party to whom the guaranty is given. There can be no sensible distinction made between 'new and independent' considerations and any other considerations; and the general proposition that 'a new and independent consideration, moving between the parties to the contract of guaranty,' takes it out of the Statute, simply nullifies the Statute. The distinction is between a merely valid consideration for the defendant's promise of guaranty, and that transfer of value which creates an original obligation on the part of the defendant, the measure of which is, by the agreement of the parties, the defendant's payment of the third party's debt." It was suggested that the promise relied on was an original undertaking. We cannot look upon it as such, within the proper meaning of that word. It is a new promise to pay the already existing debt of a third party. The court says in Mallory v. Gillett, 21 N. Y. 412: "The words 'original' and 'collateral' are not in the Statute of Frauds, but they were used at an early day,—the one, to mark the obligation of a principal debtor; the other, that of the person who undertook to answer for such debt. This was, no doubt, an accurate use of language; but it has sometimes happened that, by losing sight of the exact ideas represented by these terms, the word 'original' has been used to characterize any new promise to pay an antecedent debt of another person. Such promises have been called 'original' because they are new; and then, as original undertakings are agreed not to be within the Statute of Frauds, so these new promises, it is often argued, are not within it. If the terms of the Statute were adhered to, or a more discriminating use were made of words not contained in it, there would be no danger of falling into errors of this description."

Where the person undertaking to pay the debt of another receives property or funds of the debtor for the purpose, his promise is in no proper sense an undertaking to answer for the debt of another, but an undertaking to apply the property or funds to such payment. The undertaking becomes then an independent one, and the continuing obligation of the debtor becomes in a sense collateral to it. Whenever the new promise is merely collateral to the original debt, it must be in writing, whatever the consideration, and it remains collateral so long as the original debt still subsists as the principal debt. The decision at which we have arrived makes any discussion of the other questions presented on the record superfluous.

There is error in the judgment appealed from, and it is reversed.

v.

George THROOP, Appt

(.....Conn.....)

A parol agreement made in March permitting one who was to take possession of a farm as tenant April 1st next, under a lease for one year, to use the ice in an ice-house thereon without charge, if he would refill it so as to leave it filled when he surrendered possession, is not void as not to be performed within a year from the making of it.

(January 7, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Litchfield County denying his right to charge plaintiff with the cost of filling an ice-house on defendant's land with ice which plaintiff used while in possession of such land as tenant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. E. Hall, for appellant:

It appears from the nature of the agreement that the parties understood at the time it was made that its full performance, the "leaving the ice-house full when he went away," by the plaintiff, was not to be performed in one year from that time.

This is within the Statute of Frauds.

Gen. Stat. § 1866; 1 Swift, Dig. *263; Herrin v. Butters, 20 Me. 119; Peters v. Westbrook, 19 Pick. 364; Wood, Stat. Fr. 495.

If it appears to have been the understanding of the parties to a contract that it was not to be completed within a year, though it might be, and was in fact, part performed within that time, it is within the Statute and cannot be enforced.

Boydell v. Drummond, 11 East, 142.

The whole scope of the agreement shows that the parties did not contemplate a complete performance within one year from the time it was made.

Herrin v. Butters, supra.

That the written contract or parol agreement is defeasible within the year will not take the case out of the Statute.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered by the court of Common Pleas in Litchfield County. Three reasons of appeal are given in the record. Only one is pursued in this court; the others may be disregarded. The one argued here is, "the court erred in admitting, against the objection of the defendant, the evidence of James E. Brown in relation to the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant in regard to leaving ice in the ice-house when the plaintiff went away, made in the month of March, 1887." The plaintiff had had possession of and carried on a farm belonging to the defendant under a contract in writing—being substantially a letting and hiring on shares—from April 1, 1887, to April 1, 1888, and by a renewal till April 1, 1889, when he left. The parties disagreed about their accounts, and this suit was brought. Each party filed a bill of particulars containing a great number of items. The defendant in his bill had charged the plaintiff, under the date of February 5, 1887, the sum of $23.70 "for getting ice." It appeared that when the plaintiff took possession of the farm on the 1st day of April, 1887, the ice-house thereon was filled with ice. This the plaintiff used during his occupancy of the farm, and refilled the ice-house with other ice; and when he left the premises on the 1st day of April, 1889, the ice-house was left as full of ice as it was when he took possession. The charge of $23.70 was for getting the ice that was in the ice-house at the time the plaintiff took possession of the farm. The written contract contained no reference to the ice then in the ice-house, nor to any refilling of it with ice. To show that the defendant was not entitled to make said charge or to recover said sum of money, the plaintiff called James E. Brown as a witness, who testified that he was present upon the defendant's premises before the execution of the written contract, some time in the month of March, 1887, with the plaintiff and defendant, and heard them agree that, as the defendant had then filled the ice-house upon the premises in question, the plaintiff should have the same without charge, provided he refilled the ice-house, and left as much ice in it when he went away as there was then in it. The defendant objected to the evidence on the ground that it offended against that clause of the Statute of Frauds which provides that no action shall be maintained upon any agreement that is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof, unless it be in writing, etc. The objection was not well taken, and was properly overruled. There was no attempt to show an agreement not to be performed within a year. The testimony of the witness was that the plaintiff was to refill the ice-house, and leave as much ice in it when he went away as there then was. The defendant, in his objection and in his argument, quotes only the latter part, as though the fact of leaving the ice-house filled at the end of the year was the whole of the agreement. On the contrary, it was not the whole of the agreement, nor was it the essential part of the agreement. The real thing agreed to be done was the refilling the ice-house with ice, so that at the end of the term it could be left filled. The ice-house could not be left full of ice on the 1st day of April unless it had been previously filled. It could not be filled except during the season for ice, and that was within a year. In respect to the charge for getting the ice, Mr. Throop was the actor. He was the plaintiff and Mr. Brown was the defendant. Mr. Throop asserted that such a condition of things existed as entitled him to charge Mr. Brown for getting the ice which was in the ice-house when Mr. Brown came on to the farm. Mr. Brown denied that any such state of things existed.

He insisted that there was a totally different state of facts. If the evidence to show Mr. Throop's contention be admissible, then Mr. Brown's evidence must be equally admissible, for they both relate to the same transaction. It would be a strange use of the Statute framed to prevent frauds to hold that it permits one side of an agreement to be proved, but forbids the other side to be shown.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

TOWN OF SULLIVAN et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A debt for the aggregate amount to become due on a contract by a city for electric lights to be furnished for a series of years at a certain sum per year is not incurred by the city at the time of making the contract. The debt for each year is incurred only when it has been earned.
2. Notice inviting proposals for a contract to furnish electric lights need not be given by a municipal corporation unless required by statute where payment is all to be made from the corporation treasury.
3. A mere licensee of the right to use streets does not obtain a monopoly or an exemption from subsequent reasonable police regulations.
4. A special license may be given for the use of streets by an electric light company although a general ordinance is necessary to make regulations as to the mode of using streets.

(June 13, 1891.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sullivan County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin defendant from paying for electric light which had been furnished to the town. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Humphreys & Wolfe, Beasley & Williams, and J. H. Kelley for appellants.

Messrs. John T. Hays and Buff & Hays for appellees.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this suit is to enjoin the officers of the Town of Sullivan from paying to the Sullivan Electric Light & Power Co. compensation for furnishing the Town and its citizens with light. The theory upon which the complaint is constructed is that the contract with the company and the ordinance upon which it is founded, are void.

One of the grounds upon which the validity of the contract is assailed is that it creates an indebtedness beyond the limits prescribed by the Statute. The law is against the appellants upon this point. They assume that the contract creates a debt for the aggregate of all the yearly payments provided for by the contract; and if this assumption is not valid, their position is untenable. That this assumption is not valid is clear. Where a municipal corporation contracts for a usual and necessary thing, such as water or light, and agrees to pay for it annually as furnished, the contract does not create an indebtedness for the aggregate sum of all the yearly installments; since the debt for each year does not come into existence until the compensation for each year has been earned. It may be true that the contract creates an obligation, for a breach of which an action for damages will lie; but it does not create a right of action for the unearned compensation. The earning of each year's compensation is essential to the existence of a debt. If municipal corporations cannot contract for a long period of time for such things as light or water, the result would be disastrous; for it is matter of common knowledge that it requires a large outlay of money to provide machinery and appliances for supplying towns and cities with light and water, and that no one will incur the necessary expense for such machinery and appliances if only short periods are allowed to be provided for by contract. The courts cannot presume that the Legislature meant to so cripple the municipalities of the State as to prevent them from securing light upon reasonable terms, and in the ordinary mode in which such a thing as electric light or gas is obtained. But it is unnecessary to discuss this point at greater length, for we regard the law upon it as settled by the adjudged cases. Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1, and authorities cited; New Albany v. McCullough, 127 Ind. 500; East St. Louis v. East St. Louis G. L. & C. Co. 98 Ill. 415; Erie's App. 91 Pa. 398; Grant v. Duvenport, 36 Iowa, 396; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 135.

The Statute confers upon municipal corporations authority to contract for electric lights, and does not require that notice should be given inviting proposals, nor does it require notice in any form. Elliott, Supp. § 794.

As the mode of making contracts is commit-provisions relating to such awards, see note to Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb (Ark.) ante, 358.

ted to the discretion of the municipal authorities and they are not required to give notice, a contract may be awarded without giving notice. Aurora v. Fox, 78 Ind. 1.

If the municipality were endeavoring to levy a specific assessment upon individuals or upon private property, then notice would be required upon general principles; but there is no such attempt here, for the entire compensation is to be paid from the corporate treasury. There is a clear and important difference between cases where a debt is created payable out of general corporate revenues and cases where special assessments are laid upon property. See authorities cited note 1, Elliott, Roads & Streets, 848.

The right of the electric company to exercise corporate functions cannot be collaterally attacked. Where there is a statute authorizing the creation of a corporation, an attempt to comply with the Statute and an actual exercise of corporate functions, the existence of the corporation can only be destroyed by a direct proceeding. Baker v. Neff, 78 Ind. 68; Williamson v. Kokomo Bldg. & L. Fund Assn. 89 Ind. 889.

It is unquestionably true that a municipal corporation cannot grant to a private corporation the exclusive privilege of using its streets for the purpose of supplying the corporation or its citizens with light, water, fuel or the like. Indianapolis Cable St. R. Co. v. Citizens St. R. Co. 127 Ind. 869, 8 L. R. A. 589; Citizens Gas & M. Co. v. Elwood, 114 Ind. 832, 14 West. Rep. 92. See authorities cited in 2 Elliott, Roads & Streets, 832.

If the ordinance before us is to be construed as granting an exclusive privilege, it must be adjudged void in so far, at least, as it attempts to make such a grant. We are, however, quite well satisfied that the ordinance does not attempt to grant an exclusive privilege. It does, it is true, grant a right to use the streets of the Town; but it does not exclude their use by competing companies. It does not throttle competition, for it merely grants a license to use the streets. It cannot be held that permission to one company to use the streets excludes others; on the contrary, the grant of such a license leaves plenary power in the municipality to grant licenses to rival companies at any time. A licensee who obtains a right to use public streets does not obtain a monopoly. The right to grant other licenses remains open and unobstructed. Not only does the right to license other companies remain open, but the right to prescribe reasonable police regulations by a general ordinance also remains unimpaired. This is the effect of the decision in Citizens' Gas & M. Co. v. Elwood, supra.

A private corporation that obtains license to use the streets of a municipality takes it subject to the power of the municipality to enact a general ordinance, such as that exercised in enacting police regulations; for a governmental power cannot be surrendered or bartered away even by express contract. But there is here no attempt to surrender or barter away this governmental power; for there is nothing more than a license to use the streets of the town. The decision in the case of Citizens' Gas & M. Co. v. Elwood, supra, was made upon an ordinance assuming to make a discrimination in favor of one company and thus exclude all others from using the streets of the town for supplying the citizens with fuel; and it cannot be regarded as denying the right to grant a license to a designated company, although it does deny the power to discriminate in favor of one company to the detriment of competing companies. When a municipality attempts to regulate the mode of using its streets it must do so by a general ordinance; but it does not follow that a general ordinance is essential to the validity of a license granted to a designated company. It is one thing to specifically license a corporation to lay pipes in a street or construct electric lines, and quite another to regulate the entire subject of supplying light, fuel, or the like for where the municipal authorities assume to legislate upon the entire subject, a general ordinance is required; but where they simply grant a privilege to use the streets and do not undertake to regulate the entire subject, a general ordinance is not indispensably necessary to authorize the licensee to use the streets. But neither by a general ordinance nor by special license can discriminations be made or monopolistic privileges be created. It is, however, often true that a privilege in its nature monopolistic, and, as shown in the case of Indianapolis Cable St. R. Co. v. Citizens St. R. Co., supra, when this is so, the grant of the privilege is of necessity the grant of a monopolistic right; but in such a case the corporate grant does not create the monopoly. See authorities cited in notes 1, 2, and 3, Elliott on Roads and Streets, 567. In this instance, there is nothing more than the grant of a license; there is no attempt to create exclusive privileges nor any attempt to regulate the entire subject. The rights acquired under a mere permissive license are subject to control under the delegated governmental power vested in the municipality; for no licensee can acquire rights not subject to regulation under the police power delegated to local governmental instrumentalities. We have here no question of contract rights, for the question presented by the record is whether a special ordinance granting a permissive license to a designated corporation is effective.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Philip S. KINGSLAND et al., Appls.,
v.

Herman KOEPPE et al.

(.....ILL.....)

1. The Liability intended to be assumed by a stranger to a promissory note, who places his name on the back of it, may be shown by parol.

2. In an action on a joint contract judgment cannot be rendered against one defendant by default and in favor of the others.

(March 3, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendants, Koeppe, Klinge and Schwuchow, and against defendant Loring, in an action brought to recover the balance due on certain promissory notes executed by the Lake View Electric Light Company, which defendants were alleged to have guaranteed. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Tenney, Hawley & Coffeen, for appellants:

The contract of an indorser of a note, as well as that of a guarantor, may with strict accuracy of language be termed a contract of guaranty; one being conditional, the other unconditional. It is almost universally the case that the name of the guarantor or indorser is signed in blank, with no words of contract over them. The law, however, supplies these words, and the written contract thus created is just as certain in the rights and liabilities arising under it, as any other written contract. When the blank indorsement of the payee appears on a note, the law implies the contract and consequent liability of an indorser, which is a guaranty of collection, or conditional guaranty. And parol evidence is not admissible to show that the contract, instead of being a conditional guaranty or guaranty of collection, is an absolute guaranty of payment.

Johnson v. Glover, 10 West. Rep. 125, 121 Ill. 233.

When a note in the hands of the payee has

NOTE.—Parol evidence is admissible as between the immediate parties to a promissory note.

An indorser may prove by parol, as against his immediate indorsee, that a blank indorsement was made for the purpose of collection. Downer v. Cheesebrough, 36 Conn. 39; McWhirt v. McKee, 6 Kan. 412.

Some of the authorities maintain that parol evidence is inadmissible to control the construction of an irregular indorsement as against bona fide purchasers for value, and that such evidence is only admissible as between immediate parties to the transaction. Houston v. Bruner, 39 Ind. 333; Browning v. Merritt, 61 Ind. 423; Schneider v. Schiffman, 20 Mo. 571.

In Missouri, it is also held to be admissible against an indorsee after maturity (Seymour v. Farrell, 51 Mo. 96); but the better opinion is that, in every case where the signature on the back is in an ambiguous position, and the meaning can only be definitely ascertained by parol evidence, then parol evidence is admissible to prove its true character, even against a purchaser for value, for he can reasonably be charged with notice of this ambiguity. Greenough v. Smead, 3 Ohio St. 415; Thacher v. Stevens, 46 Conn. 561; Rey v. Simpson, 63 U. S. 22 How. 341, 16 L. ed. 260; Good v. Martin, 36 U. S. 96, 24 L. ed. 343; Cavazos v. Trevino, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 773, 18 L. ed. 813; Frank v. Lillienfeld, 38 Gratt. 392; Denton v. Peters, L. R. 5 Q. B. 475.

It is always competent to show by parol evidence that the indorsement was made without consideration, as, for example, that it was made for the accommodation of the indorsee. Breneman v. Furniss, 90 Pa. 136; Hamburger v. Miller, 48 Md. 325; Morris v. Faurot, 21 Ohio St. 155; Cole v. Smith, 29 La. Ann. 551; Davis v. Morgan, 64 N. C. 570; Lovejoy v. Citizens Bank, 23 Kan. 331; Kirkham v. Boston, 67 Ill. 599; McCoon v. Biggs, 2 Hill, 121; Denniston v. Bacon, 10 Johns. 198; Foster v. Jolly, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 708. See Tiedeman, Com. Paper, 274.

Subsequent failure of consideration may be shown by parol evidence, as well as by an original want of consideration. Smith v. Carter, 25 Wis. 233.

Discord with early decisions.

Some confusion has been thrown around this subject from what has been finally settled to have been 18 L. R. A.

an error, treating such an indorsement as a guaranty and charging the indorser as a maker or guarantor. This doctrine was advanced in Herrick v. Carman, 12 Johns. 160, and was adjudged in Nelson v. Dubois, 13 Johns. 175, and Campbell v. Butler, 14 Johns. 249.

It was attacked in Dean v. Hall, 17 Wend. 214, and in Seabury v. Hungerford, 2 Hill, 80, and was finally overthrown in Hall v. Newcomb, 3 Hill, 233, and the same case in error, 7 Hill, 416.

There are a few cases in the books which hold that a written contract of one kind may be turned into a contract of a different kind, by parol proof concerning the intention of the parties; that the indorser of a promissory note may, under certain circumstances, be charged as maker or guarantor; and that the guarantor of a promissory note may sometimes be charged as maker or indorser. Although these cases stand upon no principle, it has been a work of some time and difficulty to get rid of them. The court of errors was at first equally divided on the question, but after a second argument the court decided by a pretty strong vote to uphold contracts as they had been made by the parties, instead of making new contracts for them. Seabury v. Hungerford, 2 Hill, 80; Hall v. Newcomb, 3 Hill, 233, 7 Hill, 416, in error, and note, p. 423; Manrow v. Durham, 3 Hill, 597.

Whether parol evidence will be received to vary the contract which arises from such indorsement when it is made in blank, is not entirely settled. In Johnson v. Martinus, 9 N. J. L. 182, it was held that parol evidence was competent to overcome the implied contract which resulted from a blank indorsement, on the ground that such indorsement is an inchoate and imperfect contract, and not a written instrument, nor entitled to its effect, protection, or immunity. This decision was made on the authority of Herrick v. Carman, 10 Johns. 224; Hill v. Ely, 5 Serg. & R. 333; Barker v. Prentiss, 6 Mass. 430.

"There was no error in receiving the evidence of the verbal agreement and understanding of the parties at the time of the making of the note. The object was to show a partial or total failure of the consideration for the note, and for that purpose the evidence was admissible." Peterson v. Johnson, 22 Wis. 21, was just such a case, and is decisive of the the name of a third person indorsed on it in blank, the law presumes a contract of guaranty.

Upon principle there would seem to be no difference between a contract of guaranty and one of indorsement, which would exclude parol evidence in one case, and admit it in the other.

It was decided in a number of cases, all prior to Johnson v. Glover, supra, that one who is, apparently, by reason of his blank indorsement, liable as guarantor, might show by parol that, in fact, his contract was that of indorser.

Boynton v. Pierce, 79 Ill. 145; Sowell v. Raymond, 83 Ill. 120; Eberhart v. Page, 89 Ill. 550.

After these decisions came the case of Wor-den v. Satter, 90 Ill. 160, in which the principle was applied to a case apparently of indorsement, and it was held proper to show, by parol, that a blank indorsement by the payee was, in fact, a guaranty.

Three of the judges dissent from the decision, and in Johnson v. Glover it was expressly overruled.

But it was perfectly consistent with, and indeed, the logical result of, the cases which held that a contract of guaranty could be varied by parol. And when it was overruled those decisions went with it, and the principle stated in Johnson v. Glover applies with equal force to contracts of guaranty and indorsement, and that case overrules all prior contrary decisions.

When the payee of a note indorses it in blank, a contract is created which cannot be varied by parol. And yet his signature on the note is entirely consistent with an agreement that he should not be liable in case of dishonor. It is necessary for him to indorse the note, in order to pass title, and there would seem to be good reason for holding that he might show that he indorsed merely for that purpose, and that it was agreed that he should not be held liable. Yet that such evidence is not admissible is well settled.

Courtney v. Hogan, 93 Ill. 101.

If this is so in a case where his signature is perfectly consistent with an agreement that he should not be liable, the reasoning applies with much greater force to a case where he could have signed for no other purpose than to assume a liability. The law does not and cannot presume that his act in signing is a mere idle ceremony, and it therefore presumes a contract of guaranty, just as it presumes a contract of indorsement from the signature of the payee.

Undercook v. Hossack, 38 Ill. 208.

Mr. S. P. Douthart for appellees.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court. This was an action brought by Kingsland Point. Under the Wisconsin decisions (Smith v. Carter, 25 Wis. 283) and the same court has held that it is competent to show by parol evidence a contemporaneous agreement as to the manner in which a note is to be paid. Jones v. Keyes, 16 Wis. 562.

Whether parol evidence is allowed to determine the liability of the person signing before the payee is a matter upon which opinion is diverse. Many authorities take the ground that when it appears that the note was intended for the payee, or that the name was placed upon the back of the note before its delivery to the payee, that circumstance fixes the liability contracted as that of joint maker (Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 94, 24 L. ed. 342; Way v. Butterworth, 108 Mass. 512), and excludes further inquiry. But this does not seem sufficient. See Price v. Lavender, 38 Ala. 390; Hall v. Newcomb, 7 Ill. 416; Schneider v. Schiffman, 20 Mo. 571; Irish v. Cutter, 31 Me. 536.

Others regard that circumstance as only determining that he cannot be regarded as an indorser, because he could not have had title to the note as indorsee, and as leaving it open for further inquiry whether he intended to be a joint maker or a guarantor. Greenough v. Smead, 3 Ohio St. 415.

In some cases it is held that he will be presumed to have signed for the payee's accommodation. Barto v. Schenck, 28 Pa. 447; Schollenberger v. Nehr, 28 Pa. 189; Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 715.

The doctrine of the principal case sustained.

While it is elementary law that parol evidence is incompetent to vary the terms of a written instrument, still it is equally well settled that, as between the original parties to commercial paper, such proof is admissible as will have a tendency to establish the character in which an indorser intended that he should be bound; and proof of this intention will counteract the prima facie presumptions which the law indulges with reference to the paper. Riley v. Gerrish, 9 Cush. 104; Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 365; Owings v. Baker, 54 Md. 82; Nurre v. Chittenden, 56 Ind. 465; Pierce v. Irvine, 1 Minn. 369; Strong v. Riker, 16 Vt. 555; Quin v. 13 L. R. A.

Sterne, 26 Ga. 224; Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 95, 24 L. ed. 343.

It has been held that a guaranty may be written by an indorsee over a blank indorsement, if such was the indorser's intention, and that such intention may be shown by parol. Levi v. Mendell, 1 Duvall, 77; Ulen v. Kittredge, 7 Mass. 233.

And it has been held that parol evidence is admissible to show that a blank indorsement was given by the indorser to the holder merely as a receipt or voucher on payment of the note by him as the maker's agent. Davis v. Morgan, 64 N. C. 570; Andover v. Grafton, 7 N. H. 298; 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 873.

Parol proof is admissible to show whether the indorsement was made before the indorsement of the payee, and before or after the instrument was delivered. If the indorsement was made before the payee became the holder of the note, then the party so indorsing the note may be charged as an original promisor. Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90, 24 L. ed. 341.

So parol evidence that one of two joint makers of a promissory note signed as surety, in order to let in the defense that he was discharged by the holder giving time to the principal debtor, with knowledge of the suretyship is admissible. Hubbard v. Gurney, 64 N. Y. 457, overruling Campbell v. Tate, 7 Lans. 370, and Benjamin v. Arnold, 2 Hun, 447, 5 Thomp. & C. 54. See generally, on this subject, Rice, Ev. p. 1137.

In Free v. Hawkins, 8 Taunt. 92, it was held that evidence of a parol agreement between the holder and the indorser of a promissory note, at time of making and indorsing it, that payment should not be demanded of the maker of the note at the time when it became due, nor until after the sale of certain estates of the maker, was inadmissible, because it controlled and varied the legal obligations of the indorser.

The extent to which parol evidence is admitted to explain or qualify the indorsement of commercial paper is the subject of an extended note to Baxter Nat. Bank v. Talbot (Mass.) ante, 52.

Bros. & Co., the appellants, against Koeppe, Schwuchon, Klinge, and Loring, to recover a balance due, on certain promissory notes executed by the Lake View Electric Light Company, and payable to the plaintiffs. At the date of the execution of the notes by the corporation, the four defendants wrote their names across the back of the notes, and they were sued in this action as guarantors. On the trial in the circuit court, one of the defendants, Loring, withdrew his pleas, and judgment was rendered against him by default for the full amount claimed by the plaintiffs. Nothing need therefore be said as to him at present. The other defendants claimed that they were not guarantors of the notes, and offered parol evidence to show what the contract was between them and appellants at the time they placed their names on the backs of the notes. The court admitted the evidence, and, in the propositions of law submitted, held that it was competent to prove by parol evidence what the real contract between the parties was; and this ruling was affirmed in the appellate court. 35 Ill. App. 81.

Where the payee of a note indorses it by placing his name on the back of the instrument, a contract of indorsement is created; the liability assumed by the payee being established by the writing. Parol evidence to change or vary the terms or conditions of a contract is not admissible. Mason v. Burton, 54 Ill. 353; Johnson v. Glover, 121 Ill. 283, 10 West. Rep. 125; Jones v. Albre, 70 Ill. 34; Woodward v. Foster, 18 Gratt. 200.

But where a person who is not the payee of a promissory note, but a third party, places his name on the back thereof, a different question arises. In such case the rule long established in this State is that it may be shown by parol evidence what liability was intended to be assumed. In an early case (Cushman v. Dement, 4 Ill. 497), where a third party wrote his name across the back of a note, it was held that the indorsement was prima facie evidence of a liability in the capacity of a guarantor, but the legal presumption was liable to be rebutted by parol proof.

In Boynnton v. Pierce, 79 Ill. 145, where the obligation of a guarantor arose, it was expressly held that the presumption that a party, not the payee, who places his name on the back of a note is a guarantor, may be rebutted by parol evidence. In Stowell v. Raymond, 83 Ill. 120, where the question again arose, the same rule was declared. The question again arose in Eberhart v. Page, 89 Ill. 550, and in deciding the case it is said: "The indorsement of a note in blank by a third party raises a presumption only that it is intended thereby to assume the liability of guarantor, which may be rebutted by proof that the real agreement between the parties was different." From the cases cited it is apparent that this court is fully committed to the doctrine that, when a third party writes his name across the back of a promissory note, the presumption from the indorsement is that he assumed the liability of guarantor; yet parol evidence may be introduced to prove what liability was in fact assumed. It is conceded in the argument of appellants that the cases cited fully establish the rule indicated; but it is insisted that these cases were virtually overruled by Johnson v. Glover, 121 Ill. 283, 10 West. Rep. 125. This is a misapprehension of the force and effect of that decision. In that case, Johnson, who was the payee of a note, indorsed it in blank, and the note subsequently fell into the hands of Glover, who sued Johnson as a guarantor; and it was held that he was not a guarantor, but an indorser, and that parol evidence was not admissible to vary or change the character of the liability he had assumed. It is there said: "The general rule is that the name of the payee appearing on the back of the instrument is evidence that he is indorser, and proves that he has assumed the liability of an indorser as fully as if the agreement was written out in words [citing authorities]. Parol evidence is no more admissible to contradict or vary this contract than any other written contract." What was decided in this case, and what was said, had reference solely to a payee of a promissory note who had indorsed the note in blank, and had no bearing whatever upon the rights or obligations of a third party who had placed his name on the back of a note. Moreover, it is manifest that there was no intention to overrule or modify the doctrine announced in Boynnton v. Pierce, 79 Ill. 145; Stowell v. Raymond, 83 Ill. 120; and Eberhart v. Page, 89 Ill. 550,—from the ruling in Dewitt County Bank v. Nixon, 125 Ill. 618.

This case was heard and decided some time after Johnson v. Glover had been decided, and the doctrine of Boynnton, Stowell, and Eberhart Cases was approved, and those cases were cited as sustaining the rule announced. We think, therefore, that the ruling of the circuit court, in the admission of evidence, that the defendants might resort to parol evidence to prove what contract was made between the parties was correct. The signature of the defendants written on the back of the notes was prima facie evidence that the defendants assumed the liability of guarantors; but whether the evidence introduced was sufficient to remove the legal presumption of guaranty was a question of fact for the trial court, who heard the cause without a jury, which does not arise here, and upon which we express no opinion. Whether the propositions of law held or refused by the court are technically accurate it will not be necessary to determine, as the judgment will have to be reversed on other grounds. What has already been said may be regarded as sufficient on another trial to obviate any supposed error in this regard.

As was said in the first part of this opinion, judgment was rendered against one of the defendants by default, and in the trial the court found in favor of the other defendants, and judgment was rendered in their favor against the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs now assign as error the rendition of judgment in their favor against one of the defendants. This error was well assigned. Thayer v. Fintley, 36 Ill. 262.

The action was brought on a joint contract, and the general rule in such cases is that judgment must be rendered against all or none. Davidson v. Bond, 12 Ill. 84; Claffin v. Dunne, 129 Ill. 248.

The judgments of the Appellate and Circuit Courts will be reversed and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court.

Norfolk*, 98 Mass. 452; Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241; Yorvatt v. Winyard, 1 Jac. & W. 394.

The law is settled in accordance with these cases, although Lord Eldon in the early case of Newberry v. James, 2 Meriv. 446, inquired what means a court possessed of enforcing an injunction in such a case and a little later in the case of Williams v. Williams, 3 Meriv. 157, queried whether there was any right to such a remedy.

But a person has no right to the exclusive use of secret recipes further than to prevent them from being obtained or used by breach of trust or confidence. He cannot prevent their use by one who comes honestly to a knowledge of them and the latter may signify to the public that medicines which he makes are made according to such recipes. Chadwick v. Covell, 6 L. R. A. 839, 151 Mass. 190.

Thus a purchaser of recipes for medicines from the administrator of their deceased maker has a right to use them although they had been previously conveyed to a third person, and his own deed makes an exception of rights previously granted. Ibid.

Nor will the right of such a purchaser, if it is not exclusive, become so by the grant of the trade-name and trade-marks pertaining to medicines made according to the recipes. Ibid.

A person will be protected against disclosure of his own secret process in an action for account against him as a licensee of plaintiff's process where he sets up a plea of "secret process;" but he cannot refuse to give any discovery as to the extent of his use of plaintiff's process. Ashworth v. Roberts, L. R. 45 Ch. Div. 623.

A son to whom a secret recipe had been verbally communicated by his mother for the benefit of his brothers and sisters was held liable to account to them as trustee for the profits obtained from the recipe. Green v. Folgham, 1 Sim. & Stu. 398.

A clerk who stands by and sees another purchaser of his employer a secret recipe without disclosing his own knowledge of its contents or claiming any right to use it may be enjoined by such purchaser. 13 L. R. A.

on the ground of estoppel from afterwards setting up any such right. Champlin v. Stoddart, 30 Hun, 300.

Secret code or catalogue.

The inventor of a secret code or system of letters, figures and characters showing the cost and selling price of his wares and merchandise which he furnishes to his traveling salesmen has a property therein which the law will protect; and if the law is inadequate he may have a temporary injunction and receiver. Simmons Hardware Co. v. Waibel (8, Dak.) 11 L. R. A. 267.

Where other parties have wrongfully or fraudulently obtained a knowledge of such code or system and the key thereto, and have copied it into a catalogue of their own, the court may take such marked catalogue into its possession through a receiver and retain it pending the action, and order it to be delivered up to the owner of the original catalogue, or at least that the secret marks shall be erased or canceled before returning it to its owner. Ibid.

Validity of contracts relating to secrets.

A contract to purchase the exclusive right to a secret art or process is not void as in restraint of trade. Bryson v. Whitehead, 1 Sim. & Stu. 74; Vickery v. Welch, 19 Pick. 523; Jarvis v. Peck, 10 Paige, 118, 4 L. ed. 910; Alcock v. Gilbertson, 5 Duer, 76; Hard v. Seeley, 47 Barb. 423.

But an injunction will not lie to restrain the seller from revealing the secret to others at the suit of a purchaser whose payments are in default. New York Chemical Co. v. Halleck, 15 N. Y. Supp. 517.

But a trade, although not generally known to the public, cannot be held secret so as to justify a contract which is otherwise void in restraint of trade to restrain a partner after dissolution from engaging afterwards in the trade anywhere within the State, where it is carried on in three different towns of the State by persons not connected with the contract. Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen, 373.

A contract of an employé not to disclose a secret of the business is valid and its violation may be prevented by injunction. Peabody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452.

And assumpsit will lie for breach of an agreement by the defendant not to take advantage of the communication of a secret invention not yet patented, where he obtained a patent for himself in violation of the agreement. Smith v. Dickenson, 3 Bos. & P. 630.

B. A. R.

15th of October, 1884, the defendant owned a cheese factory situate in the Town of Monroe, Orange County, comprising two parcels of land, with the buildings thereon, and a quantity of fixtures, machinery, and tools connected therewith. For some time prior, with the assistance of her husband, Conrad Gross, her brother-in-law, August Gross, and her father, John Hoffman, she had been engaged in the business of manufacturing cheese at said factory known as "Fromage de Brie," "Fromage d'Isigny," and "Neufchatel." Such cheeses were made by a secret process known only to herself and her said agents. On the day last named, she entered into a sealed agreement with the plaintiffs, whereby she agreed to sell and transfer to them the said factory and all its belongings, together with the "good will, custom, trade-marks, and names used in and belonging to the said business," for the sum of $25,000, to be paid and secured March 1, 1885, when possession was to be given. Said instrument contained a covenant on her part that she would "communicate after the first day of March, 1885, or cause to be communicated, to" said plaintiffs, "by Conrad Gross, John Hoffman, and August Gross, or one or other of them, the secret of the manufacture of the cheeses known as 'Fromage de Brie,' 'Neufchatel,' and 'D'Isigny,' and the recipe therefor, and for each of them, and will instruct or cause to be instructed them, and each of them, in the manufacture thereof. And that she and the said Conrad Gross, John Hoffman, and August Gross will refrain from communicating the secret recipe and instructions for the manufacture of said cheeses, or either of them, to any and all persons other than the above-named parties of the second part [plaintiffs], and will also, after the first day of April, 1885, refrain from engaging in the business of making, manufacturing or vending of said cheeses, or either of them, and from the use of the trade-marks or names, or either of them, hereby agreed to be transferred in connection with said cheeses, or either of them, or with any similar product, under the penalty of five thousand dollars, which is hereby named as stipulated damages to be paid by the party of the first part [defendant], or her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, in case of a violation by the party of the first part [defendant] of this covenant, of this contract, or any part thereof, within five years from the date hereof." She further covenanted that she herself, as well as "said Conrad Gross, John Hoffman, and August Gross, during and up to and until the first day of May, 1885, shall continue and remain in said County of Orange, and from time to time, and at all reasonable times during said period, by herself, or by said Conrad Gross, John Hoffman, and August Gross, whenever so requested by the said parties of the second part [plaintiffs], impart to them, or either of them, the secret of making such cheeses, and each of them, and instruct them and each of them, in the process of manufacturing the same, and each of them, as fully as she or the said Conrad Gross, John Hoffman, or August Gross, or either of them, are informed concerning the same." Both parties appear to have duly kept and performed the agreement, except that, as the trial court found "subsequently to the 1st day of May,

1885, Conrad Gross, the husband of defendant, went to New York City, and engaged in the business of selling 'foreign and domestic fruits, and all kinds of cheese and sausages, etc.,' . . . and while so engaged sold and personally delivered from his place of business to one John Wassung three boxes of cheese marked and named 'Fromage d'Isigny,' and having substantially the same trade-marks thereon as that sold by defendant to plaintiffs, and having stamped thereon the name 'Fromage d'Isigny,' and that said cheese so sold by him to said Wassung was a similar product to that formerly manufactured by defendant." Also, that "said August Gross, the brother-in-law of defendant, subsequent to the 1st day of May, 1885, engaged in the business of retailing fancy groceries in the City of New York, and in and during the fall of 1887, and prior to the commencement of this action, kept for sale at his place of business in New York City boxes of cheese marked or stamped 'Fromage d'Isigny.'" The court further found that the cheese so sold by Conrad Gross under the name of "Fromage d'Isigny," as well as that kept for sale by August Gross marked "Fromage d'Isigny," "was never sold by plaintiffs, nor made or manufactured by them, or either of them, but that the same was a similar product." The court found as conclusions of law that said agreement was a reasonable one, and was founded upon a good and sufficient consideration; that said sale by Conrad and said keeping for sale by August Gross was a direct violation of the covenant in question; that the restriction imposed was no more than the interests of the parties required, and that it was not in restraint of trade or against public policy. Judgment was ordered for the plaintiffs for the sum of $5,000 as stipulated damages.

Mr. John Fennel, for appellant:

The trial judge having found that the defendant did not know of the violations, and there being no proof that the defendant had violated the covenant, there was no such breach as entitled the plaintiff to recover the $5,000.

Leggett v. New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. 53 N. Y. 397, 398. See also Houg v. McGinnis, 22 Wend. 168.

In every case in which a party was held to pay the stipulated sum, it was because of a personal breach, the courts holding that the payment of the sum could have been avoided by the compliance with the contract, and hence the party held could not complain.

Bagley v. Peddie, 16 N. Y. 471.

No damages have been proven except nominal damages.

The provision in the agreement "under the penalty of $5,000, which sum is hereby named as 'stipulated damages,'" is a penalty. Bagley v. Peddie, supra; Kemp v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 69 N. Y. 58.

If a bond is conditioned for the performance of a covenant, the penalty is not recoverable and quantum damnificatus is the true thing in issue.

Beers v. Shannon, 78 N. Y. 308.

Whether a sum named is a penalty or stipulated damages should be determined according to the justice and equity of the particular case.

It is unjust to compel defendant "to suffer an enormous loss, wholly disproportionate to the injury to the other party."

Messrs. Bacon & Merritt, for respondents:

The covenant in question is not void as being in restraint of trade, because: (1) it was not limited as to time; (2) it was a covenant not affecting general trade at all, but affecting the use of trade-marks and secret recipes which were the very property sold by the defendant to the plaintiffs.

The fact that this covenant not only provided against the acts of the defendant herself, but also as against the acts of her husband her father and brother-in-law, does not relieve her of liability. If a party enters into an absolute contract without any qualification or exception, and receives from the party with whom he contracts the consideration of such engagement, he must abide by the contract and either do the act or pay damages, his liability arising from his own direct and positive undertaking.

Plaintiff was entitled to recover $5,000 as liquidated and stipulated damages. The use of the word "penalty" is not important if upon a construction of the whole covenant it is obvious that the parties intended that the amount provided should be stipulated damages.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The business carried on by the defendant was founded on a secret process known only to herself and her agents. She had the right to continue the business, and by keeping her secret to enjoy the benefits to any practicable extent. She also had the right to sell the business, including as an essential part thereof the secret process, and, in order to place the purchasers in the same position that she occupied, to promise to divulge the secret to them alone, and to keep it from everyone else. In no other way could she sell what she had, and get what it was worth. Having the right to make this promise, she also had the right to make it good to her vendees and to protect them by covenants with proper safeguards against the consequences of any violation. Such a contract simply left matters substantially as they were before the sale, except that the seller of the secret had agreed that she would not destroy its value after she had received full value for it. The covenant was not in general restraint of trade, but was a reasonable measure of mutual protection to the parties, as it enabled the one to sell at the highest price, and the other to get what they paid for. It imposed no restriction upon either that was not beneficial to the other, by enhancing the price to the seller, or protecting the purchaser. Recent cases make it very clear that such an agreement is not opposed to public policy, even if the restriction was unlimited as to both time and territory. Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 9 Cent. Rep. 181; Hodge v. Sloan, 107 N. Y. 244, 9 Cent. Rep. 870; Leslie v. Lorillard, 110 N. Y. 519, 534, 1 L. R. A. 456; Watertown Thermometer Co. v. Pool, 51 Hun, 157. The restriction under consideration, however, was not unlimited as to time.

The chief reliance of the defendant in this court, where the point seems to have been raised for the first time, is that the covenant, so far as stipulated damages are concerned, is confined to the personal acts of Mrs. Gross, and does not embrace the acts of her agents. A careful reading of the agreement, however, in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties when it was made, shows that no such result was intended. What was the object of the covenant? It was to keep secret, at all hazards, the process upon which the success of the business depended. On no other basis could the plaintiffs safely buy, or the defendant sell, for what her property was worth. Who had the power to keep the process secret? Clearly the defendant, if anyone, as she had confided it to no one except her trusted agents, who were nearly related to her by blood or marriage. But could she covenant against the acts of those over whom she had no control? She had the right to so covenant by assuming the risk of their actions; and, unless she had done so, presumptively she could not have sold her factory for so large a sum. It was safer for her to sell with such a covenant than it was for the plaintiffs to buy without it. She could exercise some power over her own husband and her father and her husband's brother, all of whom had been associated with her in carrying on the business, and whose actions in certain other respects she assumed to control for a limited time, whereas the plaintiffs were powerless, unless they had her promise to keep the process secret at the peril of paying heavily if she did not. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that the restrictive part of the covenant applies with the same force to her agents that it does to herself; for she undertakes that neither she nor they will disclose the secret, or engage in making or selling either kind of cheese, or use the trade-marks or names connected with the business. We do not think that a personal act of the defendant is essential to a violation of this covenant by her; for if she permits, or even does not prevent, her agents from doing the prohibited acts, the promise is broken. While it is her exclusive covenant, it relates to the action of others; and, if they do what she agreed that they would not do, it is a breach by her, although not her own act. She violated her agreement, not by selling herself, but by not preventing others from selling. This construction of the restrictive part of the covenant would hardly be open to question, were it not that in the same sentence occurs the reparative or compensatory part designed to make the plaintiffs whole if the defendant either could not or did not keep her agreement. While this provides that any violation involves the penalty of $5,000, it adds, "which sum is hereby named as stipulated damages to be paid" by the defendant in case of a violation by her of the covenant in question. What kind of violation is thus referred to? The defendant says a personal violation by her only, but we think, for the reasons already given, that the spirit of the agreement includes both a violation by her own act and by the act of those whom she did not prevent from selling, although she had agreed that they would not sell. As no one not a party to a contract can violate it, every act of defendant's former agents contrary
